Having taken a cursory view of the terraqueous globe with its productions and inhabitants, of the transparent and elastic fluid with which it is invested, and of light and heat which beautify and enrich it, let us now for a little quit the earth, and contemplate the splendid orbs that bespangle the vault of heaven. At an early period, the Chaldean shepherd, watching his flocks, under an unclouded sky, on the extensive plains washed by the Euphrates and the Tigris, attentively observed the stars in their silent revolutions. He marked the brilliancy of Sirius, and the majesty of Orion. With a vigilant eye, he followed the Twins and Arcturus in their course: and learned the unvarying relative position of these twinkling ornaments of the sky. But the planetary motions perplexed him by their apparent intricacy and irregularity, and defied his sagacity to unravel their seeming confusion.

The Phenician mariner turned his eye to those stars which appear to describe very small circles, or with stately majesty to remain motionless in the firmament. Some of the stars of the Dragon, or of the Great Bear, it is likely, were his guides in creeping timidly along the shores of the Mediterranean, or of the Arabian Gulf. The star Alruccabah, in the tail of the Little Bear, which, by the precession of the equinoxes, is now near the immovable point of the heavens, probably did not attract much of his attention.[*] These Chaldean shepherds and Phenician navigators, although they could impress, in some measure, the stars into their service, had but a very limited and partial knowledge of astronomy. There is a vast distance between their rude observations and the noble discoveries of Newton and La Place. For, with the exception of the comets, the solar system is now well understood; and the motions of all the great bodies connected with it are ascertained with the utmost precision, and can be explained by the laws or facts of projection and gravitation.

Astronomy bears a strong testimony to the existence of God, and furnishes clear proofs of his mighty power, consummate wisdom, and great goodness. "My opinion of astronomy has always been," says Dr. Paley, "that it is not the best medium through which to prove the agency of an intelligent Creator." The opinion is not without some foundation. But I must acknowledge that no part of Dr. Paley's masterly work on Natural Theology made a deeper impression on my mind than the chapter on astronomy. We are not, indeed, acquainted with the inhabitants of the planetary bodies, and consequently cannot trace minute contrivance and mechanical adaptation in their organization, or in the provision that is made for their subsistence, accommodation, and comfort. We can reason only on the forms, arrangements, and motions of the planets. But even within this range we meet with decisive proofs of design, power, wisdom, and goodness.

I. The forms of the heavenly bodies are all spheroidal, whatever be the diameter of the sphere. This holds from the sun, the largest, to Pallas, the least, perhaps, of the bodies in our system. The spheroidal figure is best fitted for the motion of the planets, whether in their orbits or on their axes. It is best adapted for the equal diffusion of light; and, judging from the inhabitants of our earth, it is also most commodious for furnishing a residence to living creatures.

Now, was there any physical necessity for the spheroidal figure? I may perhaps be told that it results from the motions. Passing over, at present, the difficulty of accounting for the motions without an Intelligent Cause, I should like to know what is the evidence that the planets were not spheres at their first movement, as well as at present. In my apprehension, I have as good a right to allege that the sphericity was prior to the motion, as another has to say that the motion generated the sphericity. Supposing, however, that the planets were not spheres originally, we may inquire how they moved before they assumed the spheroidal form. What was their original figure? Supposing them to have been cubes, parallelograms, or very irregular figures, how did they revolve till they acquired their present shape? Must not the axis of rotation have been perpetually shifting? And would not this shifting have prevented them from acquiring their present figure? Besides, if our earth, for instance, was as dense at first as it is now, its rotation on its axis would have had very little influence on its figure. The solid parts of the earth do not appear to be affected by its rotation.

But we may be told, perhaps, that the matter of the planets was struck off from the body of the sun in a state of fusion, and thus assumed the globular form by rotation. This, however, is a purely hypothetical assumption countenanced by no one known fact in nature. We do not know that the sun himself is an ignited body. We do not know that any great masses, in a state of ignition and fusion, exist in the universe. We have no evidence that our earth, or any other planet, is gradually cooling. To assume principles, which receive no countenance from the existing phenomena of nature, may do with the dreaming theorist who surrenders himself to the guidance of a loose imagination; but such a practice can never be admitted into the school of sound philosophy. We may add that it is unreasonable to expect that every wild hypothesis devised by a fertile fancy should be seriously refuted. In order to entitle a theory to attention, it must be countenanced by known facts. Without this it is, at best, but an amusing fiction.

According to La Place, a body with the same time of rotation, may put on two very different forms, which will preserve their equilibrium: the one of them is very near a sphere; the other, very far from it. In the case of our earth, supposing it to have been originally a homogeneous body, the parts of which would all freely yield to the centrifugal force, one of the forms would have the ratio of the polar to the equatorial diameter, as 229 to 230, which is near the ratio that actually obtains; and the other as 1 to 680.[*] In all the planets, we find that form which is nearest to the sphere, and which in point of utility and convenience is unquestionably the more advantageous of the two; for the other form is nearly a flat circular body, having a convex edge. If it be alleged that the spheroidal form results from gravitation, we may ask such questions as the following. Will gravitation account for all the phenomena? Is gravitation a necessary or a contingent fact? Is it essential to matter? That it is essential to matter cannot be proved. And if it be not essential to matter, yea if the ratio in which it is observed to act be not essential to matter, then every advantage resulting from gravitation, and from the particular law which it observes, may be reasonably attributed to design.

There is one phenomenon in the planetary figures, for which neither rotation, nor gravitation, nor both of them, will in any degree account; I refer to the ring or rings of Saturn. Although rotation and gravitation may preserve these rings in their places, they will not account for their formation. Galileo was the first who observed something uncommon in the shape of Saturn; and the ring was more fully discovered by Huygens about forty years afterwards. It is now found that this planet is encompassed with two thin flat concentric rings, lying edgewise towards the planet, and at some distance from it. The plane of these rings passes through Saturn's equator. The rings revolve in their own plane, in about ten hours and a half; and, not being of a regular figure, their centre of gravity is at a small distance from the centre of Saturn. The centre of gravity being carried about Saturn by the rotation of the rings, gives them a centrifugal force, which is combined with their gravitation to the planet; and they are retained by these two forces, in the same manner as a planet is retained in its orbit.

[*] Voyez Bailly, Histoire de l'Astronomie Ancienne.

[*] See Vince's Confutation of Atheism, p. 66. The figure of the earth is not yet precisely ascertained. It appears certain that the equatorial diameter somewhat exceeds the polar axis. The difference between the polar and equatorial diameters seems to lie between 300 to 301, and 340 to 341. The French astronomers have made $\frac{1}{331}$. Montucla, vol. iv. p. 170. Others, $\frac{1}{312}$. Playfair, Out. vol. ii. p. 302.

The formation of these rings must have been either instantaneous or gradual. But how will gravitation, or even gravitation and rotation combined, account for their formation in either of these ways. Gravitation could never have produced bodies of such a figure. It could not form them instantaneously: there is no known property of gravity capable of producing such an effect. Neither could it do so gradually; for what was to support them, in an unfinished state, during a gradual formation? I see no way of accounting for the figure of those rings, by matter, gravitation, and motion. And if their figure cannot in this way be accounted for, the question becomes still more complicated and perplexing, when we attend to their motion. To produce the rotation, the force applied must act in the plane of the rings; but a single force acting thus would have disturbed their position, and carried them up to the planet. There must have been impressed equal and opposite forces, at equal distances on each side of the centre, in order to give them rotation without altering their position. The figure of the rings is not regular: La Place has shown that if it had been regular, the rings could not have preserved their position, but must have been disturbed by the slightest force, such as the attraction of a comet or satellite, and fallen upon the planet; and that it is owing to those irregularities that they are supported in their proper situations. In the other bodies of the system, regularity of figure tends to insure uniformity of motion, and there regularity prevails. But here irregularity is found to exist, and it was needful in order to permanency. The rings are of a form which could not have arisen from the gravitation of their parts. They are concentric, placed exactly in the same plane, and in the plane of Saturn's equator. Their progressive velocity is exactly adjusted to the velocity of Saturn in his orbit, both in respect of quantity and direction: and they have a certain degree of inequality in their figures, which, with a corresponding period of revolution about the planet, which is the means of securing them in their position. Here, then, we see such a complication of adjustments, as must irresistibly impress us with the belief of an Intelligent and Wise Cause.

II. Design appears in the arrangement of the heavenly bodies.

The sun is the central body of our system. Of the physical constitution of that luminary we cannot speak with certainty. But, whether we consider it as an ignited body, or as an opaque orb surrounded, at a distance from its surface, with clouds emitting luminous and calorific rays, the fact is certain, that it is the great fountain of light and heat to the system. Design, wisdom, and goodness, are obvious, in this single fact. Had the universe been the result of any undesigning cause, what probability is there that there would have been any luminous body in the system? At present, besides comets, we know of eleven primary and eighteen secondary planets. These are all opaque orbs. How, then, but by the admission of an Intelligent Creator, shall we account for one, and only one, luminous body in our group of worlds. But supposing one luminous body to have somehow appeared among the opaque planets, how shall we account for its being a large body, yea larger than any, or all of the rest? What is there in light and caloric to attach them to the largest body exclusively, or to make the body to which they are attached assume a central position? If gravitation be alleged as the cause, we answer that it will not account for the phenomena. How, on this supposition, are light and heat emitted!

If there had been no sun, it is obvious that the present order of things could not have existed. Without light and heat there could be neither vegetable nor animal life. The light and heat of the sun cannot create a single seed, but by means of one previously existing: they cannot form any animal without the intervention of a seminal principle from a parent animal. The sun, then, has not created anything here; and nothing here created the sun: yet between the sun and the earth there is an obvious relation. For, if you remove the sun, you at the same time extinguish vegetable and animal life on the earth. Have not wisdom and goodness, then, provided this essential condition of animal and vegetable existence?

If the luminous body had been small compared with the other orbs in the system, like Juno or Pallas, or even like our earth; if it had not been a central, but a revolving body round the centre, then light and heat could not have been in the same quantity, nor could they have been so equably distributed as they presently are. But the sun is a vast globe, and stationary, or nearly so, in the centre, diffusing light and heat, and life and joy, over all his attendant worlds. It is needless to enter into any calculation of the probabilities, that in a system of thirty bodies (leaving the comets out of the question) grouped together by the law of gravitation, one, and one only, should be luminous, and that that one should be largest, and in the centre. To me it appears that, on the very face of the thing, there is a plain evidence of design; and not of design only, but of wisdom and goodness also.

The very large bodies, Jupiter, Saturn, and Uranus, are placed at a great distance from the centre. Had they been next the sun, their joint attractions would have greatly disturbed the less and more distant planets in their revolutions. But, travelling in orbits at such an immense distance from the centre, they attract the sun and the inferior planets almost equally; which, in point of perturbation, is nearly the same as if they attracted neither. This results from the law which gravitation observes, decreasing in the inverse ratio of the squares of the distances.

The distances at which the planets are placed from each other are an indication of wisdom. Had not the bulk and distance of the circumvolving bodies been wisely arranged, the attraction of one would have drawn another from its orbit. They would have met together in terrible and destructive collision: confusion and ruin would have ensued. But so wisely are the bulks, velocities, and distances of the planetary orbs adjusted to the established law of gravitation, that, though they act on each other, they do not act so powerfully as to derange the system. The perturbations are partial, limited, and periodical. A great compensating principle pervades the universe, and keeps the disturbing powers within harmless limits. The vast extent of the system gives room for the bodies to move, without endangering its permanency by their mutual attractions: it likewise prevents those great tides which would have happened, if the large planets had moved near each other.

In all the planets, so far as we know, the axis of rotation forms a greater or less angle with the plane of the orbit. For this there is no physical necessity. But in our earth, where we have the best opportunity of observing and judging, it is productive of beneficial effects. To it we owe the variety of seasons. Had the axis of rotation been parallel to the plane of the orbit, each hemisphere, in its turn, would have been long in darkness. If the axis had been perpendicular to the plane of the orbit, light would, indeed, have been diffused from pole to pole; but the equatorial regions would have been scorched with perpetual and unvarying heats, whilst in the higher latitudes the influence of the sun would have been too faintly felt to bring vegetation to maturity. But, by the inclination of the axis, light and heat are more beneficially diffused over the globe.

Under the head of arrangement, we may take notice of the provision of moons.

Mercury and Venus, moving in orbits at no great distance from the fountain of light, are provided with none of those attendants. One accompanies our earth; and, as its orbit forms but a small angle with the ecliptic, it is very beneficial to its primary. The time of the moon's revolution round the earth is just equal to the time of her rotation about her own axis. The same holds of all the satellites of Jupiter; and of one, at least, of Saturn. From the uniformity which prevails in the other parts of the system, it is likely that the same is the case with all the secondaries, although it has not yet been ascertained by observation. In this way, the secondary always keeps the same face towards the primary. Now, in this constitution of things, we may perceive plain indications of design, wisdom, and goodness. When we consider the number of nice adjustments that are necessary in order to make the secondary always keep the same face towards the primary, and attend to the number of bodies in which this constitution obtains, it is impossible to attribute it to anything but design. The end is good; for had the constitution of those bodies been different, the primary would have occasioned injurious or destructive tides on the secondary; but by keeping the same face of the moon always towards the earth this evil is avoided. Whatever may be the elevation of the waters upon the moon, it always remains the same, or nearly so.

Mars has no satellite. The four newly discovered planets, Juno, Vesta, Ceres, and Pallas, are very small bodies, and unable to carry moons along with them. But Jupiter, a vast globe, moving in an orbit about 190 millions of miles distant from the sun, is provided with four satellites, placed at different distances from his centre, and performing their revolutions in different periods. Saturn, revolving in an orbit twice as distant from the sun as that of Jupiter, besides the apparatus of his rings, has no less than seven moons attending him. Uranus, about 1800 millions of miles distant from the sun, is known to have at least six moons.

Light decreases as the squares of the distances increase, consequently in those distant regions the solar rays must be very sparse. But the remote planets are amply provided with satellites to reflect the light; and, to me, the provision of moons in the system appears to afford no slight evidence of design. The most distant planets are capable, by their mass, of supporting moons, and they are provided with them. Perhaps, in the other planets, these satellites serve other beneficial purposes besides that of illumination, as the moon does to our earth. Distant as they are, they are of advantage even to us: the moons of Jupiter assist us in determining the longitude.

III. The motions of the planets afford plain proofs of design, whether we attend to their revolutions in their orbits, or to their rotation on their axes.

The adjustment of the centripetal and centrifugal forces, so as exactly to balance each other, is a wonderful fact in nature. The planets all move in ellipses, not greatly removed from circles, having the sun in one of the foci. The general law or fact, in nature, so far as we can observe, is that all bodies attract each other in the direct ratio of their masses, and in the inverse ratio of the squares of the distances. It has, indeed, been asserted that this is a necessary fact. But we know too little of gravitation to authorize us to make any such assertion. We do not know that gravitation is essential to matter. We neither know what it is, nor how it acts; and, for anything we know, it might have followed one ratio of action just as well as another. Therefore we have at least as good a right to attribute the established ratio to choice, as others have to attribute it to necessity.*

But, without dwelling on this point, how shall we account for the velocity with which each planet moves, being so proportioned to the quantity of matter in the planet, and to its distance from the sun, as to retain it exactly in its orbit. Take any planet, and make an alteration in any of those conditions, and you derange or destroy the system. If you greatly increase the matter of any planet, leaving its distance and velocity the same as at present, it will fall into the sun. If you considerably increase the velocity, leaving the planet with the same, or less quantity of matter, and at the same distance from the central body, it will no longer move in an orbit nearly circular, but will describe a very eccentric ellipse, or fly off into the immensity of space. Here, then, design, nay consummate wisdom, is displayed, in so finely balancing the centripetal and centrifugal forces, that the planets should move in orbits nearly circular. In order to the accomplishment of this, both the direction and the velocity of the projection lay within extremely narrow limits. Although the direction in which the body was projected had been right, yet a small difference in the velocity would have made a great change in the orbit; and supposing the velocity to have been just what it is at present, if the projection had not been in one particular line, the effect would not have answered. No direction would have cured a wrong velocity, and no velocity would have cured a wrong direction. Both must be right, and the right point lay within extremely narrow limits. Now, that two such independent circumstances should be found so exactly united, in so many different bodies, is evidently the result of contrivance and wisdom.

There is a fixed relation between the periodic times of the primary planets, and their mean distances from the centre. The squares of the periodic times are to each other as the cubes of the mean distances. That this should obtain in all the planets cannot be accounted for but by resolving it into design; and the fact is the more worthy of attention, when we consider that one of the conditions requisite to the stability of the system is, that the planets should perform their revolutions in different periods.

The framers of theories have amused themselves and their readers with dreams of comets striking off fragments from the sun, and of these fragments becoming planets. But, according to the great law of gravitation, a revolving body returns into its own path; and consequently, if the planets had been struck off from the body of the sun, they must in every revolution have returned to the body of the sun again. It is of no avail to allege, that the blow which struck off the fragments from the sun, removed the sun himself from his place; for, even in this case, as the supposed stroke acted on the fragment as well as on the sun, so the fragment must, in every revolution, return to the surface of the body from which it was broken off. As a revolving body, according to the law of gravitation, must return to the place from which it was projected, it follows that the planets must either have been formed in their orbits or carried to them, and received the projectile impulse there. They must all have begun their motions in their orbits.

We may here remark, that it has been said, that the four newly discovered planets are fragments of a large body that formerly revolved in an orbit between those of Jupiter and Mars, but which, by some unknown cause, perhaps by a shock of electricity, had been broken in pieces; and it has been supposed that the meteoric stones, which sometimes fall on the earth, are the splinters of that large orb which gave birth to the newly discovered planets. On this fanciful theory, I shall just observe, that if a large planet has been broken, it must have been many ages ago; for the history of astronomy does not inform us of any planet that has disappeared. Meteoric stones, however, have lately fallen on the earth. Are we not, then, left to suppose that the larger fragments, by some good fortune, have been honoured with a place among the planets, whilst the unlucky little splinters have been wandering up and down for ages, without finding a resting place, till at length chance conducted them to this earth for repose?

Suppose a large planet to have been shivered, no matter how, we may inquire in what manner the large fragments acquired their spheroidal form! How did they find their way to their respective orbits? Whence did they receive their projectile force, so exactly in the direction and with the velocity requisite to ensure their continuance and steady motions in their orbits, amidst so many soliciting and disturbing powers? How came they to move so near each other, and yet to remain so distinct? Till these and similar questions be satisfactorily answered, it will be as philosophical to believe that the four newly discovered planets were formed in their orbits, and projected by a powerful and wise Intelligence, as to embrace the theory now mentioned concerning their origin.

After the planets are projected in a direction and with a velocity so exactly proportioned to the quantity of matter in each, and to its distance from the sun, as that they shall nearly describe circles, still there is no physical necessity for their revolving on their own axes. But that most of them do revolve on their own axes we certainly know. That this should happen in so many different bodies, must be the result of design. Those persons who are best acquainted with the doctrine of probabilities, will not, I apprehend, ascribe it to chance. By this constitution of things a beneficial purpose is served, in our world at least, and we have not the means of judging so fully of any other. To it we owe the agreeable vicissitude of day and night, a vicissitude accommodated to our nature, as it gives us the opportunity of refreshing ourselves with sleep by night, to prepare for the toils and enjoyments of returning day. Here design is obvious; and benevolence characterizes the designing mind, for the end is beneficial. Wisdom, also, plainly appears in the contrivance.

All the twenty-nine primaries and secondaries, belonging to our system (if the moons of Uranus, the planes of which are nearly at right angles to the orbit of their primary, be not considered an exception), perform their revolutions in the same direction. In the zodiac they all proceed from Aries to Taurus: none of them moves in the opposite direction. The diurnal rotations, so far as we know, all follow the same course. It is impossible to ascribe this to chance: it must be the effect of design; for, considered as casual productions, the chances of their all moving in a direct, and none of them in a retrograde course, are almost incalculable.* That the planets should all move in the same direction, in their orbits, is essential to the stability of the system.[*] For, had it been otherwise, the inequalities would not have had their regular periods of increase and decrease, as at present, but would have gone on increasing till they brought on the destruction of the whole fabric.

* See Professor Robison in Supplement to 3d edition of Encyclopædia Britannica, voc. Astronomy, p. 53.

* La Place has calculated, that the probability of the motions of the solar system have taken place without the operation of a superintending mind is so small, that it may be considered as nothing. It is as 2 : $2^{42} - 1$; i. e. it is as 2 is to 4398046511103. These motions alone furnish an almost decisive proof of the existence of a designing cause.

It may be inquired, whether the planetary system be steady and permanent. Are there no principles of dissolution operating in the apparently harmonious combination of globes? Are there no soliciting and disturbing causes which shall ultimately accomplish the overthrow of the whole? To such queries we answer, that in every system of bodies gravitating towards a centre, and reciprocally acting upon each other, there will be perturbations; and such perturbations exist in our system. The planes of the planetary orbits are subject to a variation in their situation; the inclinations of the orbits to the ecliptic are liable to a change: the figure of the earth's orbit is approaching towards a circle; and, owing to this cause, the mean motion of the moon is increasing: the obliquity of the ecliptic is diminishing. But have these changes no limits? Will they go on increasing till they terminate in the dissolution of the system? To these questions the investigations of modern science enable us to reply, that these changes have limits; and that the variations, irregularities, or inequalities of the solar system are periodical, and return into themselves. The whole oscillates round a certain quantity from which it can never greatly depart. These variations travel their rounds in fixed periods. The periods of some of them are short, while those of others involve hundreds of years. But still, at the close of their respective periods, each returns to the point from which it set out, and is found in its orbit as if no such disturbance had happened. After certain periods the planes of the planetary orbits will return to the positions from which they departed; the inclinations of their orbits to the ecliptic will return into themselves; the figure of the earth's orbit will come back to its original form; and the mean motion of the moon will decrease by the same steps by which it has increased. The obliquity of the ecliptic will never change above two degrees; and, vibrating within such narrow limits, the seasons will never be sensibly affected by it.

For the permanency of the system necessity cannot be pleaded, as it depends on conditions which are not necessary. These conditions are, that the attraction be inversely as the squares of the distances; that the orbits be not far removed from circles; that the planets all move in the same direction; and that the planes of their orbits are not much inclined to one another.[†] These conditions are not essential to a system of bodies mutually gravitating towards each other. They do not necessarily arise from the action of any physical cause known to us. Any of them might be changed, while the others remained the same. The appointment of such conditions, therefore, as would ensure the stability and permanency of the system, is not the work of necessity: it cannot be the work of chance, for chance could never have brought together such an assemblage of independent conditions. It must, therefore, be the work of design; yea of boundless wisdom, which at one comprehensive glance, saw the system in all its variety, and perceived the conditions essential to its permanency.

The comets are bodies of little density, and consequently their disturbing power is little felt on the planets.[‡]

Having made these observations on the solar system, let us now glance at the fixed stars.

On departing from the orbit of Uranus, the remotest of the planets, so far as we at present know, we must traverse, in all probability, between two and three hundred thousand times the distance of the earth from the sun, a space which we may compute in numbers, but which imagination can scarcely conceive, before we reach the nearest of the fixed stars.[*] From that point, sound would take millions of years to travel to our earth. Notwithstanding this immense distance, some of the fixed stars, probably the least remote, such as Sirius and Arcturus, shine with great brilliancy. In a clear night, by reason of their twinkling, they seem to be innumerable. But, in reality, the number discernible by the naked eye is not very great, being only about three thousand; and it is but seldom that one-third of that number can be seen, even by a good eye, at the same time. On using a powerful telescope, however, their numbers exceed calculation. They are clustered throughout the immensity of space in such multitudes as to bewilder the imagination in their countless number, and in the inconceivable extent of the universe.[†]

They shine by their own light. The delicate discovery of the aberration of the fixed stars shows that the velocity of their light is the same as that which comes from the sun. It is also capable of the same modifications as the solar light, being reflected and refracted according to the same laws. Hence it appears that the sun and the fixed stars are bodies of the same nature: and, according to the opinion of the most enlightened philosophers, these stars are so many suns, each surrounded with its own planetary system; although, on account of their immeasurable distance, these planets are altogether invisible to us.

We speak of these stars as fixed, because they preserve the same relative position with respect to one another. But there is no clear evidence of their absolute immobility. Sirius, Arcturus, and Aldebaran, have been observed to make a small change in their places; and, according to some, the solar system is not confined to a certain region in absolute space, but has a progressive motion. Perhaps all the great bodies of the universe are grouped together in systems mutually supporting each other, and moving in orbits round a central point in the immensity of space; or they may be supported in their stations in a way of which we have no conception. For although we see processes of vast extent going on, and principles of wide operation established, yet we are not to confine the Supreme Architect to these principles and processes only, because we know of no other. We see enough to convince us that He can vary his means as circumstances require, and that no end is beyond his powers of execution.

What a great and glorious scene, then, do the heavens exhibit to our view! Millions, and tens of millions of suns are stationed at convenient distances throughout the immensity of space, enlightening, and warming, and fertilizing hundreds of millions of worlds, all wheeling in busy and silent revolution round their several points of attraction; or bound together in systems of mutual gravitation. Judging from analogy, and from all that we can perceive of the operations of HIM who never works in vain, we are constrained to conclude that all these worlds, formed, and projected, and guided by the potent arm, and under the immediate inspection of the Almighty Sovereign, are inhabited by different orders of beings, with organs accommodated to the different circumstances in which they are placed, and endued with different degrees of intellectual capacity. What a noble scene! How ambitious ought we to be to extend our acquaintance with it in the progress of our existence! If creation be so great, O how great must the Creator be! He not only made, but he upholds and governs the mighty system of the universe. Not a movement of any orb but is guided by his hand; and not an action of a rational creature that escapes his eye. How well is he entitled to our homage and obedience!

Our earth, in all its beauty, variety, and magnificence; oceans, lakes, and rivers, mountains, valleys, and plains, clothed with verdure and enriched with plenty, diversified and enlivened with numerous inhabitants, presents a rich and charming scene to the imagination. But when we contemplate the number and magnitude of the heavenly orbs, the myriads of worlds profusely spread throughout the immeasurable regions of space, upheld by Almighty power, arranged and directed by consummate wisdom, replenished with inhabitants, many of whom, no doubt, occupy a higher station, are endued with nobler powers, and clothed with a brighter glory than man, then the magnificence of our earth dwindles away, and the dignity of our nature and race seems absorbed in the brilliancy of the mighty constellation of intellectual being. Instead of overpowering our faculties, or damping our energy, let the view elevate the soul, awaken the ambition, and invigorate the exertions of rational and immortal man. Let him rejoice that he forms a part in such a mighty scheme; that he stands so high on the scale of existence. Other beings may be endued with more vigorous and enlarged faculties; but he is not doomed to remain stationary in the place which he now occupies. His powers are capable of high improvement: and who shall set limits to his progress in the pursuit of excellence? What attainments are within his reach, how far his faculties may yet expand, what noble rewards may yet crown his diligence and activity, and with what dignity he may yet appear among the chosen of the universe, no language can express, nor imagination conceive!

[*] As the planes of the satellites of Uranus are nearly perpendicular to the orbit of the planet, the direction of their motion, whether retrograde or otherwise, can have no sensible influence upon the system.

[†] This last condition, it may perhaps be alleged, does not hold in some of the new planets; but these planets are very small bodies, and their action on the system must be altogether insensible.

[‡] The very different positions and inclinations of the orbits of comets to the ecliptic seems not to be the effect of chance; but give us reason to acknowledge and admire the wisdom of Deity. If the planes of their orbits had been in that of the ecliptic, or very near it, then every time that a comet descended towards the sun, or returned from its perihelion, we would have been exposed to the danger of being struck by it, if unhappily the earth had then happened to be at the points of intersection; or at least, according to Whiston, we would have run the risk of being inundated by its tail. But according to the present constitution of things this risk is avoided.—See MONTUCLA, vol. ii. p. 636, 2d edition.

[*] The annual parallax of the fixed stars has not yet been ascertained. But if we suppose it not to exceed 1″, the distance of the fixed stars cannot be less than 206265 times the radius of the earth's orbit. As light traverses the latter in 8′ 13″, it will require 3 years and 79 days to come from a fixed star to the earth.—See PLAYFAIR'S Outlines, vol. ii. p. 217.

[†] The more powerful the telescope, the greater is the number of stars seen. La Lande computed, that, with a forty foot telescope, a hundred millions were visible.—MONTUCLA, vol. iv. p. 29.

The wise and benevolent Sovereign of Nature, reigning with vigilant affection over innumerable worlds, peopled with inhabitants whose organs are suited to their respective situations, all rejoicing in the existence, adoring the perfections, and grateful for the goodness of the bountiful Creator; what a magnificent and ennobling scene! While the melody of praise and the incense of thanksgiving ascend from all quarters of the universe towards the throne of the Almighty, what shall we think of those few beings, perhaps of our race chiefly, who refuse to join in the general symphony, and who not only withhold the tribute of adoration and gratitude, but audaciously deny the existence of the Creator? Guilty and miserable creatures! they cast themselves out from the great society of blessed intelligences, and forfeit the felicity prepared for the grateful and obedient subjects of the Universal Sovereign.

In our cursory glance at Nature, we have seen a wonderful scene: minute precision, and splendid magnificence; striking uniformity, and endless variety; apparent carelessness and irregularity, and the most perfect order and exquisite arrangements, all united. In examining the parts, we meet with skilful contrivance, admirable workmanship, and exact adjustment. As there is an accurate adaptation and reciprocal dependance of the parts, so those parts are combined in one harmonious and magnificent whole. Obvious traces of design everywhere occur; and as certainly as design proves a designing cause, so certainly do we prove the existence of an intelligent Creator. We do not, indeed, see or feel the Deity, in the same manner as we see or feel a material object. But although he himself is invisible, his operations are manifest. Creation proclaims the being of the Creator. The attributes of mind are evidently displayed, and the existence of God is as fully ascertained, as if we saw him with his right hand upholding the sun, with his left directing the stars in their courses; and heard his voice proclaiming, "I form the light, and create darkness; I the Lord do all these things."

BOOK III.

OF THE PERFECTIONS OF DEITY.

OF THE UNITY OF DEITY.

Design and contrivance are fully established by the facts and arguments stated in the preceding part of this treatise. But design and contrivance are acts of mind, and their existence in the universe plainly proves it to be the production of an Intelligent Cause. We now, therefore, proceed to inquire into the character of the Supreme Intelligence, in so far as it is discoverable in the works of his hand. We, indeed, know, and perhaps at present we can know but little about the Divine Essence, and the manner in which the Deity exists and acts; but our ignorance or imperfect knowledge of those things is not even a shadow of argument against the existence of the Supreme Being. It is nothing more than a proof of our limited capacity. In investigating the character of the Deity, as discoverable from his works, we may assume it as a principle, that whatever qualities appear in the design and contrivance, may justly be ascribed to the designing and contriving Mind, in the degree, at least, in which they are manifested in the design and execution. For instance, the planets, bodies of vast magnitude, have been projected with prodigious velocity; and that velocity and the direction have been so nicely adjusted to the quantity of matter in each of the planets, and to their respective distances from the sun, as to make them describe such orbits as shall ensure the stability and permanency of the system. We cannot err in ascribing to the Author of the system a power equal to the projection of the planets in their orbits with the requisite velocity, and a wisdom equal to what was necessary in order to the establishment of such conditions as are sufficient for the security of the system. And in so far as the constitution of things promotes the happiness of sentient beings, the attribute of goodness must also be admitted.

Although we cannot err in ascribing to the Deity those attributes which are manifested in creation, and in that degree in which they are there displayed, yet we are not to limit the perfections of God by his works. Before we can pretend, from the works of Deity, to set limits to his attributes, two conditions seem to be requisite. First, we must completely understand the work in all its extent. Secondly, we must perceive some defect in the obvious plan, which could arise only from a limitation of the perfections. If the plan be perfect in its kind, we are not authorized to infer that he who contrived and executed it was unable to have contrived and executed a nobler plan. Because the architect has built a cottage, we are not to conclude that he was incapable of constructing a palace. He has executed his plan, and we have no evidence of his incapacity for a more extensive and splendid work. If the present work be well finished, according to the obvious design, the presumption is, that he could equally well have built a more superb mansion if he had undertaken it.

In like manner, while we ascribe to God all the perfections manifested in his works, we are not to imagine that all the resources of his perfections were exhausted in the execution of those works which fall under our inspection. He has exercised all that perfection which his plan required, and the presumption is, that he could have exercised more if more had been needful. For example, mighty power is displayed in the projection of the planets; but we are not authorized to infer that all the power of God was exerted in that projection. The power requisite in order to the accomplishment of the end was exerted; the exertion of a greater degree of power would have been subversive of the end, and, therefore, the exercise of power was regulated as well as directed by wisdom. A similar observation may be applied to the other attributes of God. In judging of his perfections from his works, we must not lose sight of his plan, and we are to ascribe to him all the perfections manifested in the plan, and all that by legitimate reasoning can be deduced from the execution of it.

It is reckoned a fundamental rule in philosophy, not to suppose more causes than are needful to produce the effect. This principle conducts us to the unity of Deity; for the necessity of finding an adequate efficient cause does not compel us to have recourse to a plurality of gods. The power that was equal to the creation of a part was equal to the creation of the whole. But we are not obliged to rely on a principle of this kind, in order to establish the unity of Diety. The uniformity of plan that pervades the system indicates unity of counsel, at least in its formation. We can trace unity of plan in the great fabric of the universe, so far as we are capable of observing it. The law of gravitation prevails throughout the solar system. All the bodies in that system seem to revolve on their own axes: all the planets move in the same direction in the zodiac. The light of the fixed stars affects the eye in the same way as that of the sun; and it travels at the same rate, as we learn from the delicate discovery of their aberration. On descending to our earth we find a similar uniformity prevailing, and can easily trace the harmonious combination of many great parts in one magnificent whole.

The earth is a component part of the solar system; and in it many independent conditions must meet, in order to render it a convenient residence for beings organized as its present inhabitants are. It is a terraqueous globe, clothed with an invisible aërial robe; and the dry land is covered with a mould capable of imbibing moisture, and supporting vegetation. The earth is enlightened and warmed by the sun, the central body of the system. If the earth had been a detached body, wholly unconnected with any other orb, darkness and sterility would have established upon it an everlasting empire. But the sun is provided; a condition essential to vegetable and animal existence. The atmosphere also was requisite. It refracts and reflects the beams of the sun in all directions, and sheds a flood of light on the earth. The sun exhales vapours from the ocean; the atmosphere supports those vapours, and by its currents carries them to the dry land, where they descend in refreshing showers, affording nourishment to vegetable, and a wholesome beverage to man and beast. With all the conditions mentioned, the earth might have been the mansion of melancholy silence and eternal sterility; for, the sun, the atmosphere, the ocean, the soil, cannot produce a single pile of grass, or a single herb, or a single tree, without seed. But seed is liberally provided; and hence the earth is clothed with verdure and enriched with plenty.

The sun, however, might have beamed in the firmament, the rain distilled on the tender plant, and luxurient herbage crowned the mountain and waved on the plain, without a single sentient being to enjoy the scene, or partake of the rich feast which the bountiful Creator had provided. But God does not work in vain. Having fitted up such a noble habitation, he replenished it with tenants of many different kinds, all capable of enjoying the accommodations with which it is stored, and of relishing the happiness which it is calculated to afford. There are perhaps 20,000 different kinds of living creatures upon our globe. Among these there is a great variety; but at the same time an uniformity so striking, as to indicate the same skilful hand in their formation. They all respire by lungs, gills, or air tubes. All animals take in food: in all, the processes of digestion and assimilation are carried on; and an excrementitious part is thrown off. They all propagate their kinds.

Vegetables draw sustenance from inorganic matter, and prepare food for sentient beings. Plants have their appropriate vessels, for conveying the sap and peculiar juices through the stem, branches, and leaves: animals have blood vessels for an analogous purpose. The gradations in the animal world all proclaim the workmanship of the same hand. Here we see a very complicated system: many independent parts are combined into one harmonious whole. The different parts of nature are admirably adjusted to each other. The relations between the different parts of the system; between the sun, the earth, the air, and the ocean; between the animate and inanimate parts of creation; direct us to one powerful Creator.

One agent is often made subservient to many different purposes. One sun illuminates many worlds; the light and heat which emanate from that luminary answer many valuable ends. To man the uses of air and water are multifarious. The ocean is also the seat of much enjoyment, and the air the chief scene of felicity to many a happy being. In travelling over the earth we meet with different climates; nature pust on various aspects; and nations differ in their appearance, manners, and laws. Still we meet with nothing indicating the hand of a different artist, or the government of a different sovereign. All nature points to one great Author. Unity of plan pervades the universe; and from this unity of plan we may fairly infer the unity of Deity. One Supreme Mind planned the great system of nature, still upholds it in existence, and continually superintends the government of the whole.

CHAPTER II.

OF THE POWER OF DEITY.

That the Deity is an all powerful Being evidently appears from his works. The Architect who could build the stupendous fabric of the universe must be omnipotent. We can conceive no bounds to the power of HIM who was able to station the sun in the firmament, and to launch the planets with such velocity in their orbits. Limiting our view to the solar system, which is merely a speck in the immensity of space and amid the myriads of worlds with which space is replenished, must we not be amazed on beholding the sun in majesty occupying a central position, and presiding over the great globes, which in silent and unceasing revolution wheel around him. Think on the dimensions of the planets, and their rapidity in their orbits. What a potent arm must have projected, with such prodigious velocity, those vast bodies into the illimitable void! Our earth, almost eight thousand miles in diameter, travels about fifteen hundred thousand miles in a-day; and, at the same time, it is spinning on its own axis, and turning up, successively, the vegetables and animals which it nurses on its bosom, to the genial influence of the solar rays. And, with this inconceivable rapidity, how unceasing, steady, and uniform, are its motions. The same holds in the other planets, some of them vastly larger than our globe. Each of them regularly and steadily performs its revolutions. The power capable of producing those effects is immeasurably greater than what we experience in ourselves, or perceive in any visible agent, and may with propriety be described as Omnipotent; because nothing in our observation or experience authorizes us to set limits to it.

We ascribe infinity to all the attributes of Deity. But infinity is a word to which we can attach no precise conceptions. The very use of the word is an admission that the thing to which it is applied is above the grasp of our comprehension; and when applied to any of the perfections of Deity, it means that those perfections go as far as our minds can follow them, and how much farther we cannot tell. And certainly, when we contemplate the power displayed in the universe, and the numberless instances and incalculable variety of the manifestations of wisdom and goodness, we may with reverence, admiration, and gratitude, describe those perfections of Deity as infinite.

It is obvious that the power which could create the world is able to uphold it in being. God must preserve the world which he has created, for that which derived its existence from another does not necessarily exist. It could not so exist in the first moment of its being, nor yet at any future period; and must, consequently, owe the continuance of its existence to HIM from whom its being was primarily derived. There is no medium between necessary existence and dependance on a cause. A creature can no more preserve than make itself.

There is an essential difference between creation and works of art. For though works of art cannot make themselves, yet, when made, they can continue to exist without the artist who made them. A house cannot build itself; but, when built, it stands as long as the materials and workmanship last. We must observe, however, that the artist merely gives a particular form to that matter which depends on the power and will of the Creator for the continuance of its existence. The particular form given by the artist exists in subjection to the laws which the Creator has established for the government of that matter which he upholds in being. Although the facts that God at first created, and that he still preserves all things are clear, yet the manner of creation and of preservation are equally above our reach.

CHAPTER III.

OF THE WISDOM OF DEITY.

Wisdom is manifested in employing fit and adequate means for the accomplishment of its ends. It obviously appears to have been the purpose of God that this world should be a proper place of residence for animals of many different kinds, and that all the animals should enjoy the means of preserving for a time the life of the individual, and of continuing the species. These ends are completely accomplished, and accomplished by such a complicated and diversified combination of independent circumstances as gives a most exalted view of the Divine wisdom. This world was to be fitted up as a place of residence for its present inhabitants. For this purpose, light and heat, and air and moisture, were necessary. Accordingly, the sun was provided to enlighten and to warm the earth; a vast basin was scooped out, and the waters of the ocean poured into it; the atmosphere was thrown around the earth to be the carrier and dispenser of this moisture exhaled by the sun.

Between the animated and inanimated parts of nature we see the most astonishing relations. There is a fine correspondence between the atmosphere and the respiratory organs of animals. These organs are very different in different living creatures; but in each they are wisely accommodated to the configuration and circumstances of the animal, and in all they accomplish their great vital function. In the atmosphere, and in the organs of respiration in connection with the other parts of the constitution, we have an adequate provision for the existence of the animal; but it is subject to a daily and hourly waste, and needs a frequent supply. This supply is provided, as well as a complete apparatus for taking it into the system.

The earth is clothed with a great variety of vegetables which extract nourishment from inorganic matter, and afford sustenance to man and beast. All the different animals are furnished with means of subsistence; and when we attend to the manner in which every animal is fitted for collecting, eating, and digesting its food, we perceive a display of consummate wisdom in the admirable adaptation and combination of means, in order to the accomplishment of an end. As wisdom undeniably appears in the complete provision made for the preservation of the individual, so it is equally manifest in the efficacious means which are employed for the continuance of the species. Some classes of animals live longer and some shorter, but all are capable of continuing their kinds; and we see a wonderful system established, for nursing and protecting the young till they are capable of providing for themselves. No species perishes either through a failure of the means of subsistence to the individual, or from incapacity to continue the species; and the reproductive powers of the several kinds are adapted and proportioned to the term of their existence, and to the dangers to which they are exposed.

When we, then, consider the boundless extent and vast variety of things, the skilful adaptations that every where occur, and the beautiful order and regularity that prevail in nature, we must pronounce HIM who was capable of conceiving and executing such a plan a Being of infinite wisdom. His wisdom no difficulty can baffle; it is equal to every emergency. In every possible combination of circumstances, he at once perceives the best plan, and the best means for carrying that plan into execution. But on the wisdom of the Creator we have already had frequent opportunities of remarking, when contemplating particular parts of his works; and, with respect to man, considered as a moral agent, a number of observations relating to this attribute of Deity will present themselves in a subsequent part of the Treatise.

CHAPTER IV.

OF THE GOODNESS OF DEITY.

THE same observations which prove the wisdom of Deity, may, in general, be adduced as evidences of goodness; for if the end to be accomplished promote the happiness of sentient beings, then every display of wisdom in the accomplishment of that end is a demonstration of benevolence; and, in most instances, the same facts which demonstrate wisdom, prove benevolence also. In order to prove malevolence, or even the absence of goodness, it would be necessary to show that the life of the individual is a state of misery, or utterly destitute of enjoyment, and that the preservation of that life, and the continuation of the species, are merely a prolongation of suffering, or of insipid existence. It would be necessary to prove this, not in a few insulated cases only, but to show that it predominates in the system of nature. A proof of this kind no person in the right use of reason will attempt.

Dr. Paley rests the proof of the Divine goodness on the two following propositions:

1st, "That in a vast plurality of instances in which contrivance is perceivable, the design of the contrivance is beneficial."

2d, "That the Deity has superadded pleasure to animal sensations, beyond what was necessary for any other purpose; or when the purpose, so far as it was necessary, might have been effected by the operation of pain."

Both of these propositions can be clearly established; and the establishment of them proves the goodness of Deity. I shall therefore make a few observations in illustration of them.

1st, "In a vast plurality of instances, in which contrivance is perceived, the design of the contrivance is beneficial." This proposition I am inclined to render more general than it is stated by Dr. Paley. For in animated nature, which is the region where goodness is felt and enjoyed, I know of no instance of contrivance which is not beneficial to the being which is the object of that contrivance. The benefit of the contrivance is indeed more obvious in some cases than in others; in most cases, I believe, it may be perceived; and in no instance can it be shown to be injurious. It is obvious in most of the organs of sense; and all the organs of sense are undeniably beneficial. Are not the articulations of the bones beneficial! Is not the configuration of the alimentary and intestinal canal beneficial! Are not the hoof of the horse, and the paw of the lion beneficial? Take any animal, and in attending to the whole, or to any part of its organization, you will find it adapted to the manners and circumstances of the animal and conducive to its existence, security, and happiness. Consider the vast variety of sentient beings, as well as the various contrivances in their structure, and when you reflect that all these are conducive to their welfare, you must be astonished at the comprehensive beneficence of the Creator.

The goodness of Deity is manifested in the liberal provision made for the subsistence of every living creature. There is a relation, strongly expressive of benignity, between animated and inanimated nature; for the earth produces a sufficiency for the subsistence of all the living beings upon it; and in life all animals seem to have enjoyment. The heart of him who sympathizes with the inferior creatures in their pleasures, will often be delighted on contemplating their felicity, and will feel its own happiness increased by witnessing their enjoyments. If we turn to mankind, they also enjoy much felicity. Even after all the evils that we bring upon ourselves by the abuse of our free agency, we are oftener in health than in sickness, oftener in joy than in sorrow. That there are sorrows and pains is evident; but in human life they do not preponderate. They will engage our attention in a subsequent part of the work.

2d, "The Deity has superadded pleasure to animal sensations, beyond what was necessary for any other purpose; or where the purpose, so far as it was necessary, might have been effected by the operation of pain."

If it be the will of the Supreme being that sentient creatures shall exist, he must endow them with the means and capacities requisite to the continuation of their existence. But those means might answer the end, without contributing in any degree, to the happiness of the animal. They might demonstrate power and wisdom, and yet be no proof of goodness. For instance, food is necessary to the support of animal life; every animal, therefore, must be provided with the means of taking in food; and if these means be well adapted to the end, they certainly demonstrate wisdom. But the act of eating might be attended with no pleasure: nay, it might be attended with positive pain; and the animal might be prompted to it merely by the desire of removing a greater pain by submitting to a less. If there be enjoyment in taking in food, which is certainly the case with all animals, then this is a demonstration of goodness in the Creator; for it shows that he has superadded pleasure beyond what was necessary for the accomplishment of the purpose.

The organs of sense were either necessary to the existence of the animal, or they were not necessary; but in either case they prove goodness in the Deity. For if we consider them as necessary, still they might have performed their office without communicating any positive pleasure; but, in fact, they are all sources of enjoyment to the creature, and consequently proofs of goodness in the Creator. If we consider them as not necessary, the proof of goodness is, at least, not weakened. For, in this case, they must have been bestowed merely as inlets to happiness, and are marks of gratuitous goodness. If we glance at the organs of sense, however, we will find them not only useful, but also sources of pleasure. What a variety of enjoyments do we obtain by means of the eye! That it is a large inlet of felicity, no person in the right use of reason will deny. But if the Deity had been a malevolent being, this organ might have been the occasion of incredible infelicity and pain. In a diseased state, it sometimes cannot bear the light. Unless the Deity had been benevolent, the eye, even in its natural state, might have been as much or more irritated by the action of light, than it presently is even when diseased. Compare, then, the difference between a sound and a diseased eye; consider that the latter might have been the natural state of the organ, and certainly you will acknowledge the goodness of Deity.

Our minds are so constituted, that we receive pleasure from the sight of many objects in nature: they might, however, have been so constituted that the sight of those objects would have been a source of perpetual irritation and pain. The verdure of the earth, which is so grateful to the eye, and the variegated landscape, the mountain and the wood, the valley and the stream, so exhilarating to the mind, might have produced a contrary effect, and might have weighed as much in the scale of pain, as they now do that of pleasure. What is true with respect to the eye, also holds of the other organs of sense. The ear is a source of much enjoyment. Music yields high gratification, and often sooths and cheers the mind under the anxieties by which it is assailed. But the ear might have been otherwise constituted. It might have been so formed, that the gentlest whisper would have acted as powerfully upon it as a peal of thunder now does; and that the most melodious note would have been as grating as a piercing scream. How much more felicitous is our present condition, than what it could have possibly been in such circumstances!

The sense of smelling, also, not only contributes to our security, but greatly promotes our happiness. How exhilarating is the breeze impregnated with fragrant odours! how sweet the scent of the fields after a gentle summer shower! If the Deity had not been benevolent, we might have been so constituted that every object around us would have affected our olfactory nerves as disagreeably as asafœtida, or even the intolerable stench of the zurilla. Taste, likewise is a source of much pleasure. But if a malevolent being had been the author of our existence, everything might have been made to taste like gall and wormwood. Feeling, also, might have been the cause of great suffering; for everything we touched might have irritated like a nettle; but at present it is the source of much pleasant sensation. All our senses are wisely and beneficently accommodated to our nature and circumstances, and so formed as both to contribute to our security and to promote our happiness. When we enjoy health and the approbation of our moral nature, how cheerful and happy do we feel! Notwithstanding the murmurings of the querimonious satirist, or the complaints of the discontented philosopher, man really is, or may be a happy being. Nature around him wears the aspect of placid satisfaction, exhibits cheering scenes of active enjoyment, and utters the gladdening note of felicity.

The goodness of Deity appears not only in the general structure of our body, and in the formation of the different organs of sense, but also in that constitution of animated beings in which there is an effort to heal wounds and expel disease. The slightest bruise might have festered, and, like the breaking out of waters, might have increased till it demolished the organized fabric. But nature makes a healing effort, and often wonderfully succeeds. This, however, is not all. Medicinal substances are provided in the mineral, vegetable, and animal kingdoms, of which man may avail himself to aid the efforts of his constitution in healing wounds and curing diseases. Here, as in every department of nature, we meet with an order of things fitted to awaken the curiosity, invite the research, reward the ingenuity, and increase the happiness of man.

The goodness of Deity has provided means not only for healing wounds and curing diseases, but also for aiding our organs of sense under the infirmities of nature and the decays of age. The eye, for instance, is a beautiful and useful, but delicate organ. It is liable to infirmity and decay; but spectacles may be made to assist the sight under almost every configuration of the eye, and in every period of life. Similar remarks may be applied to the ear; and the eye and the ear are two great inlets of pleasure. An observation of the same kind may be extended to our bodily diseases. The malignity of the small-pox was greatly mitigated by inoculation, and appears to be still farther subdued by vaccination. These remarks show wisdom and goodness plainly engraven on the face of nature; for those attributes evidently predominate, so far as our observations extend. But before we are able to explain all the phenomena, and to answer objections, we must have some conception of the plan of Deity, particularly in reference to man, who is unquestionably the chief living being on this earth. He stands at the head of the animal creation on our globe, and the scheme of government which he is under must, to a certain extent, affect the destiny of the inferior creatures. The uniformity of the system requires that, in so far as they share a common nature with man, they shall be under the operation of common laws.

In forming an estimate of the perfections of God from his works and government, we must attentively consider the end he has in view. To form some imaginary scheme of our own, and to pretend by that scheme to measure the Divine perfections as exhibited in the conduct of a very different plan, is altogether absurd. We must take the plan of God, as it may be fairly collected from the established system of things; and if that plan and the means employed for carrying it on be compatible with wisdom and goodness, then all objections against the Divine perfections, arising from some imaginary plan of our own, are nugatory. I shall, therefore, in the following chapter, attend to the character and state of man, which will lead to observations on the design and government of the Deity respecting him.

CHAPTER V.

OF THE CHARACTER AND STATE OF MAN.

MAN is the lord of this world, and he is honourably distinguished from its other inhabitants by peculiar qualities. In considering his character and state, we observe that he is a rational and immortal being; that at present he is in a state of trial and discipline, under a system of moral government; and that his improvement and happiness are carried on and promoted by the exercise of his faculties. To each of these we shall for a little attend; and a careful contemplation of the phenomena will enable us to discover and understand the plan of God respecting him.

1. Man is a rational being. While the inferior animals are under the guidance of instinct, he is endued with nobler principles. Besides appetites, which he has in common with the brutes, he is dignified with intellectual, active, and moral powers, which they do not possess. Reason, memory, and imagination; desires, affections, and a moral faculty, are wonderfully combined in his nature, and form a singular and interesting being. He can observe, compare, and judge: he can vary his means, and suit his operations to the circumstances in which he is placed. He can turn in upon himself and trace the operations of his own mind. He can survey the vast system of the universe; discover the laws by which it is governed; and learn the attributes of the Creator and Governor from the works of his hand. He can surround himself by a new creation, and combine in endless variety the objects with which he is acquainted. He remembers the past; and the lessons of experience not only furnish him with instructions for the regulation of his present conduct, but also enable him to anticipate what he may expect from the future. He hopes and he fears; he loves, and desires, and pursues; he dreads and he shuns. His moral faculty indicates the path of duty, and it applauds or condemns. His intellectual, active, and moral powers are finely adjusted to each other, and form a being capable of much present enjoyment, and of vast improvement in intellectual and moral excellence. How absurd is it to allege that undesigning chance produced such an intelligent and contriving being as man!

2. Man is immortal. The Creator has not constituted him an ephemeral being. He is destined to inherit eternity. And we are not driven to a future state in order to find a remedy against present disorders. The conclusion naturally results from a fair and candid consideration of the phenomena.

First, Our bodily fabric dies and is dissolved; but an opinion in favour of the immortality of the soul has almost universally prevailed in every age, and in every nation, among all ranks of men, and in every stage of society. It is not the badge of a sect, but the creed of man. We may find him without arts and without laws; but the sentiment of immortality seems everywhere, and in every period, to have been entertained. The mind is impressed with an involuntary presage of existence; and although the notion of a future state has been differently modified, according to the different circumstances of those who have believed it, still the same general notion has prevailed. On this subject, the joint opinion of mankind, respecting a matter of common interest, is the voice of their nature proceeding from the universal Parent, intimating to his children the happiness which they are formed to enjoy, and the dignity and perfection which they are capable of attaining.

Secondly, The doctrine of immortality, the grand problem respecting the nature of man, is attended with the same difficulty as the being of God, and arising from the same cause; the invisibility of the immortal principle. We are so much accustomed to bring everything to the test of our bodily senses, and to be guided by their evidence, that we are disposed to withhold belief in cases where they are incapable of giving testimony. This, I believe, is a chief source of scepticism, both with respect to the being of God and the immortality of man. Some think that all the operations of mind are the result of corporeal organization, and hence they infer that mind must perish on the dissolution of the organized fabric. Our knowledge, however, is by far too limited to encourage us to lay much stress upon this inference, even although the premises from which it is deduced were correct. "I do not see," says Dr. Paley, "that any impracticability need be apprehended by these; or that the change, even upon their hypothesis, is far removed from the analogy of some other operations which we know with certainty that the Deity is carrying on."[] [] Paley's Natural Theology, p. 591.

For anything we know, matter, under all its modifications and combinations, is incapable of intellectual operations. If the case should be otherwise, who can for a moment doubt the ability of HIM who could attach thought and volition to matter, to continue those faculties under different organical modifications. If the being of God be proved, the existence of invisible mind is proved; and the various and wonderful combinations in the universe may lead us reasonably to think that somewhere in the scale of being, matter and mind shall be united. It has been correctly observed, that our notions both of body and mind are merely relative; that we can define the former only by the qualities perceived by our senses, and the latter by the operations of which we are conscious, and therefore the immateriality of mind is involved in the only conceptions of matter and mind that we are capable of forming.*

The doctrine of immortality, how wonderful soever it may seem, is not more amazing than many facts presented to our daily observation. Man, at the hour of his birth, undergoes a mighty change in the means of his subsistence and mode of his being; and were he capable of anticipating that change, and of reasoning upon it, his life in the world would appear a problem as difficult as immortality does at present. Death may immediately, in the natural course of things, put us into a higher and more enlarged state of life, as our birth does. The one, like the other, may be a continuation and enlargement of powers.† After birth there is a continuation and enlargement of the same material fabric, which was formed before we saw the light. That fabric death dissolves: we have no reason, however, to conclude that death destroys the thinking principle. The vegetable dies, to live no more; but it cannot be fairly pleaded that man falls under the same law. The analogy does not hold; for the vegetable attains the utmost maturity of which it is capable, and it is wholly destitute of that which is the subject of our present consideration; the cogitative substance, the capacity of perfection and action. Now, it is about the continuation of this principle only that we are at present inquiring. Its material means and instruments of perception and action may be destroyed; but, in a future state, it may have organs of perception and means of communication, of which at present we can form no idea.

Thirdly, Organized bodies may be dissolved, and the forms and combinations of material substances altered. By these alterations, the qualities as well as the form of bodies may be changed. Our bodies are in a state of unceasing mutation; and these mutations, in many instances, greatly influence our corporeal qualities; but the consciousness of identity is in no degree affected by those continual changes. Hence, as well as by the only conception which we are capable of forming of mind, we are led to infer that the thinking principle is a simple and immaterial substance; and if it be so, the dissolution of the body by no means involves the extinction of that principle. It may continue to exist, to think, and to will, after the material tabernacle in which it is at present lodged shall be laid in ruins. Indeed, it must exist as a thinking principle, unless it be annihilated; for it cannot perish by alteration of form or dissolution of parts, and that it will be annihilated we have no reason to suspect. From the will in Deity to create, we may infer the design to preserve; and of annihilation we have no instances in the material world. Forms are changed; but substances remain, merely passing into new combinations. A simple and immaterial substance, however, is not subject to a process of this kind. While it exists, it must exist with properties unchanged. The removal of its material instruments cannot alter its essential qualities. But still, like every other created being, the continuance of its existence depends on the will of the Creator.

Fourthly, Creation bears testimony to the wisdom and goodness of the Creator. All his plans are wisely contrived and executed; and we see nothing like a system of abortion in his works. All orders of organized beings seem to reach the utmost perfection of which their constitution admits, and to enjoy all the happiness of which they are capable. This is equally true of the plant and of the animal; and we have no cause to suspect that man is an exception from the general rule. He is endued with faculties capable of high progressive improvement; and we have no reason to think that, in this world, he attains to all the perfection of which his nature is susceptible, or that his powers of progressive excellence, either moral or intellectual, are exhausted. We not unreasonably presume, then, that he is destined to survive the stroke of death, and continue his progress in improvement in a more advanced stage of existence.

We do not here assume the wisdom and goodness of Deity to prove the immortality of the soul, in order that by the doctrine of immortality we may obviate objections against the Divine attributes. No: We merely contend, that in so far as wisdom and goodness appear in the other parts of nature, they are exercised towards man. If they be so exercised towards him, he must reach all that perfection, and enjoy all that happiness, of which he is susceptible; for this seems a law which pervades the system of sentient being, and we have no evidence that man is an exception from it. Accordingly, he must make all that progress in excellence of which his nature is capable; but we think that his capacity of improvement is not exhausted in this world; and, therefore, we look for another where all his faculties will be fully expanded and attain maturity.

Can we suppose that a creature endued with such noble faculties, and capable of such progressive improvement, shall, at once and for ever, be arrested in his progress towards perfection? Has the Deity bestowed upon him powers capable of grand advances in excellence, and shall he stop him in his glorious career, blast his hopes, and destroy the fruit of all his toils? Has he inspired him with the sentiment of immortality, merely to disappoint him? With all his lofty capacities, attainments, and anticipations, is man merely an ephemeral being? Must his labours and his hopes perish in the dust? Must all the splendour of his moral and intellectual nature vanish, like the meteor which gleams for a moment, and is extinguished for ever? Are all the intimations of his nature, and of the world around him, mere delusions? These things cannot be so. The phenomena of the universe justify no such suppositions. Everything conspires to intimate a different result. The sentiments of humanity, and the perfections of God, as engraven on his works, bear testimony to the immortality of man. The faculties which have budded here shall blossom hereafter: the course of improvement begun in time shall be continued in eternity. How far his faculties may yet expand, to what degrees of excellence he may yet attain, and with what dignity he may yet appear among the rational offspring of the Supreme Intelligence, no language can express or imagination conceive. O my soul, still cherish, fondly cherish, the sublime hope of immortality! While the dark and cheerless infidel looks to the grave as terminating his existence, like a river drunk up by the sand of the wilderness, still fix thine eye on the ocean of eternity! Remember the grandeur of thy prospects, the loftiness of thy hopes, and study to think and act as it becomes a being who shall yet associate with the highest created intelligences in the universe, be engaged in the most exalted employments, and stand near the throne of the mighty Sovereign of Nature!

On this subject, I have merely glanced at the phenomena of nature and the sentiments of humanity; and I contend for the truth which they seem to establish. If the evidence of the immortality of the soul be not so clear and decisive as some might desire, it may be remarked, that a certain degree of obscurity is not unsuitable to a system of moral agency, where we are called upon to act on probable and reasonable grounds, without expecting such a degree of evidence as will irresistibly force conviction: for if we suppose conviction to be irresistible, and also that such conviction irresistibly regulates conduct, what is this but necessity? But that man either is, or ought to be, a necessary agent, cannot for a moment be admitted.

Farther, the degree of evidence on this subject is sufficient to influence human conduct; for it appears probable, at least, that man shall exist in a future state of being, and that his condition in that state shall be determined by his dispositions and conduct here. What in such circumstances is the dictate of sound wisdom? It surely is, to live as if we were certain of a future state of existence, for by pursuing this course we cannot possibly be losers. If there be a future state, then, we shall gain all the advantages resulting from our wise conduct: if there be no future state we lose nothing. Nay, we are gainers; for the dispositions to be cultivated, and the conduct to be pursued, in the view of a future retribution, are such as ensure the greatest share of happiness in a present world. On the other hand, if any, because the evidence of immortality is not so clear and cogent as they could wish, shall live in the total disregard of a state of future retribution, then, if such a state actually awaits them, is there not great danger of their having committed an irreparable error, and of having subjected themselves to a dreadful, perhaps irretrievable loss?

† Butler's Analogy, chap. i.

II. Man is at present in a state of trial and discipline, under a system of moral government; and to fit him for this state he is constituted a free agent. He is endued with intellectual and active powers: he has judgment to know the meaning of a commandment, and ability to obey it. By "moral government" we understand the establishment and operation of laws for the direction of rational beings, and the enforcing those laws by rewards and punishments. The subject of such a government must be a free agent.

1. By the liberty of a moral agent we understand a power over the determinations of his own will; and we call man a free agent in the same way, and with the same limitations, as we pronounce him a rational being. Every man has a conviction that he is free, and acts towards others in the persuasion that they also are free. Our deliberations, purposes, and promises, all suppose liberty in ourselves; and our advices, exhortations, and commands, suppose it in others. That man is a free agent appears to me indubitable. On this subject philosophers may talk, but consciousness and experience decide. I am conscious of freedom. I can weigh motives and desires. I can judge which are most consonant to sound reason and to my best interest; and yet can decline regulating my conduct by them. I can choose and refuse. I can act agreeably to the convictions of my understanding, or I can pursue a different course. Advice and exhortation may influence conduct, but they do not impair liberty. The same is the case with motives; they may prompt to action, but they do not act. A necessary agent, whose actions are as irresistibly determined by desires or motives as a stone in falling to the ground is by the great law of gravitation, cannot be the subject of moral government. He is incapable of virtue or vice, and unfit for reward or punishment.

> "Not free, what proof could they have giv'n sincere
> Of true allegiance, constant faith, or love,
> Where only what they needs must do appear'd,
> Not what they would? What praise could they receive?
> What pleasure I from such obedience paid,
> When will and reason (reason also is choice,)
> Useless and vain, of freedom both despoil'd,
> Made passive both, had served necessity,
> Not me?"[*]

Necessary agency and moral government are altogether incompatible. The one of them naturally excludes the other. Every encroachment on free agency implies a corresponding limitation of moral government. A necessary agent can neither be praised nor blamed. Resembling a magnet traversing on its pivot, and turning towards the polar points, his will has no part in the determination of his actions. Such a being cannot, any more than the magnet, be the subject of reward or punishment. The determination of the will is the first part of the action, on which alone its moral value depends. Unless man be a free agent, there can be no more moral worth in any part of his conduct than in the beautiful colouring of a fly's wing, in the melody of a thrush's note, or in the neat construction of a chaffinch's nest. Moral government implies free agency.

2. Man is not only a free agent, but also an accountable creature. He is the subject of a moral government.

Some ancient philosophers, although they professed to believe in the being of God, yet taught that he gave himself no concern whatever about the affairs of this lower world. They represented him as enjoying a state of listless tranquillity and indolent repose above the clouds; inattentive to the actions, and careless of the destiny, of men. This monstrous doctrine was a proper sequel to the irrational creed, that the world had been formed, nor by the power and wisdom of Deity, but by a fortuitous concourse of atoms. In order to the belief that God took no notice of the affairs of the world, it was necessary first to exclude him from any concern in its formation; for if they had admitted that all things were made by him, it would not have been easy to have proved that he had divested himself of all regard to the works of his hand, and, like an unnatural parent, had ceased to think of them, to love, and to protect them. But sound reason, contemplating all the phenomena, rejects as absurdities the dogmas of the Epicurean school; and pronounces that the Deity exercises not only a providential care over all his works, but also a moral government over man.

The providential care of the Almighty is evident in the preservation of the established order of things, so that an adequate provision is made for supplying the wants, and administering to the enjoyments, of sentient beings. He more particularly exercises the right of an equitable sovereign over his rational offspring. His will is to them a law, and this law harmonizes with the system of nature in proclaiming the benevolence of Deity, by promoting the happiness of man. The law is not the arbitrary and capricious volition of an Omniponent Ruler. It emanates from wisdom and benignity, and is directed towards the general good, in a consistency with all the attributes of the Creator. The great principle of the law is utility; or, in other words, what the Deity, in his boundless wisdom, saw would be best, not merely for one or a few individuals, but for all; best for all, if all were to obey it.

The law is intimated to us by reason and the moral faculty, and the course of nature countenances and supports it. Reason, pondering all the phenomena, instructs us to revere the Deity; to exercise justice, candour, and mercy towards our fellow men; and to cherish temperance, fortitude, and diligence in our several avocations. But for the discovery of the great outlines of the will of God and duty of man, we are not left to the exercise of reason alone. Conscience, or the moral faculty, comes in to the aid of reason: and by reason and conscience all men perceive the great features of moral law.[*] Accordingly, there are certain dispositions and actions which have been always applauded or commended, and others which, as generally, have been the subjects of censure or detestation. All men approve of piety, benevolence, integrity, veracity, temperance, fortitude, industry: all men disapprove of contrary dispositions and conduct. Reason and the moral faculty may be perverted. This perversion, however, results from the abuse of free agency; and for it mankind have themselves to blame. Man is a free agent; but his body, his mind, and nature around him, are so constituted, that if he exercise his freedom in an irregular and capricious manner, in defiance of the dictates of reason and conscience, he must suffer a corresponding loss of happiness, or degree of pain.

3. Man, even in his present state, is happy or unhappy, rewarded or punished, as he obeys or disobeys the law. This is a demonstration of a moral government.

That the virtuous person, or he who performs his duty by obeying the will of God, enjoys much happiness; and that the vicious person, or he who lives in the habitual violation of the law intimated to him by reason and conscience, is subject to much infelicity, are truths so obvious, that they have not escaped observation in any age. All men, indeed, suffer a greater or less degree of uneasiness and pain: but the virtuous man experiences far less than the vicious. The first tastes all those joys which the moral constitution of his nature imparts: the last not only loses those joys, but suffers the miseries flowing from a disapproving mind.

There are sources of pleasure and pain common to us with the inferior animals, and consequently independent on moral conduct. Active exertion, animal gratification, worldly success, and the contemplation of some kinds of excellence, yield enjoyment both to good and bad men. Although the Deity has demonstrated his goodness by multiplying the sources of felicity, yet the purest and most constant stream flows into the bosom of the virtuous person. He who obeys the will of God has the fairest prospect of enjoying bodily health. If two persons, with constitutions equally sound, enter together on the career of life, and if one of them pursue a moral and the other an immoral course, it will appear, at no distant period, that moral conduct has the advantage in point of bodily health. The virtuous man also enjoys most peace of mind; and this peace of mind contributes in no small degree to health of body.

We are so constituted that reason and conscience not only indicate the will of God and the path of duty, but encourage and applaud us when we follow their direction, and disapprove and censure us when we pursue a contrary course. The good man, feeling the favour of God in the approbation of his own mind, looks forward with a humble and cheerful confidence to the future. There is no load on his breast, and he dreads no evil. But the bad man is often uneasy: he is haunted by remorse, and depressed and agitated by gloomy and painful anticipations. How soothing are the accents of an approving mind! What a sweet serenity, what a delightful complacency do they diffuse over the soul! On the other hand, the condemnation of reason and conscience is bitter as gall and wormwood. Under their censure and reproof we feel restless, mortified, and unhappy; and against the chidings of those internal monitors no bad man can at all times fortify himself. They are perpetual spies on his thoughts and actions, and their bitter reproaches will be as thorns in his pillow. No external circumstances can rob the good man of the exalted enjoyment flowing from the approbation of his own mind.

[*] Paradise Lost, book iii. line 103.

[*] By reason I understand the faculty by which we judge between truth and error, and combine means for the attainment of ends: by conscience, that by which we distinguish between right and wrong.

Obedience to the will of God is the surest way to obtain a competent portion of the good things of the world; for he who regulates his conduct by the law is temperate and industrious, diligent in gaining and moderate in spending, and thus likely to enjoy a competency. I see no superstition in believing that the righteous Governor of the Universe, looking down with an eye of complacency on his dutiful children, may graciously crown their exertions with much success.

The good person also enjoys the esteem and affection of his fellow men. Look at two characters; the one is pious, upright, humane, temperate, and industrious; the other is irreligious, unjust, malignant, treacherous, indolent, and debauched. Which of these two would you choose for your friend? To which of them would you commit a trust? All men instantly, and with one voice, give the preference to the virtuous character. They esteem him; they love him; they wish him well. But the vicious person is the object of their contempt or detestation. Now, health of body, peace of mind, a competency of the good things of the world, and the esteem of mankind, are rewards which the righteous sovereign, in the ordinary course of his government, bestows upon his obedient subjects. A diseased body, an unhappy mind, poverty, and contempt, are punishments inflicted on the disobedient. It is obvious that the natural course of things tends to the production of these effects; and if it be so, we are entitled to affirm, that the system of nature gives a sanction to the laws of the sovereign, and that a moral government is now carrying on. The instances in which such effects are not produced are exceedingly rare; and at these exceptions we need neither be surprised nor offended, in a vast scheme of free agency going on under the operation of general laws. Such conceptions are perfectly compatible with a state of trial and discipline, in which all our powers of body and mind must be improved and strengthened by exercise.

4. Exercise and trial are powerful means of improvement and sources of happiness; and a future retribution awaits us.

Man, as we have already seen, is a moral agent; and, generally speaking, he is happy or unhappy, as he obeys or disobeys the law intimated to him by reason and conscience. He is at present in a state of probation and discipline, under the eye of his Sovereign and Judge; and his improvement is carried on, and his happiness promoted by exercise and trial. We come into the world feeble in body and in mind, but with the seeds of improvement in both; and these seeds grow according to the cultivation they receive from exercise. The body grows in stature and in strength, and the mind gradually expands. But exercise is requisite to the developement both of our corporeal and mental capacities. In the course of years, indeed, the body grows; but without exercise it is lumpish, feeble, and inactive; and the mind, wholly undisciplined, remains in a weak and infantile state. That exercise which is requisite in order to bodily health and vigour, and to the evolution of our intellectual and moral powers, is not only the chief means of our improvement, but also the main source of our happiness. Without exercise of body and of mind there can be no enjoyment.

The constitution of nature and the government of the Creator, are such as to call forth our bodily exertions, and to solicit and encourage the exercise of our intellectual and moral capacities. We are placed in circumstances calculated to awaken our faculties, to rouse activity, and to stimulate exertion. And man, when his powers are fully brought into action, can both do and suffer beyond what he would have previously imagined. He can pass triumphantly through scenes which, in anticipation, he would have thought overwhelming. Under these trials, if he act wisely, he makes the most rapid progress in improvement, and the retrospect yields him the most exalted enjoyment.

In all our conceptions, exertion is connected with success and renown. A triumph without an enemy combated and a victory won; a prize where no course is marked out, and no competitor starts with us in the race, are notions which do not find a ready admission into our minds. Such is our constitution, that, according to our usual train of thinking, where there is no exertion there can be neither honour nor reward. Progress in moral and intellectual excellence is our duty, our honour, and our interest. To be stationary or retrograde is disgraceful. In the progress of improvement, the present life soon comes to a close; but we are immortal beings, and we have reason to think that there is an intimate connexion between the present and the future. The whole of the Divine government, as exhibited in the course of nature, manifests a regard to piety, integrity, and sobriety; and an opposition to vice. The probability certainly is, that the great scheme, which is evidently going on at present, will be continued in a future state of being; and that they who have done their duty here, by employing their faculties and the talents entrusted to their care in conformity to the will of the Creator, and who have passed through their various trials with improvement, will, after death, enter on a nobler stage of existence, where they will still pursue the course of excellence; while they who have disregarded the intimations of reason and conscience, will suffer a corresponding loss.

CHAPTER VI.

EVIL IN THE WORLD.

From our inquiries in the foregoing part of this treatise, it appears that there is a Being all powerful, wise, and good, by whom everything exists. The existence of this Being is demonstrated by every part of the universe which we are capable of observing; for, throughout the immense field that lies within the limits of the telescope on the one hand, and of the microscope on the other, we everywhere meet with manifestations of contrivance, with mutual adaptations, and reciprocal dependencies; and by the constitution of our nature we are induced and constrained to believe in the existence of a designing and contriving mind, an essence in which perceptions meet, and from which volitions flow. It is obvious, that to this contriving mind we must attribute power, wisdom, and goodness, in the degree at least necessary for constructing and carrying on the great system of the universe; and we have seen that the manifestation of those perfections pervades the whole scheme of nature.

But do all appearances in the natural and moral world exactly correspond with this representation? Does everything throughout the universe obviously harmonize with the belief of a God all powerful, wise, and good? Are there no difficulties, no apparent inconsistencies, either in the natural or moral world? To such inquiries we may answer in general, that, in a syctem which we do not fully understand, it were unreasonable to expect that in every instance we should be able to give an explanation admitting of no doubt and of no reply.

From the phenomena of nature it clearly appears that the Deity is immeasurably exalted above us. We inhabit a small province in his boundless empire, forming perhaps a link in a mighty chain of intelligent being under him, and ought not to consider ourselves as a detached fragment of his works, but as a harmonious part of one great whole. His plan no doubt embraces the whole destiny of our race, from the beginning to the end of the world. The administration of such a scheme is too comprehensive to be understood by us in all its extent; and certain and perfect knowledge is by no means necessary to a moral agent. It is enough if we have such information as shall lay a rational foundation for the regulation of our conduct, for encouraging our hopes, awakening our ambition, and quickening our diligence. There is nothing unreasonable in supposing that there are higher created intelligencies than we: they no doubt know more than we do; but it is likely that their knowledge of the universe and of the Divine government is by no means perfect, and that the Author of the system is the only being who fully comprehends every part of it.

Difficulties which we are unable fully to solve may occur; but these difficulties, it is reasonable to think, arise solely from our ignorance and incapacity, and not from any imperfection in the works or government of God. Accordingly, the difficulties will appear more numerous or more formidable to some persons than to others. They will vanish in proportion as the light of knowledge increases, in the same way that darkness disappears before the rising sun. Being of a higher order, of greater capacity, and more extensive knowledge than man, probably meet with fewer difficulties in the works and government of God than we do, and perhaps not in the same instances. To a well-informed person, of a sound understanding, many things may appear plain and orderly, that seem dark and inconsistent to one of less knowledge and sagacity. In the progress of knowledge, those things which seem inexplicable to one generation may be well understood by another. We know more than they of past ages did; but still there are many things of which we are ignorant, and many things, perhaps, of which man will always remain ignorant. Of the cause of gravitation we know nothing. Why the magnet attracts iron, and when allowed to move freely turns itself towards the polar points, and why poles of the same name repel each other, we do not understand. Many things relating to electricity have hitherto escaped our research, and the operations of this substance on the great scale of nature we can neither fully estimate nor explain. Our knowledge of the works of the Creator is limited and partial, and that of his ways is not more perfect.

Even in these circumstances, however, we hold it to be a rational and edifying exercise to inquire into the attributes of Deity as manifested in his works and government; but our investigations ought to be conducted with reverence, and under a sense of the immeasurable distance between God and man. Many of the objections which have been urged against the wisdom and goodness of the Creator we can fully and fairly answer, and of others we can give a probable solution: but wisdom and goodness appear in so many instances, that it is not unreasonable to believe in their existence even when we are unable to trace them. What we purpose to say farther on this subject will be arranged under the heads of Evils of Imperfection, Moral Evil, and Natural Evil. The first of these will not detain us long; but on the two last we intend to dwell at greater length.

I. EVILS OF IMPERFECTION.

Why was not man made so tall as to be capable of wading the ocean? Why has he not the strength of the elephant, and the piercing eye of the eagle? Why are not his intellectual faculties more powerful, so that his perceptions of truth might be more clear, and his conduct more regular? That the objections involved in such questions are absurd, can, I think, be plainly shown. This class of objections, in reality, precludes all gradation of being, for they may be urged against the existence of every creature. Why was not every clod of earth made a sentient being? Why was not every sentient being endued with reason? Why was not every rational nature adorned with all the attributes of Deity? Such is the extent of the objection, and its extent proves its absurdity; for absurd must every objection be which still remains in full force, what changes soever we suppose introduced in consistency with the notion of a Creator and creatures, of a Sovereign and subjects.

If it be alleged that this is straining the objection, which is meant to be applied to beings in certain circumstances only, then let the objector give a clear and consistent account of these circumstances. Let him determine the point beneath which sentient existence ought never to descend. Does he fix it at reason? Man possesses that faculty and to his nature on that point no objection can be made. A gradation of creatures is unquestionably consistent with wisdom and goodness in the Deity; for, if a good objection lies against creatures occupying any one place in the scale, a similar objection may be urged against those occupying any other place in it. Is the capacity of happiness reckoned essential to sentient existence? It is evident that animals, under the guidance of instinct merely, are susceptible of much enjoyment. And do not irrational creatures, while enjoying much happiness themselves, contribute to the comfort and felicity of rational beings? This, I apprehend, cannot be denied. Unorganized matter nourishes vegetables. Vegetables feed many sentient beings. Vegetables and irrational animals support rational natures. In the gradation, the inferior ministers to the sustenance, improvement, or happiness of the superior parts. This process reaches as far as our observation extends. While the inferior are thus related to the superior parts in the scale, every class of sentient beings enjoys happiness in its own sphere.

The question is not whether we can conceive man to have been made a nobler being than he is. I perceive nothing unreasonable in believing that, in the multitude of worlds with which the universe is replenished, there are many creatures vastly superior to the human race. But the inquiry is, whether the constitution and circumstances of man, such as they are, be compatible with the existence of an all-powerful, wise, and good Being, the Creator and Governor of the universe. The discussion of this subject leads to the consideration of moral and natural evil, from which the most important difficulties respecting the perfections and government of God arise. Before entering upon these topics, we shall here state some facts or principles, which, although they have been already mentioned more or less diffusely, may be here repeated, in order that they may be more distinctly remembered.

1. Man is a free agent. If the Deity be possessed of all moral perfections, it must be agreeable to his nature to exercise a moral government. But the subjects of a moral government must be free agents; for a necessary agent is a mere machine, and is as unfit for being the subject of a moral government as a steam engine or a windmill. Now, if it be consistent with wisdom and goodness to create free agents and to place them under a moral government, then the consequences of free agency and moral government cannot be pleaded as objections against those attributes.

2. We are so constituted that our improvement and happiness are carried on and promoted by exercise, discipline, and trial. On this fact, however, I shall not at present dwell; for it has been already stated, and will be farther illustrated in a subsequent part of the treatise.

These are unquestionably two great principles in the human constitution, and unless it can be shown that they are inconsistent with wisdom and goodness in the Deity, all objections against those attributes must be dissipated like smoke before the wind. The first of these principles accounts for the moral evil in the world; and the second throws light on the natural evils to which we are exposed, in cases which remain unexplained by the first.

In the course of this discussion, it must still be remembered that we are not to conceive of the Diety as a being of blind and indiscriminating benevolence, but as possessing all possible excellencies in the highest degree, and in a state of harmonious combination. He is not good only, but wise, and just, and faithful, and holy; and all those attributes act consistently with each other. We are also to remember that the evils in the world are comparatively rare and partial occurrences, spread over a large surface; sufficient to stimulate activity and encourage virtue, but, unless prodigiously increased by the abuse of free agency, are by no means so great or so numerous as to overwhelm our faculties or destroy our happiness. True, indeed, were we to collect all the variety of wickedness, suffering, and distress, from every period of time, and from every place in the world, and to present it in one unmingled assemblage, it would exhibit a fearful aggregate. But this aggregate would not be a picture of human life. It would not be a fair picture of the earth to heap together all the volcanoes, naked rocks, sandy deserts, thorns, and briars, which occur on its surface. It would not be a fair representation of the animal world, to crowd together into one horrid spot all the serpents, and scorpions, and lions, and tigers of the earth. This were to collect in one point, and without mixture, what in nature is spread over a vast surface, and interspersed with large scenes of beauty, and copious sources of enjoyment. It were to represent what is uncommon and extraordinary, as if it were the universal state of the earth, and the common lot of man. It were like describing the sun as a mass of darkness, because black spots are at times discernible on its disk.

The evils that are in the world, in many instances, serve as the seasonings of life. They not only give a relish to its enjoyments, but they also promote the developement of our faculties and the improvement of our virtues. And it is evident that, amidst all the vicissitudes of this chequered scene, man is more commonly in health than in sickness, his countenance is much more frequently enlightened by joy than clouded by sorrow.

II. MORAL EVIL.

The human body is a noble structure, indicating consummate wisdom and great goodness in the Architect; and it is a suitable temple for the residence of the mind. It is a material fabric, and consequently subject to the laws by which the material world is governed.

The mind, whether we contemplate it in a moral or intellectual point of view, is endued with high capacities. The understanding is susceptible of great improvement, and capable of splendid attainments. Complaints, however, against the moral constitution of our nature and the evils thence resulting, have been loud, by those who wish to devolve upon the Author of our being the blame of our own misconduct. But whatever may be the cavils of the querimonious sophist, we are not cast as a wreck upon the moral ocean, without a pilot or a helm. Our Creator has graciously bestowed upon us a moral nature. He has with his own finger written the law of virtue upon our heart. Reason and conscience point out the path of duty and happiness; and they applaud and encourage us when we do well, and disapprove and censure us when we disobey their intimations. When we pursue an upright course, we feel complacency and elevation of soul arising from the approbation of our own mind. When conscience condemns us we stand degraded in our own estimation.

All men commend the good and the virtuous. A pious, benevolent, equitable, industrious, temperate, and prudent person meets with general approbation, while one of a contrary character is as generally blamed. Besides, the constitution of the natural world supports our moral perceptions and judgments, tending to confer bodily health and a competency of the good things of life upon the virtuous man; while, from the moral constitution of our nature, he also enjoys peace of mind, and the respect and good will of his fellow men. It is a law in the natural world that bodies tend towards the centre. It is, in like manner, a law in the moral world that virtue promotes happiness, and that vice is the parent of misery. If we are capable of taking a full and comprehensive survey of the government of the world, in all its bearings and relations, we would perceive that virtue as certainly tends to our welfare, as the fruits of the earth to our physical comfort. According, then, to the moral and natural system of the world, the path of virtue is the road to happiness: the way of vice, how gay soever may be its decorations, conducts to the region of sorrow.

In opposition to what has now been said, it may be alleged than men differ in their moral perceptions and estimates; that what one people reckons blameless or praiseworthy is condemned by another; and that the inhabitants of one country esteem honourable what in a different nation is thought degrading: that the Chinese expose their infants, and Indians knock their aged parents on the head, or leave them to starve in the wilderness; that a Georgian boasts of the number of public executioners that have been in his family, while in Iceland no person can be found to inflict a capital punishment.*

To this we reply, that our moral powers as well as our other faculties may be misled and perverted. They are fitted to each other, and are equally susceptible of improvement or deterioration. Education, fashion, and habit, have a vast influence on our intellectual operations; and exercise a powerful sway over our moral judgments. But this does not disprove the moral constitution of man, nor establish any original difference of moral sentiment among different families of the human race, any more than an artificial difference in the figure of some parts of the body proves a different organization. On viewing the distorted cranium of some tribes of American Indians, or the small feet of the females in the Chinese empire, shall we maintain that nature has assigned no particular shape or size to the human head and feet? Because different nations entertain different opinions concerning the figure of the earth, or the motions of the solar system, shall we argue that reason is essentially different in the inhabitants of different nations, or that the figure of the earth, and the motions of the solar system, are merely ideal, and have no real existence? In like manner, on witnessing a difference of moral sentiment, shall we imagine that the Creator has bestowed no moral nature on man, or that there is an original difference in the moral constitution of human beings? No: both in the one case and in the other the peculiarity is a perversion. It is the triumph of bad education and vicious fashion over the appointment of the Creator. It is a deviation from the common character of the race, and has arisen from some particular combination of circumstances. And were we thoroughly acquainted with the peculiar circumstances of those nations among whom any singular moral perversity prevails, we would likely be able, in those circumstances, to trace the causes of the aberration. False moral judgments need not surprise us more than any other intellectual aberration.

While the law of virtue is engraved on our hearts we are not compelled to obey it. Obedience is encouraged by many powerful motives, but it is not enforced by a mechanical or irresistible impulse. We are free agents; and beings of this description, although formed with an original bias towards rectitude, may abuse their liberty. If it be consistent with the attributes of Deity to create free agents and to exercise a moral government over them, then neither the abuse of free agency nor the consequent suffering constitutes any objection against the Creator: blame attaches to the creature only.

On this subject, nothing comes fairly under discussion but the original constitution of the agent, and the circumstances in which he is placed. Now, the moral faculties of man are well adapted to his condition. They may yield to the temptations by which they are assailed; but are strong enough to repel those temptations, if we choose wisely to exercise them. Where there is no risk of failure, there is no honour in success: if our moral faculties had been so vigorous and active as to impel us in the right path, without any hazard of deviation, there would have been no value in moral rectitude. Such a constitution would not have been adapted to a state where the agents are to rise towards perfection, triumph, and safety, by steady perseverance and vigorous exertion in a scene of discipline, difficulty, and trial.

As free agents may abuse their liberty, so, after moral evil is once introduced, it is continued and fostered by bad education, false maxims, and vicious example. Our Creator has endued us with noble capacities; but the evolution of those capacities and their particular direction are left to ourselves. By persevering discipline we can render the body capable of surprising operations, as is evident in the feats of the juggler, rope-dancer, and tumbler. The mind is still more completely subject to our dominion, and we may stamp upon it what impressions soever we please, almost with as much certainty as the Indian, by compression, gives to the head of his infant the shape which the fashion of his tribe dictates. Whether the moral germ, planted in our mind by the finger of the Creator, shall become a lovely plant, or a crooked and stunted shrub, depends on ourselves. We are empowered to be the architects of our character, and the authors of our destiny.

By education and discipline we can form any particular temper, and give the empire of our mind to what dispositions soever we please. If we propose to ourselves a standard of conduct, we can regulate our actions by it. I do not mean to say that we can instantaneously form our temper and conduct according to a given model; but we can do so by degrees, particularly if the attempt be made in early years. Practice is the parent of habit. We cannot all at once become proficients in any bodily exercise or mechanical art. We cannot on a sudden give our mind the vigour requisite in order to high intellectual attainments, nor at once make ourselves masters of any particular science. But we can do so gradually, by exertion and persevering diligence. In the same way we can form our temper, discipline our affections and passions, and learn to regulate our conduct. If, with the proposed model always present to our imagination, we employ the same vigilant attention and persevering industry, we will be as successful in the one case as in the other. If a whole community combine their efforts in the same way, and emulously press towards the same point, the imitative propensities of our natures will greatly facilitate the process.

Nations are often distinguished by a peculiar character, which may be owing in some measure to external circumstances; but which is formed chiefly by education, fashion, and habit. A Turk and a Greek, born in the same climate, and inhabiting the same country, are very unlike in character. The Turk is grave and silent; the Greek volatile and talkative. Is not this difference entirely owing to education and habit? What a difference is there between the American Indian chanting his death-song and setting the cruelty of his enemies at defiance, and Patkul on the wheel! Is not the sensibility of the Indian as great, and his sufferings as acute as those of any other person in similar circumstances? Education, sentiment, and habit, however, have fortified his mind against the sense of pain, and the fear of death.

That there is some original and inexplicable difference of constitution and temper, as well as of talents, among human beings, may be admitted. But, generally speaking, what is called natural temper is merely, I apprehend, a certain state of mind which indulgence has formed into habit. If we have a bad temper, it is because we have not been duly careful to form a good one. If unworthy passions predominate in our minds, it is because we have cherished them. If our conduct be incorrect, it is because we are not attentive in regulating it. When temper is very bad, all men condemn it. When actions proceed to a certain degree of enormity, human laws punish them. This condemnation and punishment show that, according to the general conviction of mankind, the temper might have been better, and the conduct refrained from; for otherwise, neither blame nor punishment could with propriety follow. It may be pleaded, perhaps, that the passions gain strength sooner than reason, and that the character is in a great measure formed before the understanding is sufficiently matured to take any important part in the operation. But if reason be cherished as much as passion, their growth is more simultaneous than is commonly imagined. At any rate, reason, on attaining maturity, can correct temper, subdue passion, and regulate conduct.

* Tournefort, Voyage au Levant, tom. ii. p. 210. Mackenzie's Travels in Iceland.

Socrates was the most illustrious moral sage of the ancient heathen world. Zopyrus, an eminent physiognomist, on examining the countenance of the philosopher, pronounced him the slave of viscious passions. The friends of Socrates ridiculed the pretended skill of Zopyrus: but the son of Sophroniscus, with that candour and ingenuousness which formed such a prominent feature in his character, acknowledged that in his early disposition he was prone to vice; but that, by obeying the dictates of reason with persevering attention and exertion, he had overcome the worthless propensities which had once predominated in his mind, and given a cast to the lineaments of his countenance. Are we to neglect education, to cherish a bad temper and unworthy affections, to contract bad habits, and to persist in them, and then impute to our Creator the blame of our own misconduct? God has made us free agents; but at the same time he has endued us with reason and conscience for the government of our hearts and lives, so that the blame is entirely our own if we abandon the path of rectitude.

Besides, our Creator does not permit us to disobey the voice of reason and of conscience with impunity. His government is so constituted that the abuse of free agency is checked not only by our moral nature, but by the natural evil which it introduces or increases. The waters of the ocean, although containing many corrupting substances, are preserved from putrefaction. The contamination of the atmosphere by respiration and other causes, is not allowed to go on continually increasing: principles of counteraction and compensation are in continual activity. As it is in the natural, so it is in the moral world. The abuse of free agency is subject to checks, and is not permitted to exceed certain limits. Our moral faculties oppose its progress; and if this opposition be borne down, an insuperable barrier at length presents itself in the accumulation of natural evil. Thus, by the constitution of nature, moral evil, after proceeding to a certain extent, is made in some measure to cure itself. When human affairs reach a certain point of perturbation, then, like the inequalities in the planetary system, they gradually return to the point from which they set off. They vibrate within certain limits. The accumulation of moral evil is wrought off like a scum from fermenting liquors. In the natural world the tempest is a powerful means of purifying the atmosphere; an analogous scene presents itself to our view in the moral world.

The sufferings which result from the abuse of free agency are employed, by the wisdom and goodness of the Creator, not only as means of correcting our errors, but also of exercising our virtues, strengthening our faculties, and improving our nature. Suffering has a tendency to awaken our moral sensibilities, and to make us reflect seriously on our actions. If it be the means of bringing us to a due perception of our folly and guilt, of reclaiming us from error, and of leading us to a correct use of our freedom, we will again taste the sweets of virtue, and rejoice under the administration of a wise and benevolent Parent.

Suffering, in consequence of perverse affections and vicious conduct, may be considered as the kind castigation of a wise and affectionate Father to bring back his erring children to the path of duty and of happiness. In this point of view, the sufferings of moral agents are evidently consistent with the perfections and government of an infinitely wise and good Being. Indeed, in a great system of moral agency, the absence of suffering, except in cases where the agents have passed victoriously through a state of trial, and by means of instruction, discipline, and practice are confirmed in the habits of virtue, would constitute a more formidable objection against the perfections and government of God, than any that the atheist has been able to adduce. The parent who never chides or chastises, neglects the interest of his erring child; and were the universal parent never to inflict chastisement upon the disobedient, this would furnish a presumption that he looked with an indifferent eye on the conduct of his rational offspring, and was careless about their moral improvement. But he takes a lively interest in the welfare of his children, and, by wise instruction and salutary discipline, restrains their wanderings, corrects their errors, encourages, exercises, and improves their virtues, and prepares them for a more exalted stage of existence; for associating with the numerous and chosen society of those who, having passed triumphantly through a course of trial, are confirmed in virtue, and far advanced in the perfection of their nature.

We often suffer from the abuse of free agency in others. Discord in families; jealousies, calumnies, envy, hatred, and mutual injuries among neighbours; and wars between nations, occasion the greater part of human misery, and may frequently involve us in trouble without any fault of our own. In answer to this objection, we observe that the moral, as well as the natural world, is governed by general laws; and free agency can be limited only by the nature and abilities of the agents, subject to the counteraction of one another. In a great scheme of free agency, as in our world, the agents mutually operate upon, encourage, and aid, or oppose, check, and restrain each other. Restraints by special interpositions of Deity are as inadmissible here as in the general laws of the natural world, and would produce similar injurious effects. No restraints can be imposed upon the agents, but such as arise from their physical and intellectual capacities, and the circumstances in which they are placed. It is the interest of all to regulate, direct, and keep within due bounds the free agency of all; and to this common interest, in connexion with our moral nature, the matter is left. I cannot conceive how it could be otherwise without the destruction of free agency.

"What, in the name of wonder," exclaims one, "can be the final cause of cruelty, slaughter, and devastation? Why should we be both able and willing to pervert the benevolent purposes of nature?"* Might he not with equal propriety have asked, what is the final cause of lying, slander, theft, or any other action which proceeds from the abuse of free agency? Ought he not rather to have asked, what is the final cause of our being made free agents, creatures endued with freedom of will and liberty of choice, and not mere machines? For this is the point on which his questions ultimately bear. War, with its frightful concomitants, is a dreadful abuse of free agency, and ought not to be held up as a stain on the perfections or government of God, but as a melancholy instance of human perversity. If many suffer by war, many are guilty by aiding and abetting, or not opposing and counteracting that profligacy by which it is begun and carried on. Some, indeed, talk of wars as necessary, and seem to place them by the side of the volcano and the hurricane. But it is a monstrous absurdity to confound the guilt of the creature with the wise and gracious appointments of the Creator. Shall we vindicate murder by the plea that man is born to die, or defend the conduct of the incendiary because lightning sometimes sets our property on fire?

If, under the operation of general laws, we suffer from the abuse of free agency in others, without any fault of our own, this suffering exercises and improves our faculties, and gives scope for the developement of virtuous dispositions and affections which otherwise would have lain dormant. If we meet with no rude treatment, we have no occasion for meekness and forbearance. Without injuries we have no room for the exercise of forgiveness. The sufferings which we endure from the misconduct of others, if we behave well under them, do not rob us of the approbation of our own mind, and consequently cannot deprive us of happiness. Our bearing them well, and our passing through the uncertainties, dangers, and trials of the present state with prudence and fortitude, are means for training us up in a meetness for a more excellent state of being.

Bad education, corrupt maxims, and vicious example have a powerful and unhappy influence on human opinions and conduct. Bad government combines and aggravates all these causes of wickedness and misery, and has certainly been an abundant source of tribulation among men. These are adversaries with which we must strive in the moral course; enemies which we must combat and overcome in our moral warfare. And in order to success in the race and in the battle, it behoves us to use all the means in our power for the illumination of our understandings and regulation of our hearts; to form correct notions of duty and happiness; to cherish virtue in our minds, and with inflexible constancy to practise it in our lives.

The existence of moral evil forms no solid objection against the divine wisdom and goodness. It is not so predominant in the world as some gloomy theorists have represented; and with respect to that portion of it which really occurs, we can vindicate the perfections of Deity from every imputation. We are free agents, a condition necessary to moral government, virtue and vice, reward and punishment. We are endued with reason and conscience for the regulation of our conduct. Our temper and character are of our own formation. Our actions flow from our own free choice. If we follow a right course we enjoy much happiness. If we act otherwise we have ourselves to blame for the consequences; nay, the suffering which ensues is a kind warning that we have erred. The evils which we suffer from the misconduct of others, without any fault of our own, while they leave us in the full possession of the approbation of our own mind, give room for the improvement of our intellectual and moral nature. In the moral as in the natural world, partial evil is made subservient to general good.

* Smellie, Philosophy of Natural History.

III. NATURAL EVIL.

Having considered moral evil, we shall now turn our attention to natural evil; and shall arrange our thoughts on this part of the subject under the following heads:

1. The physical constitution of the earth, and the quality of some of its productions.
2. The nature of some of the inferior animals.
3. The pains and sorrows to which man is unavoidably exposed from his very constitution, and the circumstances in which he is placed.

These topics open a large field, and will give room for a variety of observations. But before entering upon these things we shall take notice of a principle of our nature, which has been already briefly mentioned, but which deserves a more particular attention; namely, its progressive capacity, together with the means by which, according to the constitution of things, that capacity is operated upon and unfolded. This seems to be a matter of considerable importance on the subject under discussion, and I shall, therefore, illustrate it at some length.

Every creature must be finite, and what is finite is susceptible of melioration. At what point soever in the scale of intellect any created being appears, there is room for progressive improvement. The being may advance from a lower to a higher degree of excellence. A progressive is nobler than a stationary creature. The latter, if any such exist in the rational universe, whatever may be his place in the scale, may ultimately be greatly surpassed by one who started from a much lower point, but who is endued with a progressive nature. The progressive principle pervades the system of the world. The early dawn gradually ushers in the morning light, which shines clearer and clearer till the meridian sun beam upon the earth. The seed germinates, and, by a gradual progress, the plant attains maturity. The noble oak springs from the humble acorn; but it must bear the chilling blast of many a winter before it lift its head with majestic grandeur among the trees of the forest.

Animals of all kinds advance, some more rapidly, some more slowly, towards the perfection of their nature. The progress is still going on, although imperceptibly. The plant or the animal grows; but we cannot at any given moment discern its growth, and point out the increase it has received since the moment immediately preceding. This gradual and imperceptible progress takes place not only in plants and animals, but also in the rational nature of man, the only intelligence that falls under our observation. Every step in the progress prepares the way for that which is to follow. We have no reason to complain that we are children before we are men, for the exercises of our boyish years are needful to fit us for the duties of maturer life; and we have good reason to conclude, that the dispositions and habits formed and cherished by the active and virtuous discharge of the duties of the present life, educate and prepare us for entering into the enjoyment of a higher state of existence.

Our being endued with a capacity of progressive improvement is of itself a strong presumption of goodness in the Deity. If the means provided in nature for unfolding this capacity answer the end, God must be wise: in so far as we have pleasure in the use of these means, it demonstrates that he is benevolent. Now, we contend, that the means are adequate to the end, and, generally speaking, we have pleasure in the use of the means; consequently God is both wise and good. Even in those instances where we have no immediate pleasure in the means, nay even where they give us pain, there is no proof of malevolence, because even these painful means are excitements to improvement and consequent happiness. They are often occasioned by our having been careless of the means of improvement. The schoolboy may dislike the discipline by which he is urged to his task; but if the ambition of excellence, and the hope of reward do not spur him on, the lash must be applied. This, however, is no proof of malevolence in the teacher. We are impelled to the means of improvement by reward and punishment; happy when we use, unhappy when we neglect them.

The means provided in nature for the expansion of our capacities, both of body and mind, are adequate to the end. Exercise is the chief means of our improvement. It braces and invigorates the body; it unfolds and strengthens the powers of the mind: and to exercise we are prompted both by the constitution of our nature, and the circumstances in which we are placed. Like Sisyphus, we must roll our stone; but we do not, like Sisyphus, roll it in vain. By every wise and vigorous exertion we rise in excellence, and never lose ground but by folly, carelessness, or sloth. Within certain limits, the vigour of our faculties increases in proportion to the employment which we give them.

Bodily exertion renders the whole frame active, robust and hardy; and any particular member of the body or organ of sense, that is much employed, acquires a corresponding degree of strength and dexterity in the peculiar manner of its application. Those persons who bear on their backs the produce of the Mexican mines exhibit a robust appearance. The diminutive Bosjesman bounds over the mountains with the agility of a roe. The American savage discerns the footsteps of his friend or of his enemy, where a European eye does not perceive any vestige. The mariner descries a ship at sea, where a stranger to maritime life cannot behold a speck in the distant horizon. The Bedouin Arab who, after sweeping the view with his eye, alights from his horse and applies his ear to the ground, listening for the tread of the distant traveller of the desert, catches the sound which entirely escapes one unpractised in his manner of life. A blind person has been seen to walk the streets of a town, and turn every corner with the utmost precision; and in some blind persons, the sense of feeling has become so delicate as to enable them to distinguish cloths of different colours, and even in cloth of mixed colours to ascertain the particulars. The senses of smell and taste are equally susceptible of improvement.

Practice is the parent of dexterity in any manual operation, as is evident in all the mechanical arts. It likewise improves skill in the conduct of any difficult enterprise. An American Indian will safely shoot a rapid in his canoe, or steer his frail bark in the tempestuous ocean, where the most experienced European seaman would perish. As the body is braced by labour, the organs of sense meliorated by careful application, and manual dexterity acquired by practice, so the mind is improved and strengthened by the exercise of its faculties. Ingenuity is sharpened by the occasions which call it forth. By being brought into action, our mental powers acquire an increase of strength and modification of habit. Every faculty, judgment, memory, or imagination, is improved, according to the exercise which we give it. The tool with which I perform any manual labour wears away in the operation. The axe and the saw become blunt; and, by frequent attrition the substance of the ploughshare and of the spade is gradually diminished; but the hand of the labourer hardens, and accommodates itself to his work, while his arm waxes stronger by employment. The mind, if allowed to slumber in drowsy indolence, becomes feeble and palsied; but call it into action, and its dormant powers are awakened. When employed on external objects, it operates beneficially on itself, for its capacities expand; and, like a plant under the genial influence of the solar beam, all its powers are unfolded. Both body and mind bear a resemblance to the magnet, which, by gradual additions, may be made to bear a weight which, at first, it was utterly incapable of supporting.

All our pleasures have a close connection with the exercise of our bodily and mental powers; and one outward situation is more favourable to happiness than another, only in proportion as it gives opportunities for a more varied and unconstrained exertion of them. The love of exercise plainly appears in the inferior animals. Lambs running and gamboling round a hillock; horses scouring the plain; dogs keenly pursuing each other; and even the timid hares sporting together, are proofs that the felicity of the animated being does not consist in motionless repose and inactive gratification. We see children actively employed in their amusements. They delight in the exercise of their limbs; and that exercise preserves their health and promotes their growth. Happiness is not found on a bed of down, nor in a state of listless sloth and luxurious gratification. Cheerless languor, lingering disease, and early death, are the common lot of wealthy indolence. But the person who labours diligently for his daily bread, is in general healthy, cheerful, and contented.

It is a common law of our nature, that what costs little exertion imparts little pleasure; what is obtained without labour or expense is possessed without enjoyment. He who gains a fortune by his own industry, feels a relish in the possession of it, to which he who succeeds to a similar fortune, without toil, is a stranger. Indeed, there is often more pleasure in pursuit than in possession, in hope than in enjoyment, in toil than in reward. Many things are valued chiefly on account of the pleasure which the pursuit affords. Game is hunted not so much for its intrinsic worth as for the gratification of the chase.

The mind of man has no pleasure in unvarying rest. Its enjoyment springs from action. Hence men in every rank, and in every stage of society, devise employment for themselves, if it be not imposed upon them by necessity. The South Sea islander exercises and amuses himself by sporting among the breakers like a walrus. The North American Indians, in the vicinity of the Athapascow and Slave lakes, instead of enjoying all that rest and ease of which their circumstances admit, court exercise and employment at the expense of severe privation and great danger. They can easily find a plentiful subsistence for their families during winter, by catching deer in a pound; but only the aged and infirm, the women and children, and a few of the more indolent and unambitious, will submit to remain in the parts where food and clothing can be so easily procured. To this they prefer the uncertainty, fatigue, privations, and dangers of the chase, and of a wandering life. "In my opinion," says the hardy traveller who states the fact, "there cannot exist a stronger proof that man was not created to enjoy happiness in this world, than the conduct of those miserable beings who inhabit this wretched part of it." Here we have an example of the incorrect thinking, not unfrequently entertained by persons whose lives are more devoted to action than contemplation; for the opinion rests on the supposition, that happiness consists in undisturbed repose, and in the enjoyment of unsolicited abundance. But in a state of unvarying ease and spontaneous plenty it does not consist: it is in earnest pursuit and vigorous exertion that the energies of the human being are unfolded; and in them is his happiness obtained. The hunter is pursuing and enjoying pleasure amidst the fatigues of the chase and the perils of the wilderness.

In civilized society, the opulent, who are under no necessity of earning their means of subsistence by daily exertion find employment for themselves by engaging in play, in hunting, or in other similar occupations. The man of science and liberal curiosity renounces literary ease and domestic comfort, traverses the globe, mingles with savage tribes, ascends the Alps or the Andes, encounters the cold and storms of polar regions, or visits the crater of Ætna or Hecla. Our most exalted pleasures flow from successful exertions of intellect. What sensual gratification deserves for a moment to be compared with the joy of Pythagoras, on discovering that the square of the hypothenuse is equal to the squares of the other two sides of the right angled triangle; with the transport of Archimedes, when he sprung out of the bath, exclaiming, "I have found it!" on discovering a method by which he could ascertain the quantity of silver which a goldsmith had put into Hiero's crown; or with the ecstacy of Franklin, when he perceived the fibres of the cord attached to his kite exhibiting signs of electricity? These are the most sublime enjoyments of which man in his present state is susceptible; and all these advantages, which we gain by skill, industry, and virtue, give us high pleasure on reflection. Thus, exercise is the chief means of our improvement and happiness; and to exercise we are impelled not only by the constitution of our nature, but also by the circumstances in which we are placed. Our constitution and circumstances are as much adapted to each other as the wing of the bird and the atmosphere; the gills of the fish and water. Here we have a striking instance of that relation of one thing to another which pervades the universe, and which demonstrates unity of plan, and skilful contrivance in its formation.

Had we been set down in a situation where every want was at once supplied, every wish and desire gratified without difficulty or delay, and where there was no room for ingenious contrivance and active exertion; we would have been the miserable victims of languor and satiety. Without something to awaken fear, encourage hope, and stimulate activity, life stagnates in supid torpitude and melancholy indolence. But nature around us is admirably fitted to rouse activity, encourage ingenuity, and reward industrious exertion. Everything conspires to animate our diligence, to improve our talents, and to promote our happiness. The earth is wisely accommodated to our active and intelligent nature, for its bowels as well as its surface administer to our comfort; and every part of nature around us may be made to increase and diversify our enjoyments, according to our circumstances and taste.

There is no danger that the means of employing either our bodily or intellectual powers will ever be exhausted. To cultivate the earth, drain the marsh, straighten the watercourse, and embank the river; to form roads and bridges, and to carry on the various branches of manufacture and commerce, will still furnish abundant scope for human industry. There will also be an ample field for the operations of intellect in the progress of science; for although our present attainments are great, yet the next generation will find enough to exercise their ingenuity. Every step we advance in knowledge enlarges our views, and opens new subjects of investigation and discovery. It is like travelling in a winding and interminable valley, bounded on each side by woods and mountains. At each bend, where we expected to find its termination, we perceive that the scene is only varied, and new prospects disclosed to our view. Notwithstanding all the industry, skill, and discoveries of Davy, there still remains abundance of room for labourers in the same field; to trace matter to its elementary forms, and through its various combinations. Newton improved on the discoveries of Kepler and Galileo. La Place has executed what Newton left undone; but there is still room for adding to the sublime discoveries of La Grange and La Place. The intellectual hero will never need to sit down and weep because he has conquered the world of science, and exhausted the mines of discovery. To a person of determined and persevering industry, to whom no labour is irksome, and no difficulty appears insurmountable; to him no enterprise is too great, and no attainment hopeless: no department in science, and no discovery in nature is above his reach.

We may farther remark, that employment is an advantage to our moral as well as to our intellectual nature. It is a powerful preventive of temptation, for he who has nothing to do has much need to be confirmed in virtue. Such then is our active nature, and such the circumstances in which we are placed. In so far as these circumstances are fitted to exercise and develope our powers, they may fairly be adduced as evidences of wisdom; and if we have enjoyment in the exercises to which our nature and circumstances prompt us, the Author of the system must be benevolent.

I now proceed to the consideration of natural evil, under the several heads already mentioned: namely, the physical constitution of the earth; the nature of some of the inferior animals; and the pains and sorrows to which man is liable.

1. The physical constitution of the earth.

Some have objected to the general appearance of the earth, representing it as a shapeless mass without order or beauty; inundated by the ocean, disfigured by ragged promontories and irregular indentations; the dry land deformed by mountains and morasses; occupied by lakes or deserts; yielding poisonous plants and minerals; in one quarter parched by the beams of a vertical sun, and in another bound up in chains of everlasting ice. Such representations, at first sight, have an imposing appearance, and, when expressed in pompous language, may please the ear, and have no small tendency to mislead the imagination. But, on a closer inspection, those apparently mighty difficulties in a great measure disappear, and the due consideration of them teaches us a lesson of caution and humility when examining the works of the Almighty. It teaches us not to be hasty in supposing that improvement would follow a change in any of the great conditions of nature; for such a change, it is likely, instead of improving the world, would break the harmony of its parts, and destroy the symmetry and use of the whole.

That the earth bears marks of having undergone some great convulsion is not denied: but we do not admit that from this any inference can be drawn against the perfections or government of Deity; for the earth, as it presently appears, is a convenient habitation for man and for the inferior animals. These animals all find subsistence. With respect to man everything around him is fitted for supplying his wants and for promoting his enjoyments, by calling forth his activity and by giving scope to his exertions. Everything is adapted to his physical and intellectual constitution; and is suited to preserve his health, to brace his body, and to invigorate his mind.

The great extent of the ocean, in the estimation of some persons, is a mark of imperfection. And on this subject let us listen to the complaints of the atheist, and call in his wisdom to remedy the evil. Let us empower him to dry up the waters, and to reveal the deep channels of the ocean; yea, if he will, to elevate the bottom of the sea to a level with the adjacent land, and to give the earth the exact convexity of an artificial globe. He has remedied what he thought a defect; he has introduced beauty where, in his imagination, deformity prevailed. What is the effect of his supposed improvement?

By one great operation he has destroyed a vast number and variety of sentient beings, which dwelt in the ocean and enjoyed happiness. He has also laid the sure foundation for the speedy extinction of animal and vegetable existence; for if there be no ocean, the sun will exhale no vapours; no clouds will float on the atmosphere, and neither dew nor rain will descend on the earth. But if there be no dew and no rain, where shall we find the aliment of vegetation; the murmuring brook and the majestic river? Experience teaches us that without springs and rivers there is no fertility; and, consequently, without them man and beast must expire, and lifeless stillness and sterility take possession of the vast desert. Such are the effects of atheistical wisdom and improvement. Before any complain of the extent of the ocean on the terraqueous globe, let them show that a less surface of water would equally well answer all the purpose served by the sea. This, we may without hesitation affirm, they can never do. We may, therefore, dismiss their complaints on this subject, as the offspring of ignorance and folly.

The ocean is a vast field of enjoyment to sentient beings, and it yields inexhaustible treasures to the human race. If we look to the two extremities of the American continent, we see, at the one, the wandering savage of Terra del Fuego devouring fish; and, at the other, the Esquimaux spearing salmon in the Copper Mine River. Although many of the human race draw a considerable portion of their subsistence from the deep, yet this great storehouse has, perhaps, never hitherto been turned to the best account by civilized nations. The sea also facilitates the intercourse of nations, and harmonizes with the whole system of nature, in presenting a scene fitted to awaken the energy, and to give employment to the activity and enterprise of man.

The ocean is preserved at a moderate temperature by the statical principle by which the heavier columns of a fluid displace the lighter; and consequently it tends to modify the temperature of the land.* For the temperature of the ocean communicates itself to the superincumbent atmosphere on every side; and, in this way, the sea cools the land in tropical climates, and increases the temperature in high latitudes, How refreshing is the sea breeze to one panting under a vertical sun! And do not the insular inhabitants of high latitudes enjoy in winter a milder atmosphere than they who dwell on great continents under the same parallel?

Humboldt has observed, that the interior provinces of America, between 30° and 38° north latitude, like the rest of North America, have a climate essentially different from that of the same parallels on the old continent. A remarkable inequality prevails between the temperature of the different seasons. German winters succeed to Neapolitan and Sicilian summers. This is no doubt partly owing to the configuration of the land and the course of the mountains; but a grand cause of it seems to be the breadth of the continent, and its prolongation towards the north pole: for great and unbroken continents are favourable to the extremes of heat or cold, because the surface of the land is heated or cooled sooner than the water. This principle may be applied in explanation of the fact, that in proceeding eastward from the shores of the Atlantic, through Europe and the north of Asia, the temperature of any parallel of latitude still becomes lower as we advance. The ocean then is a great source of animal enjoyment. It is of essential importance to our world; and we have no reason to conclude that a less basin of water would answer all the purposes in the economy of nature. The deep indentations of bays and gulfs are highly useful for commercial purposes; and they also contribute to supply the wants of man, by bringing the stores of the sea into the bosom of the land.

Some complain that the surface of the earth is broken down into many inequalities, rogged mountains, deep valleys, and morasses. But this constitution of things, instead of being a just ground of complaint, serves many valuable purposes. It gives the productions of different climates under the same latitude; furnishes a residence and food for different kind of animated beings; is a powerful means of clothing the earth with beauty and fertility; and gives scope to the ingenuity and exertions of man. In ascending the Andes, for instance, at different points above the level of the sea, we meet with the productions of equatorial and polar regions, and of all the intermediate climates. In Mexico, the same parallel of latitude produces the banana, the apple, the sugar-cane, wheat, the manioc, and potato. There the nutritive gramina, which vegetate among the ices of Norway and Siberia, cover the fields of the torrid zone. There the oak grows only at an elevation above the level of the sea of between 2500 and 10,000 feet: the pine never descends farther down towards the coast of Vera Cruz than to about 6000 feet above the level of the sea, and is never found higher in the mountains than about 13,000 feet. The wheat of Europe occupies a belt on the declivities of those mountains, between about 4500 and 10,000 of elevation, the banana tree, the fruit of which constitute so much of the food of the inhabitants of many tropical regions, scarcely bears any fruit at a higher elevation than 5000 feet above the level of the sea. Some plants live only in cold and mountainous places; and it were vain to look for them but in regions bordering on everlasting snow.

Although many mountains do not rise to the height of those now referred to, yet, in their several degrees, they yield nourishment to a proportional diversity of plants. If it be alleged that this can hold true of mountains in tropical or temperate regions only, it may be remarked that the height of mountains diminishes as we advance from the equator towards the pole. Chimboraço, at the equator, is about 20,000 feet high: the mountains of Iceland, on the confines of the Arctic circle, are not above a fourth or fifth part of that height.

The variety of mountains and valleys furnishes different kinds of animals with a residence and food suited to their natures. The ox delights in the plain, as there he finds the food which to him is most palatable. Sheep prefer the naked hill, because their beloved festuca grows there. Goats climb the precipice to browse on tender shrubs; and, by their agility and the structure of their feet, they are well qualified for springing from crag to crag. The argali or wild sheep, and some of the deer kind, give the preference to the bare mountain. In warm climates, high mountains, by means of the ice and snow with which they are perpetually clothed, lower the temperature of the neighbouring plains. The towering Andes cool the contiguous countries, and the mountains of Thibet render the spreading plains of Hindostan habitable.* Mountains also modify and direct the course of the winds, and shelter the low lands from the blast. To mountains the plain is indebted for its beauty and fertility. They attract the clouds, condense the vapours, are the sources of streams and rivers, and convey a fructifying moisture to the valley and the plain.

Ray, in his valuable work on "the Wisdom of God in Creation," distinctly states the fact, that more water is exhaled from the sea in vapour than is returned to it in rain; but for the fact he is at a loss to account. "Why," says he, "should not the winds carry the vapours that are exhaled out of the earth, down to the sea, as well as bring them up upon the earth which are raised from the sea? Or, which is all one, why should not the wind blow indifferently from sea and land? To which I answer, that I must needs acknowledge myself not to comprehend the reason hereof." In explanation of the fact, for which this well-informed writer did not attempt to account, we may observe, first, that the surface of the land is more easily heated than the sea, consequently the wind blows from the sea towards the land to restore the equilibrium, and carries the vapours along with it: secondly, mountains attract the clouds, stop them in their course, and make them pour down their contents on the earth. These two observations go far to explain the fact that more rain falls on the dry land than is exhaled from it; and they tend to show the utility of mountains.

* The singularity respecting the freezing of water may be mentioned as a manifestation of the wisdom and goodness of Deity. The general law is, that fluids decrease in bulk, as the temperature becomes lower. But from this law water is an exception. Its greatest density is about 40° Fah. Without the knowledge of this fact, we should be disposed to say with Dr. Johnson, when speaking of Loch Ness, that its profundity can have little part in its exemption from freezing. But the curious anomaly now mentioned explains the matter, and displays the wisdom and benificence of Deity. The water cooled to 40° sinks and yields its place to that of a higher temperature; which, in its turn, when about 40°, allows warmer water to rise to the surface. The whole body of water is cooled to 40°, and then that at the top, becoming specifically lighter as it becomes colder, remains at the surface and is congealed. The ice is a bad conductor of heat; it thus increases slowly, and shelters the water below. If the water be deep, the fish under the ice are at a temperature not lower than 40°. Were it not this singularity, the rivers and lakes of high latitudes, in winter, would become a solid mass of ice, which the heat of a whole summer would scarcely dissolve. The sentient inhabitants of the waters would be destroyed. By a departure from a general law these effects are prevented, and the wisdom and benificence of Deity manifested.

* Under the equator, the region of perpetual snow commences at an elevation of 15,750 feet: in 45° N. lat. it commences at 8350 feet

If we trace the course of any great river, it conducts us to mountains. The Orinoco and the De la Plata lead us to the Andes. The Mississippi and the Saint Lawrence have their sources in an elevated region; and a mountainous ridge separates the basin of the Columbia from the waters of the Missouri. The Alps send forth the Danube and the Rhine, the Rhone and the Po. The vapours exhaled from the Mediterranean pass over Egypt almost without dispensing a single shower; but the lofty mountains in Abyssinia arrest them in their course, and rob them of their treasures. The Nile, spreading fertility over its banks, conveys the swelling waters to the Mediterranean. Thus the mountains of Abyssinia, lying in about 12° N. latitude, are the means of clothing the Thebais and Delta, from 24° to 31°, with beauty and abundance. Without the mountains of Abyssinia the valley of Egypt would remain an arid and inhospitable desert. We might run over the globe, and everywhere we would find mountains of essential benefit to the earth. While they attract the clouds, their structure is such as to retain much of their water, and to give it out in perennial streams.

Mountains contain iron, copper, lead, and many other mineral substances of indispensable utility to agriculture and the arts; and although to some they may appear marks of irregularity and deformity, they are nevertheless the perfection of order, and essential to the beauty and fertility of the earth. Without them we can have no magnificent or pleasing scenery. They afford a commodious residence or a safe retreat to many of the inferior animals, and they diversify, adorn, and enrich the prospect to man. While so extensively beneficial, they do not so much affect the sphericity of the earth, as a few grains of sand scattered on the surface of an eighteen inch globe affect its sphericity. For the diameter of the earth is nearly 8000 miles; and the top even of Chimboraço, the loftiest peak on our globe, is only about 4 miles above the level of the sea.*

As mountains contribute to the beauty and fertility of the earth; so to drain the morass, and convert the quaggy swamp into a beautiful and fertile field, exercises the ingenuity and employs the activity of man. The mountain is essential to our subsistence; the marsh contributes to the developement of our powers. The materials of subsistence and comfort are spread plentifully around us; but they do not drop into the lap of drowsy indolence and lumpish inactivity. In order to obtain them we must exert our powers both of body and mind. We must cultivate the earth, cut down the forest, drain the bog, straighten the watercourse, and apply proper manure to the soil. By the diligent and skilful exertion of our powers and application of our means, we can produce mighty changes on everything around us, and make the influence of our operations be felt even on those parts of nature which, at first sight, seem entirely above our reach. We can in some measure disarm the elements of their rigour, and improve the climate as well as the soil by cultivation; by draining marshes and lessening evaporation, which carries off a quantity of caloric, and occasions a corresponding degree of cold; by turning up the soil and exposing it to the rays of the sun; and by thinning and cutting down forests, which by their shade exclude the solar beam from the earth.

The barrenness of many parts of the earth has been the theme of discontented declamation, and has been plausibly urged as an objection against the wisdom and goodness of Deity: like other objections, however, it is deceitful, and more showy than solid. Men have agreed to give the character of fertility to the soils which are favourable to the production of a few kinds of farinaceous grains, and to pronounce others barren and unfruitful. But many seeds, plants, and herbs, require a peculiar soil and climate to bring them to maturity, and the soil to which the character of fertility has been attached answers a few only. The fact has been known since the days of Theophrastus, and is mentioned in the pleasing verse of Virgil. The willow thrives in a moist soil; the alder, in marshes; the wild ash, on the rocky mountain; the vine, on the open hill; the yew, in a moist and elevated situation. When mahogany grows in a barren soil, the grain of the wood is beautifully variegated; on rich soil, it is pale, open, and of little value. The cinnamon-tree thrives amidst arid sands. There are plants suited to every soil. Even the trunks of trees and stones are covered with various kinds of liverwort.

Grasses are the most useful, and also the most common, of all vegetables. They clothe the mountain and adorn the plain; they vegetate luxuriantly within the tropics, and in the summer months beautify and enrich the polar regions. The cereal grasses yield a rich nutriment to man; and many grasses, which everywhere cover the earth with spontaneous verdure, afford a suitable provision to the brute creation. Those grasses, herbs, and shrubs, which are rejected by one class of animals, are greedily eaten by another. As there is a vast variety of plants, many of which require both a peculiar climate and soil to bring them to perfection, so the wise and gracious Creator has provided a suitable climate and soil for plants of every kind. Animals have different tastes; and their diffusion over the earth is promoted by these tastes, as well as by a corresponding variety of plants. And certainly it is a matter of no small moment, that the climate which suits the constitution of the animal, also produces the food which to it is most palatable.

Even supposing any spot so barren and miserable as to afford neither subsistence nor shelter to any sentient being, this would furnish no other argument against the perfections of Diety than what would arise from a diminution of the surface of the earth. It would be merely so much of the globe withdrawn from the immediate use and service of living creatures. But we have no evidence that any part of the earth is so withdrawn. The poles are encompassed with a great barrier of ice: as far, however, as man has been able to penetrate towards them, the water abounds with inhabitants, some of which occasionally repair to the ice. In Nova Zembla there is no human habitation; but there foxes and bears find a place of residence, and a scene of enjoyment. The ostrich delights in the burning sandy wilderness.

From the nature of the soil and the inconstancy of the elements, the crops at times may be deficient: but, in every case of famine, there is either a neglect or misapplication of our means, and of our physical and intellectual powers, or an abuse somewhere of free agency; for, with diligence and precaution, even the chill Icelander may always secure the means of subsistence either from his native soil and circumambient seas, or by commercial intercourse with foreign lands. And even within the tropics, and in the most fertile regions, when industry lifts a palsied hand and cultivation is neglected, scarcity and famine are not unknown. When the distant supplies which prudence and industry have provided are intercepted by hostile violence, there is an abuse of free agency; and, in a system carried on by the operation of general laws, this abuse at times may be severely felt even by the harmless and unoffending.

Some have complained of poisonous herbs and minerals. Poison, however, is merely a relative term. No plant, I believe, is absolutely destructive of animal life. Those vegetables, which are disagreeable or poisonous to one class of living creatures, are grateful and nourishing to another. The horse gives up the common water hemlock to the goat; the goat leaves monkshood to the horse. Even wormwood and the acrid spurge yield an agreeable repast to some kinds of insects. The inferior animals are guarded against danger from what they eat by an instinctive delicacy of smell and taste. Man, at least after he has acquired an artificial taste by means of cookery, must exercise vigilance and sagacity; although his smell and taste, unless greatly perverted, will seldom or never mislead him. Even from those vegetables which are most destructive of human life, we can extract a salutary nutriment or a healing virtue.

Some plants we can disarm of their poisonous qualities, and convert into materials of wholesome aliment. The bitter jatropha is an active poison. The natives of Haiti, who preferred death to involuntary labour, killed themselves by fifties with swallowing the raw juice of the plant. But even the juice of the bitter jatropha is rendered harmless by boiling and skimming, and is then used without danger as a sauce. The root is also baked into bread; but, in order to deprive it of its noxious qualities, it must be grated down and compressed." The empyreumatic oil of tobacco is an active poison. But tobacco in a variety of ways is advantageously used. It is even employed as a remedy against other poisons. "The Caraibs," says Humboldt, "used mashed tobacco leaves as a counter poison. In our journey on the Orinoco, we saw mashed tobacco successfully applied to the bite of venomous serpents." Foxglove, hemlock, poppy, and other similar plants, have each medicinal virtues.

We may remark, that different parts of the same plant, in many instances, have different qualities; and the same may be said of plants in their different stages. Different plants elaborate different juices from the same soil; and different animals elaborate different substances from the same plant. Bees form honey from thyme and roses; and from the same plant spiders draw a poison. From vegetables, innocuous and agreeable, a deleterious substance may be extracted. The laurel is pleasing, the almond beautiful and nutritive; but the laurel and the bitter almond yield most powerful poisons.

* The Himalaya mountains have been estimated at about 27,000 feet; but their height is not yet well ascertained.—See Colebrooke's Essay in Asiatic Researches, vol. xii. p. 253, &c.

Minerals do not constitute any part of human food, but they are of vast importance in the arts; and their value in the arts not unfrequently depends on those very qualities which render them destructive when taken into the stomach. Only a few are poisonous; and most, or all even of these, are serviceable in medicine. Arsenic itself is employed with advantage in the healing art. In short, the constitution of the vegetable and mineral kingdoms, like everything else in the world, is adapted to the rational, active, and progressive nature of man. The existence of poisonous substances serves to awaken his vigilance, and exercise his sagacity; and we may safely conclude, that there are neither plants nor minerals but what have been, or may be, turned to his advantage. The discovery of their qualities and uses exercises his ingenuity; the application of them administers to his comfort, and diversifies his enjoyments. The discoveries which may yet be made in the progress of science, and the consequent advantages, we are unable to anticipate.

On the surface of the earth there are very different climates; and if it could be demonstrated that this could originate in nothing but a defect of power, wisdom, or goodness, then we would be compelled to admit that such defect adhered to the Author of the system; for difference of climate is part of the plan in the constitution of our globe. Towards the equator the heat is always considerable, except at great heights above the level of the sea: as we approach the poles, generally speaking, the cold increases. The climate of a country, however, does not depend altogether on its latitude; but also on its elevation above the level of the sea, its contiguity to the ocean, the configuration of the land, and a number of other local circumstances. The temperature of the earth varies from about 100° to —10° Fahrenheit: the mean temperature for the whole surface may be estimated at 58°: the greatest summer heat is only about 42° above this: the greatest winter cold is about 98° under it. The temperature of man is about 96°, and is nearly the same in summer and winter, in an inhabitant of the torrid, and in one of the frigid zone. The temperature of the human body is much above that of the surrounding medium.

In the different climates there is no defect either of wisdom or goodness: they exhibit a display of those attributes by opening a field of enjoyment to a greater variety of sentient beings. Both in the sea and on the dry land there are animals peculiar to certain climates. Some fishes are found chiefly within the tropics; others have their residence in polar regions. A similar economy prevails on the dry land. Many animals, such as the monkey and the elephant, are natives of warm climates, and there they find that sort of provision for which they have the greatest relish: others, such as the rein-deer, delight in high latitudes; and there they find the food which to them is most palatable.[*]

While many of the inferior animals are fitted, by their peculiar constitution, for living comfortably in one climate only, man is endowed with a flexibility of organization which enables him to bear the temperature of every country. He can accommodate his dress to the climate, and can live, perhaps with equal degrees of happiness, in every parallel of latitude between Cape Horn and Greenland. Everywhere his intellectual and moral nature is equally susceptible of improvement. The Icelander, touching the Arctic Circle, is as intelligent, virtuous, and happy, as the native of any country between the tropics.

Man is so constituted, that habit produces great effects both on his body and mind; fortifying the one against fatigue and privations, the rigour of the seasons, and the most rapid transitions from one degree of temperature to another; and not only reconciling the other to various modes of life, but even rendering these agreeable and pleasant. The Finlander amuses himself, for half an hour or an hour, in a bath heated to 150° or 160° Fahr.; and frequently goes naked out of the bath to roll himself among the snow, when the mercury stands at 20° below the freezing point. From this great and sudden transition he receives no injury. It has been found that persons accustomed to attend an oven, have borne for ten minutes a heat equal to 280° Fahr. In common cases suffocation begins to take place in about half a minute after the body is submersed in water; but the divers in the pearl fishery can remain under water five minutes, almost as long as the seal, porpoise, and amphibia. The dexterity of the South Sea Islanders in swimming is well known.

We are apt to set up our adventitious tastes and habits, sentiments and employments, as the standard of excellence and measure of comfort, and to imagine that those things only which are sources of enjoyment to us can yield satisfaction and happiness to others; and that what is disagreeable or painful to us must be equally so to all our fellow men. The native of a tropical country may imagine that the inhabitants of polar regions are a torpid, hungry, and miserable race; but they who dwell in high latitudes are not less active, cheerful, or vigorous, than they who bask in the rays of a vertical sun. The delicate European may shudder on seeing the Esquimaux or Kamtschadale feasting on putrid fish and rancid oil; but the Esquimaux or Kamtschadale would spit out with disgust the choicest viands of the European epicure. A Laplander can form no conception of the wealth of a man who does not possess a single rein-deer; and pities him who never feasts on the flesh of the bear, nor drinks the oil of the seal or the whale. A Turk imagines that the enjoyment of a man who does not smoke cannot be greater than that of a beast. A man in clothes appears as ridiculous to an Indian of California, as a monkey dressed in human apparel does to the common people of Europe.

Notwithstanding all the differences of climate, almost every individual, from habit and sentiment, is disposed to give a preference to his native land. The Greenlander will not abandon his icy coasts and the management of his frail kajak, for any other country or employment. To the Icelander no other spot on the globe has such charms as Iceland. The Kamtschadale in his jourt, surrounded by deserts and tempests, believes his native land to be the most eligible part of the earth, and considers himself the most fortunate and happy of human beings. The Laplander in the midst of mountains and storms, enjoys good health, often reaches old age, and would not exchange Lapland for the palace of a King. The native of Congo believes that every other part of the world was formed by angels; but that the Kingdom of Congo was the workmanship of the Supreme Architect, and must therefore have prerogatives and advantages above the rest of the earth. Although every other tie were broken, the dust of their fathers would bind most men to their native land. Let not the cold sceptic deride the thought. The native of Asia frequenting the tomb of his ancestors, or the afflicted wanderer of the American wilderness piously pulling the grass from the grave of a departed relative, will awaken sympathetic emotions in every ingenuous and affectionate mind.

In the attachment to country we have an auxiliary to our social affections, and a bond for uniting men in large communities. But the attachment is not so strong as entirely to prevent dispersion, or hinder migration to unsettled countries by an oppressed or overflowing population. As men, generally in every climate, are pleased with their country, and love it above every other, so in every stage of society they give the preference to those modes of life to which they have been accustomed. Hence changes and improvements in the economy and intercourse of any people are the result of a slow and gradual progress. Although men may be well pleased with their several circumstances, yet we must never forget that the most exalted enjoyment of the rational being flows from the acquisition of knowledge, and the practice of virtue.

It thus appears, that we need not be forward in affecting to commiserate the destiny of those who are placed in circumstances different from our own. Their habits and sentiments are accommodated to their condition, and they would not exchange situations with us. As to climate, we are by no means to imagine that tropical countries are perpetually scorched by an unclouded sun; or that the inhabitants of the polar circle, in winter, are buried in total darkness. Captain Cook informs us, that in general the tropical regions seldom enjoy that clear atmosphere observable where variable winds blow, nor does the sun shine with such brightness. A dull whiteness, that seems a medium between fog and clouds, for the most part, prevails in the sky. This is an advantage; for otherwise, the probability is, that the rays of the sun being uninterrupted would render the heat insupportable. The nights, nevertheless, are often clear and serene.

[*] Lord Woodhouselee, in his edition of Derham's great work, the Physico-theology, has given, from Mr. Zimmerman, a map of part of the world, in which, instead of the names of towns, we have the names of quadrupeds in the countries where they are found. A map of this kind of the whole earth, and comprehending all known classes of animals, on a moderately large scale, would be both entertaining and instructive.

On the other hand, in high latitudes, although the sun be withdrawn, yet the inhabitants are not enveloped in complete darkness. At Spitzbergen, a sort of twilight, the splendour of the Aurora Borealis, the stars, and the reflection of the snow, serve to light the hunters on their excursions, and enable them to continue the chase during the long night of a hyperborean winter. Hearne tells us, that in the vicinity of the Athapuscow lake, in the middle of December, the brilliancy of the Aurora Borealis and the stars, even without the assistance of the moon, made it frequently so clear all night, that he could see to read a very small print. The Indians make no difference between night and day when hunting the beaver. It may be added, that the annual distribution of heat over the surface of the earth is by no means so unequal as many persons are apt to imagine. The seasons give occasion to different employments, according to the climate and the nature of the country; they also relieve insipid uniformity, and give variety to the appearances of the world, and to the pursuits of man.

Thus, from the physical constitution of the globe, its water and dry land, its mountains and valleys, its different soils and different climates, there is no argument against the perfections of Deity; for, on the greater part of the earth man can subsist, and that with equal degrees of happiness. Where man does not or cannot subsist, other sentient beings find a place of residence, and a scene of enjoyment suited to their natures. No part of it is void of animal existence. If there be any argument, drawn from any part of the earth against the Divine attributes, it must equally apply to every part; and, if it be admitted that any part of it exhibits indications of wisdom and goodness, the admission must be extended to the whole. The earth is truly a convenient and pleasant habitation for man and other living creatures, and bears abundant testimony to the wisdom and goodness of the Creator.

It may be pleaded, that mankind at times are afflicted by ungenial seasons, scanty crops, and consequent famine; and that earthquakes, hurricanes, and inundations, overthrow the works, disappoint the hopes, and destroy the enjoyments or the life of man. That, to a certain extent, these things occasionally happen must be admitted; that they constitute a difficulty, and may be alleged as an objection against the attributes of Deity need not be denied. But here, as in other instances of the same kind, the difficulty arises entirely from our ignorance, and in proportion as knowledge increases the difficulty will disappear. I meet the objection with these observations—that the world is governed by general laws; and that this constitution of things is adapted to the nature and condition of man, as an intelligent and active being, in a state of trial and discipline, whose capacities must be unfolded, and his virtues improved by trial and exercise.

All the phenomena prove that the world is governed by general laws. Although these laws be wise and good, yet they may sometimes interfere, and by their interference produce partial evils. For example, the laws of gravitation, of the equilibrium of fluids, and of the disturbance of that equilibrium by heat, are formed and arranged by wisdom and goodness; but in the administration of these laws, such a concurrence of circumstances may sometimes happen as to produce partial evils. High winds arising from the disturbance of the equilibrium of the aërial fluid by heat, may cooperate with the action of the sun and moon, and occasion remarkably high tides. The combinations of the same general laws may produce tempestuous commotions in the atmosphere, causing partial evils. There is reason, however, to believe that even these tempestuous commotions are subservient to general good. The storm that commixes the atmosphere and the ocean is, probably, one grand means of purifying the air contaminated by respiration, vegetation and combustion. The effect of general laws may be partial evil; but it unquestionably is general good. There are no general laws, either in the natural or moral world, that are more injurious than advantageous.

It may be said, why is not the good produced without the evil? Why are not the general laws so constituted, as to yield all the advantages which we derive from them without any of the disadvantages? Or, if they cannot be so constituted, why are not the disadvantages prevented by special interpositions? That the world should be governed by general laws is not only proper, but indispensibly requisite, in order to the regulation of human conduct. If there were no general laws, man would be the sport of irregular occurrences, and wholly at a loss how to act. He would be suddenly defeated in all his undertakings, and reason would be of no avail for the direction of his steps. If the sun rose and set at irregular and uncertain periods; if the return of the seasons were at variable and unknown intervals; if the tides followed no regular course, man would be obliged to act at random, and would be tossed to and fro by circumstances which he could neither foresee nor prevent. But general laws everywhere obtain; and man can observe them, and act accordingly. They serve as beacons for the direction of his course, and he can use them almost every moment in the voyage of life. Whether general laws could be so framed as to produce all the good effects which we derive from them, without any of the evils, we know not, nor is it needful to institute any inquiry on the subject; for although it were possible that they could be so constituted, yet such a constitution would be improper; and it would be equally improper to prevent the partial evils by special interpositions.

If man were exposed to no danger; if at all times he were secure from want, and disappointment, and pain, he would be a careless, lazy, stupid, and unhappy animal. Place the human being, constituted as he is, in a situation where exertion would be either useless or needless, where the difficulties were insuperable, or where every object of desire spontaneously flowed in upon him, and he would be miserable. If the the course of things were invariably accommodated to our wants and desires; if, either by general laws or special interpositions, every evil were infallibly prevented and every good thing secured, then prudence and industry would be altogether useless. There would be no room for human skill, and no motive to human action. There could be no display of skill where every object of desire was certainly obtained without it; and no motive to action where nothing could be gained by foresight and industry, and nothing lost by inattention and sloth.

A state where dangers are to be provided against and averted by foresight, caution, and vigilance; where wants are to be supplied by industry and prudence; enjoyments procured by diligence and ingenuity; difficulties encountered, and trials borne with courage, fortitude, and patience; where there is still something to excite desire, cherish hope, and stimulate and reward exertion; such a state accords with the constitution of the human being, and is calculated both for his improvement and happiness. Such is the state of this world; fitted to rouse our energies, to animate our activity, and to reward persevering industry. Whenever, to any individual, the world ceases to be such a state, life stagnates, enjoyment flies away, and the consciousness of existence becomes a burden. Now, tempests and floods, and other partial evils resulting from the operation of general laws, are means of exercising and improving our faculties, of giving scope to prudence, fortitude, and activity, and thus promoting our happiness. Besides being suited to our rational and active nature, there is reason to believe that those phenomena which occasion partial evils are productive of great general benefit in the economy of the world. But here our ignorance intervenes, and in a great measure prevents us from tracing the steps of the Creator in his government.

2. Nature of some of the inferior animals.

It is not against the inanimate parts of the world only that the objections of the sceptic have been directed: different departments of animated nature have furnished him with materials of querimonious declamation. "Why are we infested with such multitudes of ferocious and venemous animals, which endanger the safety, and often destroy the life of man? Why does the earth abound with useless and noxious creatures: with myriads of insects, which frequently counteract our labours, destroy the fruit of our industry, torment our persons, and devour the means of our subsistence!" With respect to declamation of this kind, it may be observed, that nothing is more common than to take certain principles for granted, and to reason from those gratuitous assumptions as if they were incontrovertible truths, although not a word has been said in proof of them. If any phenomena do not obviously and exactly agree with those assumed principles and preconceived notions, the persons who have embraced them murmur and complain, as if disorder reigned in the universe, and as if the vestiges of goodness were buried under the rubbish of irregularity and imperfection.

Some persons, resembling the Ouadelim Arabs, who fancy that the sun rises for them only, have ambitiously assumed that not this earth merely, but all the splendid luminaries of the firmament also, were formed solely for the accommodation and comfort of man. On this proud assumption they may wonder why there is such a vast apparatus of planets and fixed stars, which by their feeble light impart such inconsiderable advantages to the earth. But the moment that we think of numerous orders of intelligent beings stationed in the different provinces of the universe, and inhabiting worlds suited to their different organizations and faculties, the misconception and the difficulty pass away. Others more modest in their pretensions, claim for man this lower world only, with the common advantages of the system. This claim they seem to advance for him exclusively, and to suppose that the world should furnish a scene of enjoyment to him alone, while no other creature should partake of the rich feast provided by the bountiful Creator, but in subserviency to man's pleasure and gratification. This assumption is equally gratuitous and false with the former, although not to the same extent. Man, indeed, is the noblest inhabitant of this world, and has dominion over the inferior animals; but to them as well as to him the Creator has given a charter to inhabit the earth, and there to enjoy a scene of happiness suited to their natures. In some instances, it may be from invading those parts of the globe which the sovereign Distributor of the earth has allotted to them as their domain, that man exposes himself to their vengeance.

The relations and dependencies of the different orders of sentient beings we at present do not fully comprehend. Perhaps a certain concatenation runs through the whole extent of animated nature, the lowest order of sentient creatures being closely connected with inorganic or vegetable matter, and, in the ascending series, every order joined to that which is immediately above it, till the highest is linked to the throne of the Creator; or some gradation and concatenation of this kind may obtain among the innumerable worlds stationed in the immensity of space. Such speculations are above our reach. We do not understand all the relations and dependencies of animated nature even in our own world. If one class of sentient beings, which we think the most useless or noxious, were removed, this would perhaps pave the way for the destruction of a second; the destruction of the second might ensure the extinction of a third, so that we are unable to calculate what might be the consequences of withdrawing any one species of living creatures from the face of the earth.

The Creator may surely, in a consistency with wisdom and goodness, make provision in the same world for different orders of sentient beings. And, if he do so, he may likewise, in a consistency with the same perfections, place in that world the several orders of beings from whom he has made provision, if the happiness of one order do not interfere with that of another, or if the interference, like general laws, produce general good, and only partial evil. If this principle be admitted, which I think it may, it will go far to vindicate the ways of God with respect to the sentient inhabitants of this globe. If the earth were overrun with rattlesnakes; if lions and tigers lay in ambush in every thicket, this would certainly be too much for the precaution, the vigilance, and the activity of man. It would overpower instead of exercising his faculties; it would destroy his happiness, instead of promoting his improvement. But ferocious and venomous animals are thinly scattered over the globe. Elephants and buffaloes feed in great herds; but lions and tigers, like robbers, are few in number, and lead a solitary life. There are multitudes of the serpent kind, but only a few are venomous. Their fangs are excretory ducts connected with the poison-bag; and the very action of the jaws which inflicts the wound mechanically injects the poison into it. These few are a protection to all the serpent kind.

The Creator has implanted in every living creature the desire of self-preservation, and has also bestowed upon each of them some means of security and defence in aid of this desire. The defensive weapons of some animals are far more formidable than those of others. The fang of the serpent and the tooth and paw of the lion are instruments of defence or offence, like the horn of the bull or the hoof of the horse: they are more terrible to others, but they are beneficial to the animals themselves. Instruments of defence are as needful to the animal as means of procuring food. Indeed, these often run into each other: in many instances the same organization is employed for both purposes. If any instrument of defence be objectionable, if we admit the tooth of the dog and the hoof of the horse to be consistent with wisdom and goodness, then our objections against the paw of the lion and the fang of the viper can be of no great weight. In both we find weapons of defence; there is merely a difference in the degree of force. If in the one case the weapon is more formidable, it is a more sure protection to the animal, and a motive to greater caution in awakening its anger. The venomous tribes serve to arouse the vigilance and exercise the ingenuity of man in avoiding their bite, or in expelling or neutralizing their poison. In this way they contribute to the developement of our powers, by presenting difficulties and dangers which are not overwhelming, but which serve to awaken activity and quicken ingenuity.

Man must be careful, vigilant, and active in cultivating the earth, in clearing it of weeds, and in superintending the growth of his crops. He must exercise a similar care, vigilance, and activity, in avoiding the tooth of the serpent and the paw of the lion. These and similar animals are, for the most part, natives of climates where nature dispenses her treasures with rich profusion, and therefore, if the faculties of man be not expanded in soliciting the earth for subsistence, they find a certain degree of exercise in watching and providing against surrounding dangers. Besides, venemous and ferocious animals, which are comparatively few in number, teach us duly to value the inoffensive kinds. It is by contrast chiefly that we learn the worth of our enjoyments. If the stream of felicity flowed without mixture and without interruption, it would cloy the appetite. Some bitter ingredient must be cast into our cup to make us relish what is sweet. We are more sensible of the beauties of a fine day after experiencing a tempest. The barren wilderness illustrates the value of the fertile field; and, in like manner, the ferocity of the tiger may teach us duly to estimate the meekness of the lamb; and the envenomed tooth of the cobra capella to value the innocuous qualities of the frog.

It has been remarked, that throughout nature things which have a relation to each other for the advantage of man are found together. Thus, mines of gold and silver abound in South America; and mercury, which is used in separating these metals from their ores, is also found there. Coal, which is so useful in smelting iron ore, is found along with it. Compensations, in like manner, accompany what is noxious. Travellers often fall ill of nervous fevers on the road between Caraccas and Cumana; but the valley and forests that emit the dangerous exhalations which occasion these fevers, also produce a tree, the bark of which furnishes a salutary remedy for the disease. Where there are many venemous reptiles, there the herbs which are the most certain antidote to their poison are found in the greatest plenty. If dangerous serpents abound in intratropical America, there the habilla de Carthagena grows, by eating a little of which, fasting, the hunters in their excursions in the woods fortify themselves against the bite of the rattlesnake itself.*

To some persons, those animals which in general estimation have a most disgusting appearance furnish an agreeable article of food. Depons informs us that, on the banks of the Lake Tacarigua, in South America, the Indians and some of the Spaniards make their most delicious meal on the iguana, a kind of lizard of a greenish colour, and about too feet and a half long. This to persons unaccustomed to it would form a most loathsome dish. Dr. Shaw was told, that in Cairo and in its vicinity upwards of forty thousand persons lived on lizards and serpents only. The savage devours with avidity the vermin that prey upon him. In some countries, frogs are esteemed a delicate dish. Locusts at times sweep the face of a country like a conflagration. No green thing escapes their devouring tooth, and ruin marks their progress. But, besides furnishing a rich feast to the locust-bird, starlings, sparrows, and swallows, their myriads yield a nutritious repast to the Arab; and thus in some measure compensate the desolation which they have occasioned.

* Ulloa, Voyage Historique, &c., liv. i. c. 6, & liv. vi. c. 10. —The habilla de Carthagena is a sort of bean which grows on a kind of willow. It is about an inch broad, nine lines long, flat and heart-shaped. It is of an extremely hot nature, and an ordinary dose is less than the fourth part of a bean or kernel. For an account of the rattlesnake herb, by which the natives of Louisiana heal the bite of that snake, see Le Page de Pratz, History of Louisiana, vol. ii. pp. 43—73, English translation.—Carver's Travels, p. 482.

Horses, cows, dogs, and fowls, seem to have an innate sense of their danger from snakes, and show evident symptoms of fear in approaching them, even when dead; but hogs, so far from being afraid of them, pursue and devour them with the greatest avidity, totally regardless of their bites.—Corver's Travels, p. 483. Weld's Travels, vol. i. pp. 202-3. Captain Seely, in his "Wonders of Ellora," p. 452, second edition, speaks of the mongos, a little animal of the ferret kind, which eagerly fights large snakes, provided a particular grass grow near. If bitten, it eats a quantity of this grass, vomits, rolls itself on the ground, and again engages in the combat; but it will by no means act offensively if this particular grass be not at hand. For mongos, see also Edinburgh Cabinet Library, vol. viii. p. 36.

The bee may sting; but it furnishes us with honey and wax. Some insects toil diligently in our service; and others, which at first sight seem useless or loathsome, may be applied to beneficial purposes. The silk-worm provides for us the materials of a fine attire. The cochineal imparts a beautiful colour to our raiment. Leeches, cantharides, and other inferior animals, can be made to contribute to the preservation of our health, or the removal of our diseases. Many small animals may, no doubt, be applied to valuable purposes with which we are yet unacquainted. Here, as in other departments of nature, there is room for patient observation and careful experiment; for the exercise of ingenuity and the progress of discovery. We many never, perhaps, find out all the uses of every species of insects, but even at present we know enough to justify the ways of God to man.

Thus, when we survey the inferior animals, we perceive that their vast number and variety exhibit a brilliant display of the perfections of Deity. Wisdom and goodness are manifested in the bodily organization and instinctive propensities of every species, as well as in the provision made for supplying their wants. When viewed in reference to man, they harmonize with other parts of the scene in which he is placed, serving to awaken his vigilance and activity, to exercise his ingenuity, to aid him in his labours, to supply his wants, and to diversify his enjoyments.

Why, it may be inquired, do living creatures prey upon one another? Why do not all animated beings on earth live together in harmony, and with mutual affection partake of the common bounty of the Creator? That animals prey on each other cannot be denied. Their doing so is agreeable to the constitution of nature; for the bodily conformation of some of them furnishes unequivocal evidence that they were designed to wage war against others; and fact corresponds with the indication. A scene of hostility pervades the ocean, and prevails to a considerable extent on dry land. Among the inhabitants of the waters, the strongest, with a few exceptions, prey voraciously upon the weaker. Flight and pursuit, escaping from one and devouring another, constitute their employment. On land, the lion and tiger encounter each other; both of these prey upon other quadrupeds, and attack even man himself. Man also is a carnivorous animal.

The hostility that prevails among sentient beings exhibits a strange scene; and seems, at first sight, to militate against the attribute of goodness, in the Author of the system. But when we reflect that this scene in a great measure stands alone, and is everywhere surrounded by plain indications of benignity, we must feel ourselves constrained to pause before we come to any conclusion unfavourable to the perfections of Deity. Although we could give no explanation whatever of this phenomenon, yet in the midst of so many proofs of goodness, it would rather become us humbly to acknowledge our ignorance, than to impeach the attributes of the Author of all our mercies. Puzzling as the fact under consideration may appear, we need not abandon it in despair, as incapable of explanation. The following observations may satisfy us that it is not incompatible with that wisdom and goodness which are so obvious in the general constitution of the world.

First, Immortality upon this earth, as Dr. Paley has justly observed, is out of the question. On the supposition of immortality here, it is obvious that the process of propagation must soon terminate. The world would soon be replenished with inhabitants; there would be no room for more, and a great source of animal happiness would be dried up. The term of life assigned to different animals can form no objection; for if we object to the short term of a day, we may object on the same principle to a hundred years, or to any other limited period; and still ask, why was not the term of life longer? The consonancy of death with wisdom and goodness must be admitted; and the term of life assigned to any animal cannot fairly be urged as an objection. The whole question then is reduced to this point: the manner in which the sentence of death is carried into execution. This can be only by the decays of nature, by disease, or by violence. When the animal dies by violence, I apprehend that, generally speaking, it suffers much less pain, than when it dies by the decays of nature, or by the operation of disease. The pain may be more intense, but it is of much shorter duration.

Harsh seems the ordinance, that life by life
Should be sustain'd; and yet when all must die,
And be like water spilt upon the ground,
Which none can gather up,—the speediest fate,
Though violent and terrible, is best.*

Man, under the decays of nature or the pressure of disease, has commonly some tender friend to sympathize with him, and to assist him. When he is destitute of this sympathy and assistance, we deem his condition the most deplorable to which a human being can be exposed. Who, without feeling his heart melt within him, can think of the aged or sick Indian in the wilds of Canada, unable any longer to travel with his band, covered over in the depth of winter with a few bushes, and left alone to perish with cold, and hunger, and disease? But the beast, not under the immediate protection of man, that dies by disease or old age, is in a state resembling that of the Indian. A violent death abridges instead of increasing suffering.

Secondly, The present constitution of things does not diminish the happiness of the inferior animals during life; they are afflicted by no painful anticipations. Attack and defence, flight and pursuit exercise their activity, and seem to constitute no small part of their enjoyments. The ocean is a great scene of hostility, and so far as we are able to judge of its inhabitants, their pleasure is not small. It seems in no degree lessened by the perpetual war that is going on. On the dry land, the dangers to which animals are liable do not deprive them of the happiness of which their natures are susceptible. It is only in the moment of actual suffering from violence that the present constitution of things gives the animal any pain.

Thirdly, While the present constitution of things does not appear to subtract from the happiness of sentient beings during life, and while it abridges the pains of death, it is the means of providing subsistence for a greater number and variety of animals than could have otherwise existed in the world, and thus increases the general sum of happiness. If all animals had been herbivorous only, it is obvious that the same number and variety of them could not have subsisted in the same place, as may do so according to the present constitution. But, within certain limits, which have never yet been exceeded, the more numerous animals are, the greater is the sum total of happiness on earth. I have already had occasion to observe, that the fecundity of the several tribes of animals is well suited to their several terms of life, and to the dangers and waste to which they are exposed. Not one species perishes by the voracity of others. The predaceous kinds are not nearly so numerous as those of a more mild and inoffensive nature; there are thousands of sheep for one tiger; innumerable larks for one eagle.

The fecundity of animals enables us to regulate the numbers of any kind, according to our wants or our pleasure. It is also the means of filling up the blank where man does not dwell. Such is the constitution of nature, that if we turn up the soil in any spot, it will ere long be clothed with verdure, although we sow nothing there. Seeds will find their way to the place. In like manner, although man retire from any part of the earth, it will not remain an untenanted wilderness. Some of the inferior tribes will take possession of it. It will still be a scene of life and of enjoyment. If man return, he can make the inferior animals of every kind retire before him, contribute to his subsistence, or aid him in his labours.

The depredations of animals, then, upon each other is only an apparent, not a real evil: it forms no solid objection against the goodness of Deity, for it does not appear to diminish the happiness of any animal during life. It abridges suffering at death, and furnishes subsistence to a greater number of animals than could otherwise live on the earth. Moreover, the inferior animals have no moral nature to be depraved by the system of depredation, or to be improved by the sufferings preceding death in the slow decays of nature, or in the progress of disease. Man may act towards them in such a way as to deprave his moral faculties: wanton cruelty will harden his heart. But if he make only a legitimate use of his dominion, he may avail himself of them, either to assist him in his labours, or to supply his wants, without any perversion or debasement of his nature.

3. The pains and sorrows to which man is exposed from his constitution, and the circumstances in which he is placed.

We may here take notice of an objection on which some persons seem to lay considerable stress. They complain that the progress of population always presses upon or outstrips the means of subsistence, and that the consequent unavoidable misery is an evidence that the Author of Nature is careless about human happiness. This constitution, however, is in exact accordance with the other parts of the system, and produces most beneficial effects: it calls forth exertion, sharpens ingenuity, prompts to the appropriation and culture of the soil, and to the arts and improvements which enrich and adorn society; it spreads mankind over the different parts of the globe, and conducts the genial stream of knowledge and civilization to every country. The band of wandering savages subsists by gathering the spontaneous productions of the earth, and by hunting and fishing. When their numbers multiply they seek an addition to their precarious maintenance by a partial cultivation of the ground. The principle of multiplication, acting as a propelling power, presses them forward in the career of agricultural improvement. Arts are invented, commerce is undertaken, the variety of roots, fruits, and grains is accommodated to a growing community.

* Montgomery's Pelican Island.

When by a skilful agriculture, and a judicious adjustment of crops, the soil is made to produce the greatest possible quantity of human food, then cultivation has attained perfection. In no country, however, has agriculture hitherto reached this point; for in many parts even of China, of the great population of which so much has been said, the cultivation of the earth is in a very imperfect state. Unoccupied or thinly inhabited regions are open to receive an overflowing, or discontented and restless population, just as some part of our native country commonly receives us when we quit the paternal roof which sheltered our infant and youthful years. These emigrants carry along with them part of the manners and attainments of their native land, and diffuse knowledge and civilization more widely over the earth. In this way industry is kept in constant activity, and mankind are gradually improved. But while the principle of population is of such vast and beneficial importance in the course of human affairs, it is not to be forgotten that the passions and appetites ought to be under the guidance of reason; and that marriage ought not to be entered into, without foresight and a due consideration of circumstances. In densely peopled countries, prudential restraints operate as a silent, but powerful check on the increase of the species. Instead, however, of dwelling on this subject, we shall pass on to other topics.

From the constitution of our nature, and the circumstances in which we are placed, we are unavoidably exposed to occasional pain, grief, and disease; and we must at last die. Pain, grief, and disease are sometimes entirely owing to the abuse of free agency; and sometimes they are greatly increased by it. In so far as they flow from this source, we have ourselves to blame; and this part of the subject has been considered in a preceding section. At present, it is only that portion of pain and grief to which we are unavoidably exposed by the constitution of our nature and the circumstances in which we are placed that claims our attention. This, comparatively speaking, forms but a small portion of human suffering. If from the sum total we subtract the product of imprudence, folly, and vice, we will leave but a small remainder behind: and with respect to this remainder, it is the result of wise general laws, and is productive of good effects.

Our body is a material fabric, and must be subject to those general laws by which matter is governed. General laws, as we have already seen, are highly advantageous. Without them we would be altogether at a loss how to act. They are beacons for the regulation of our conduct. Yet from their operation partial evils may arise. The law of gravitation is good; but a stone may fall, and hurt or kill a man; or a man may fall and be hurt or killed. But why were we made susceptible of pain? To this it may be replied, that we cannot easily conceive a material being susceptible of pleasure, and not also susceptible of pain. Certain it is that pain is often the means of giving a higher relish to pleasure, while its removal is a source of sweet enjoyment. It is even productive of good effects in the measure in which we are exposed to it; for who would wish to be deprived of that sensibility which is the occasion of pain? We may even go farther, and assert that it proves benevolent intention, for it is never inflicted on us merely for its own sake, but is a sentinel to watch over our preservation and our happiness.

What has been said of pain may be applied in some measure to grief. Some sorrows are counterbalanced by concomitant pleasures. "The joy of grief," at first sight, may seem a solecism in language; but the propriety and beauty of the expression are recognized by those who have attended to the operations of their own minds. I pass over the griefs which arise from false estimates, lofty pretensions, violent passions, and the whims of a sickly and perverted imagination. They are the creatures of our own folly, and can never with justice be set down in the account against our Creator. The mortifications, the griefs, and the sufferings from political institutions of society, fall under free agency. If men chose, those things might be otherwise. If the institutions are really best for all, there is no reason to complain of them. If they be the means of sacrificing the happiness of the many to the interests or caprice of the few, this is an abuse of free agency, and falls under the observations made in a former section.

Similar remarks may be applied to bodily disease. Where there is no neglect or perversion of our means, no abuse of free agency, disease does not often occur. It is a common and a true observation, that exercise and temperance are the best physicians. Most persons find occasion for the first of these in the course of their lawful avocations: it is our own fault if we neglect the last. By industry we are able, generally speaking, to procure the means of satisfying the desires of nature: to pamper luxury is injurious to health; for if one die of hunger, or of disease induced by too spare a diet, ten hasten their dissolution by repletion and surfeiting. When we consider the complicated mechanism of the human body, and the variety of circumstances in which we may be placed without injury, we are justified in saying that health is not easily impaired. It often remains uninjured, or is but little affected, although the body be in very different states and circumstances.

The decays of old age, or long continued disease, reconcile us to dissolution. The love of life, in general, is sufficiently strong to induce us to use every means in our power for its preservation, and to submit to all our trials rather than resign it. Still the mind, as well as the body, is gradually prepared for a change. Death has a formidable aspect to a person in health; but to one who has passed through the gradually declining stages of old age, or of lingering sickness, it has lost much of its terrors. Every step prepares for that which is to follow. Death is the lot of humanity, and the time when we shall undergo that change is uncertain. This uncertainty is a wise appointment. It preserves the spur to caution and activity, neither checking the spirit of enterprise by the prospect of impending dissolution, nor yet encouraging temerity, presumption, or procrastination, by the certainty of a prolongation of life.

This world is not a place for our everlasting residence. Here we cannot reach the perfections of our nature; and if we could, this earth would be found an unsuitable habitation. It would present too many causes of irritation, and would not afford adequate sources of enjoyment. It is fitted merely for the introductory stage of our progressive being. It is admirably adapted to our intellectual and moral improvement in that stage; and we are called off before the scene becomes unmeet for us. The generations of the human race pass away in succession to another state of existence, and this succession seems accommodated to the greatest sum total of happiness on earth. The young have the keenest relish for the world and its enjoyments. True, indeed, the evening of a good man's days is by no means comfortless; but his chief happiness arises from the retrospect of a well spent life, and the anticipation of a nobler state of being. In this world, we pass through a course of education for a better.

Is it objected that many of the human race make little or no improvement, either intellectual or moral? If they neglect their talents and opportunities, the blame is their own; and their misconduct can form no objection against the Author of their existence, and fountain of their mercies. Do you complain that you are cut off in the midst of your days? Your constitution is not indestructible, and in certain circumstances, you expose yourself to disease, which, operating according to general laws, may terminate fatally. In this, however, there is no chance, for chance is introduced only when knowledge ends; it is merely the operation of general laws to which we may not have duly attended. Many children die. But that so many infants die, is owing, in no small degree, to carelessness and mismanagement. In some foundling hospitals, scarcely any survive. In healthy situations, with healthy and attentive parents, few die. If children were not liable to death, parents would be utterly careless; but by the existing constitution of things, the carelessness of parents is punished by the wounds which the death of children inflicts on parental affection. As to the future state of children, we need have no difficulty in confiding it to that great and gracious Being who gives such innumerable instances of goodness in every department of nature around us.

Men are placed in very different circumstances in the world, and exposed to a variety of vicissitudes. But difference of external circumstances seems to occasion no diminution of happiness. The labourer who earns his daily bread by the sweat of his brow, is as healthy and as happy as he who wears a crown. The one is insensible to what we consider the hardships of his condition, the other is familiar with what we think his enjoyments; and in point of happiness, habit, and sentiment, have set them nearly on a level. That constitution of things by which trials overtake us, is adapted to the state of discipline in which we are placed, and aids conscience in indicating the path of duty, by checking our aberrations, curbing our passions, and producing salutary effects both on our intellectual and moral nature.

Without trial and suffering, both in ourselves and others, some of our best affections would lie dormant, and some of the noblest energies of our nature have no room for action. Where can courage, and fortitude, and patience, be acquired and displayed, but in the face of difficulties, and under the pressure of affliction? The skilful and intrepid mariner does not acquire his knowledge, dexterity, and courage, on the bosom of the sleeping lake. He must encounter the hardships and perils of the tempest. The hardy and fearless warrior is not trained in the calm sequestered vale of pastoral life: he must mingle in the fatigue, noise, and carnage of martial achievements. In like manner, the candidate for moral and intellectual excellence must not slumber away life on a bed of down: he must submit to laborious exertion and severe trial. How is a compassionate sympathy excited, except by scenes of sorrow and suffering? Hence the Hebrew sage, who was no inattentive observer of the moral tendencies of our nature, says, "It is better to go to the house of mourning than go to the house of feasting; for by the sadness of the countenance the heart is made better." Our sufferings and sorrows, even when they produce no salutary effect on ourselves, may prove beneficial to others. Prosperity and adversity are different modes of education and trial, and our limited knowledge does not enable us to say which of them, in any given case, requires the steadiest exercise of virtue, or is the most efficacious means of improvement. In a higher stage of existence there may be no need for courage, fortitude, patience, and pity; because there danger and suffering, may be unknown. But there may be need for the temper formed by those virtues.

We have seen that the terraqueous globe is admirably fitted up as a place of residence for sentient beings; and a gradation of sentient beings is consistent with the wisdom and goodness of Deity. To deny this were, in effect, to deny that any creature could exist in a consistency with the divine perfections. If we declare it to be incompatible with wisdom and goodness to form creatures in any one point of the scale, we may, with equal propriety, make a similar declaration with respect to any other point. The earth is replenished with a great variety of animals, and it is fitted for being a scene of enjoyment to every species. Many of the kinds prey upon others; but this constitution impairs the happiness of none: it is the means of supporting a greater number than could otherwise have found subsistence, and consequently increases the sum of enjoyment. Man is the noblest inhabitant of the earth, and has dominion over the inferior creatures, He is a rational being, a free agent, the subject of moral government. He may abuse his liberty, and subject himself to a corresponding punishment. But this punishment results from his own perversity, and cannot be pleaded as an objection against the wisdom and goodness of God; for the agent might have acted otherwise, and not only avoided the punishment, but enjoyed reward. Moral evil, therefore, and all its consequences, must at once be laid out of the question, when estimating the perfections of Deity by his works and government.

The inferior animals are guided by instinct, and their nature is stationary. Man, however, is not only a rational but a progressive being; and he is endued with a restless activity. Here he is placed in a school, not seated at a banquet; and both his improvement and happiness are promoted by exertion. Everything around us is fitted to our constitution, to stimulate activity, to encourage hope, to reward industry. Nature does not spontaneously supply our wants and gratify our desires, but she yields to our ingenuity and diligence. A succession of wants and desires prompts to a repetition of exertions, and promotes progressive improvement. Difficulties occur; but they are not insuperable: they awaken our energies and exercise our talents. The prize is within our reach; but we must run vigorously in order to obtain it. The victory may be acquired, but we must combat valiantly in order to remain masters of the field. Of this constitution of things men may complain; they may complain that we must run to obtain the prize, that the crown is not set upon our head till we are qualified to wear it. This, however, is the only constitution of things suited to our nature. If we were placed in a scene where every want was easily and instantaneously supplied, and every wish at once gratified without contrivance or exertion; where there was no room for hope or fear, for ingenuity or activity, for the operation of the affections of the heart or the powers of the understanding, we would be torpid creatures, overwhelmed with melancholy languor, and scarcely able to support the burden of life. But the vicissitudes and trials to which we are exposed call forth our energies, awaken the noblest sensibilities of our nature, and strengthen our best affections.

Disease is not unfrequently the means of leading to the path of virtue; it has a salutary operation on our moral constitution, and prepares us for the rewards of obedience. Death is a departure from the present scene; and we have good reason to conclude that, with respect to those who have acted virtuously here, it is a transition to a more exalted state of being. No virtuous person, then, has reason to complain: the vicious ought to direct their murmurs and complaints, not against the Author of their existence and their enjoyments, but against their own folly and perversity in disobeying the dictates of reason and conscience, and so forfeiting that happiness which the bountiful Creator has placed within their reach.

BOOK IV.

THE GOSPEL.

CHAPTER I.

THE GOSPEL A MESSAGE FROM GOD.

Having attended to the evidence of Nature in support of the being, perfections, and government of God, we shall now listen to the testimony of Revelation on the same interesting topics. The Deity evidently appears in his works; but there we see only the great outlines of his character, and these outlines dimly and at a distance. We see so much of Him that we can be in no mistake as to his existence and some of his attributes; but we have only a general notion of his character, as we have of the features of a person whom we see in the twilight. If we wish to obtain a nearer and more distinct view of the perfections of the Creator, we must turn to the Jewish and Christian Scriptures, which throw a bright glory around the throne of our Father.

Jesus addresses us as the prophet of the church and "the light of the world." He speaks with authority as the ambassador of God and the Saviour of men; promises the noblest rewards to his faithful and obedient followers; and denounces vengeance against those who refuse to listen to his voice and walk in his way. As he assumes such an authoritative tone, and enforces his doctrine by such lofty sanctions, it is natural and interesting to inquire upon what grounds his pretentions rest, and how he proves his commission from God. Therefore, before entering on the consideration of his doctrines, we shall glance at the proofs of his mission; although it is not intended to enter fully into the evidences of the gospel, but merely to make a few short remarks on the subject; and we assume the facts recorded in the evangelical history as true, in so far at least as they are not miraculous. That Jesus lived in Judea, and was put to death as a malefactor in the reign of Tiberius Cæsar, is attested by heathen historians as well as by Jews and Christians. We may as well deny that Tiberius Cæsar was emperor, and Pontius Pilate procurator of Judea, as deny the leading facts recorded in the history of Jesus. Besides, in the gospel all the allusions to manners, customs, and opinions, to natural and to civil history, and to local circumstances, are strictly correct. This gives no small degree of credit to the narration. Assuming, then, the truth of the ordinary facts in the gospel, the question is, whether, in all the circumstances of the case, we have sufficient reason to believe the miraculous facts, and to receive the doctrine as the word of God.

The single fact of the resurrection of Jesus Christ draws after it the divinity of his mission and the truth of his doctrine. Concerning many things that have been stated as doctrines of Jesus, Christians may dispute among themselves. But how much soever those disputes may affect the peculiar creed of sects or of individuals, they make no impression on the divine mission of Christ, or on the truth of the doctrines which he really taught. If we have credible evidence of his resurrection from the dead, according to his own prediction, we have at the same time credible evidence of the divinity of his mission, and truth of his religion. Overturn the evidence of the resurrection, and you destroy the claims of Jesus as a teacher sent from God; but if you establish his resurrection, you place his divine mission and the truth of his doctrine beyond the reach of suspicion. At the tomb of Jesus the great controversy between the infidel and the believer must be decided.

The evidence that Christ rose from the dead, although it do not obviate every cavil and silence every gainsayer, is such as may satisfy the sober and candid inquirer after truth. Jesus repeatedly foretold his resurrection. This cannot in fair argument be denied. The reality of the prediction is closely connected with an ordinary fact, the stationing of a Roman guard at the sepulchre. The prediction cannot be denied without also denying that a guard watched the tomb; for the one was the cause of the other. If any person refuse to admit this, he may just as well deny any other historical fact, the crucifixion, or even the very existence of Christ. With the extravagance of Boulanger and Dupuis, he may maintain that Jesus and his twelve apostles were merely personifications of the sun and of the twelve signs of the zodiac; or, with the ignorant and unblushing effrontery of others, he may assert that Jesus selected his disciples from among the learned men of his nation. But the reveries of the disordered imaginations of fanatics in infidelity and atheism are not to be substituted in the room of the dictates of sound reason and the genuine records of history. Unless historical evidence is to be entirely set aside, the stationing of the guard, and consequently the prediction of the resurrection, must be admitted.

Now, for a person to foretell his own resurrection from the dead, and to suspend, as Jesus did, the credit of his character and claims upon the accomplishment of this singular prediction, is surely, in a person of a sound understanding, as Jesus unquestionably was, a very surprising circumstance. But when we see this singular and unprecedented prediction fulfilled, we cannot account for it in any other way, than by admitting the divine mission and inspiration of Him who uttered it. We have, however, credible and satisfactory evidence that this prediction of Jesus was fulfilled. Without entering minutely into circumstances, or stating the proof of the resurrection in detail, we shall mention merely one branch of the evidence; the plain and decisive testimony of eleven men. With respect to the fact under consideration, those eleven men could not themselves be deceived, and we have no reason whatever to suspect that they had any intention of deceiving others. They could not themselves be deceived. Their opportunities of obtaining certain information preclude this supposition. They were not easy of belief. One of them, in presence of the rest, examined the fact with all the jealous attention of incredulity. His doubts were completely removed, and his faith firmly established.

As we cannot imagine that these eleven men were themselves deceived, shall we suppose that there was a collusion among them to deceive the world? Both their characters and their circumstances set this supposition aside. Everything on the face of the record, the whole tenor of the gospel history, proclaims them honest men. Indeed, none but honest men would have acted the part they did. They had no worldly motive to declare that their Master was risen from the dead. They well knew that from this they were not to derive either ease, or honour, or emolument. Obloquy, persecution, and death, were the only fruits which they could expect to reap from their testimony. They must, then, have acted from a thorough conviction of the truth of the fact which they published, and from a full persuasion of its unspeakable importance to their own happiness, and to the best interests of the human race. Any apparent discrepancy in their account of the event merely shows that they did not act in concert, but in no degree invalidates their testimony. The resurrection of Jesus is only one instance of the great argument arising from prophecy and miracles. It combines the two. It is a miracle in fulfilment of the prophecy. Instead, however, of a more minute discussion of this subject, we shall take a cursory view of the evidence of the divine mission of Jesus as resulting from miracles, from prophecy, from the character of Jesus, and from the intrinsic excellence of the gospel. It is not our intention to treat of these at large, but merely to make a few remarks, corresponding rather with the brevity of the other parts of this treatise, than with the importance of the subject under consideration.

Even the possibility of a revelation from God has been denied: and were the thing impossible, it were mere trifling to adduce evidence that it had actually happened, for no evidence could prove it true. The impossibility, however, of a divine revelation is not only a gratuitous but an absurd assumption. For if there be a God, wise and good, by whom all things exist, as we think has been already proved, then it is pure folly to deny the possibility, either physical or moral, of his communicating the knowledge of his will to his rational offspring. Has his potent arm projected the planets in their orbits; has he endued us with organs of sense, with instinct and with reason, and can he not impart to us the knowledge of his will, and of our duty? Has he made a liberal provision for the beasts of the field and the fowls of the air, and shall be withhold instruction from his erring children? Has he provided, in the natural world, for the removal or our bodily disorders, and shall he neglect our moral diseases? Let the cheerless partisan of infidelity brood over these absurdities, and flatter his own guilty passions by denying the existence, or limiting the perfections of the Creator; but let every one who is desirous of knowing his duty, and of rising to intellectual and moral excellence, rejoice in the full persuasion, that the Sovereign of the universe can easily communicate the knowledge of his will to all on whom he has bestowed understanding, and that he will not withhold instruction from the subjects of his government.

It has been alleged that revelation was unnecessary. But if it appear that "the world by wisdom knew not God," then the expediency of revelation is manifest. We may, with perfect certainty, discover the existence of the Almighty by his works and government; and we are capable, in some degree, of acquiring a knowledge of the perfections of his nature, from the same sources. Accordingly, some heathen writers have expressed many just sentiments concerning the attributes of God, and the duty of man; but without either the certainty or precision of revelation. Their doctrine, however, had no influence on the opinions, worship, or conduct of the multitude. The mass of mankind are neither qualified nor inclined to follow any chain of reasoning, nor to trace the links of a system. They need to have the truth set before them in a plain and practical manner, and enforced by solemn and affecting sanctions. With the single exception of the Hebrews, let us take any ancient nation of which we have an authentic record, and we will find their faith, worship, and practice, at variance with the dictates of sound reason. Let us take any modern nation, such as the Chinese or Hindoos, where the creed of the people has in no degree been influenced and modified by the Jewish and Christian Scriptures, and we will find their faith and their worship equally absurd.

As far then as an experiment of vast extent, and carried on in almost every possible variety of circumstances, can enable us to judge, we may fairly pronounce, that, without a revelation, neither the faith, worship, nor practice of the bulk of mankind would have been consistent with sound reason. Perhaps one great cause of postponing the appearance of Jesus Christ till such a late period was, that men might have an experimental proof of this important truth, and be led to a grateful sense of the value of the gospel; for if, in the face of such a mass of evidence to the contrary, some persons plead that there was no need of a revelation, this plea might have been far more plausibly urged, if the state of the world without a revelation had never been exhibited to view. But the history of mankind, previous to the appearance of the Son of God, evinces the expediency of a divine revelation; and some of the wisest of the heathens were sensible of their need of such a blessing.

The denial of the possibility of a revelation requires no common measure of effrontery: and an impartial review of the state of the world previous to the Christian dispensation must satisfy every candid and serious inquirer of the expediency of such a communication from heaven. Jesus Christ laid claim to the character of a teacher sent from God; and, if called upon to show his commission, instead of any abstract reasoning, to which few would have attended, and which still fewer would have understood, he appealed to miracles, which multitudes could attest, and which force conviction equally on the untutored and on the cultivated mind; or to predictions contained in well known books, written many ages before. We have already taken notice of his resurrection, and shall now shortly attend to his miracles, and the prophecies concerning him.

1. The miracles performed by Jesus attest his divine mission.

We may consider a miracle as a transgression or suspension of the established laws of nature. What those laws are, on any given subject, observation and experience must determine; and in some cases phenomena may occur, concerning which it may not be easy to decide whether they be miraculous or otherwise. In other instances there is no room for any doubt of this kind. The restoration of life to one really dead, giving sight to the blind, and health to the sick, instantaneously, and by merely uttering a word, may, without doubt or hesitation, be pronounced miraculous. They are evidently out of the ordinary course of nature.

I see no impossibility in miracles, either in a physical or moral point of view. To talk of the unalterable constitution of nature is assuming everything. If the constitution of nature be unalterable, it must be so, either because the Creator is unable, or because he is unwilling to change it. That he is unable to change it is not true; for, to suspend or to transgress the established laws of nature, cannot require a greater power than what was necessary for the establishment of those laws. We have already seen that an all-powerful Being constructed the fabric of the universe, and it is obvious that he is able, at pleasure, either to suspend or to transgress the laws which he has established. We are not to conceive of miracles as intended to remedy any physical imperfection, any original or accidental defect in the system of nature, but as designed to manifest to the world the interposition of the Almighty for purposes of a moral kind; to prove to men that He addresses them. The general laws by which the world is governed were established for wise and good purposes; and if, in any case, wise and good purposes can be served by a departure from them, what hinders the Creator from such a departure? The laws are subject to the will of the Creator, and he may discover wisdom and goodness in occasional departure from them, as much as in varying and accommodating means to the accomplishment of ends in the original constitution of the laws.

That miracles are contrary to all experience is not true. To affirm it is a gratuitous assumption of the whole matter in dispute. They are different from the experience of those only who have not seen them; and we are never to set up our negative experience as the standard and measure of truth; for experience is only one source of knowledge. The king of Siam refused to believe the Dutch ambassador, who told him that in his country water became so hard in cold weather that men walked upon it, and that it would bear even an elephant if he were there; but we know that water freezes. The South Sea Islanders, when first visited by our circumnavigators, had no way of subjecting water to the action of fire, and had therefore no conception that water could burn them; but they learned the fact by painful experience. In like manner, although we have not seen miracles, this is no evidence that others have not seen them.

From the very notion of a miracle, it must be something that seldom happens. What happens often, we have reason to think, happens according to a general law. A miracle, however, is a deviation from the general law; it seldom happens, and consequently few, comparatively speaking, can be witnesses of it. The evidence necessary to prove miracles is of the same kind with what is necessary to prove any other matter of fact; the testimony of our own senses or the testimony of other men; and the proof is equally valid to all succeeding generations. In order to determine the truth of an event, it has been required that it be such as men's outward senses, their eyes and ears, may judge of; that it be done publicly in the face of the world; and that there be memorials of it commencing from the time when the event happened. Events may have happened where all these circumstances do not meet; but in cases where they all meet, no doubts can be entertained. All these marks apply to the miracles of Jesus. They were such as men's external senses could judge of. He instantaneously healed the sick and the lame, and opened the eyes of the blind; he calmed the raging of the sea, and even raised the dead. Those miracles Jesus performed, not in a few instances only, or before a few individuals; not in the presence of friends and admirers merely: and not before the ignorant and credulous only: but he performed them frequently and publicly, and in the presence of promiscuous multitudes, many of whom were his most determined enemies, watching him with a jealous and malignant eye, scrutinizing every circumstance, and ready to detect every fraud, if there had been any. Those hostile persons were the most enlightened men in the Jewish nation, in an enlightened age.

The account of miracles was published immediately, and in the places where they had been performed. Those miracles the most malignant enemies of Jesus, and they who had the best opportunities of examining the facts, never pretended to deny. They admitted them, because they were so decisively proved that there was no room left for the suspicion of deception. If they, then, who were present on the spot at the time, and had the best opportunities of investigating all the circumstances connected with those miracles, found themselves constrained to admit their truth; and if, in this admission, Celsus and Julian, and other early infidels agreed, it is with a bad grace that any in our days pretend to deny them. They must be admitted, unless we set aside entirely the evidence of historical testimony; and when admitted we must account for them in the best way we can. The enemies of Jesus, finding themselves unable to deny the reality of his miracles, were reduced to the necessity of endeavouring to account for them, in a way consistent with their opinion, that he was not a teacher sent from God. To their account of the matter let us shortly attend; and, consider, first, Whether any being but God has the power of working miracles; and, secondly, Whether the miracles of Jesus are such as wicked spirits would willingly concur in performing.

First, The power of working miracles, so far as we know or have any reason to believe, is inherent in God only. He established the laws of nature; he still superintends the workmanship of his hands; and we know of no power, but that to which the laws of nature owe their origin, which can either transgress or suspend those laws. If we, therefore, find any agent at pleasure transgressing or suspending them, we are led to conclude that he acts under the authority, and is supported by the power, of Him by whom the laws were established. Miracles are visible proofs of divine power, in approbation of him by whom they are performed. They are the seal of Heaven, and show the concurrence of the great Ruler of the universe. Accordingly, mankind have always acknowledged them as evidence of a divine mission. The Jew, who had received his sight, reasoned agreeably to the general sense of men of every age. "We know that God heareth not sinners: but if any man be a worshipper of God, and doeth his will, him he heareth. If this man were not of God, he could do nothing."*

Secondly, What are we to think of the allegation of those Jews who ascribed the miracles of Jesus to the agency of wicked spirits. That such beings exist in the universe is no unreasonable supposition; and revelation informs us of the fact. Free agents of a much higher order than man may abuse their liberty, and may pervert and misapply their faculties to mischievous purposes. The devil and his angels do so. But we have no reason to believe that they are able to disturb the laws of nature in their operation, or to prevent their effects. We have no evidence whatever that any creature, either good or bad, has power to suspend the laws of nature, without the authority of Him by whom those laws were established. No good being would make the attempt for a bad purpose; no bad being would do so for a good purpose. Now, the doctrine of Jesus was so pure and heavenly, that no evil spirit would have attempted anything for its confirmation. Here the external and the internal evidences of the gospel mutually support each other. If depraved beings had exerted their power for the confirmation of the doctrine of Jesus, their empire would have been divided against itself, and must have fallen into ruin. The supposition that the miracles of Jesus were done by magic will obtain no credit in our day, and therefore need not detain us. The most zealous infidel will not venture to allege it; as even the gross credulity of his brethren would not receive it.

There are no phenomena, either in the natural or in the moral world, that countenance the supposition of any creature whatever being permitted to work miracles for the purpose of deceiving and misleading the children of men, without the evidence resulting from their operations being destroyed by superior evidence. The wise men of Egypt wrought miracles, or the semblance of miracles; but they were defeated by the superior power of Moses and Aaron, and obliged to confess that the finger of God was displayed in the works which the Hebrew sages performed. Considering all these things, it appears to us that the reasoning of Nicodemus, and the appeals of Jesus, are unanswerable. "Rabbi, we know that thou art a teacher come from God; for no man can do these miracles that thou doest, except God be with him." "Though ye believe not me, believe the works: that ye may know and believe that the Father is in me, and I in him."[*]

* John, ix. 31, 33.

2. Prophecy is the prediction of future and contingent events. It is a kind of miracle; and has a relation to the knowledge of God, as the miracles which we have been considering have to his power. The one is the work of Omniscience, the other of Omnipotence. Miracles of power convince at once, and, after being properly authenticated, their evidence always remains the same. Prophecy is no evidence of a divine mission at the time of its delivery, for we know not whether the prediction will be fulfilled. It becomes evidence only when it begins to receive its completion; and, when it relates to different events, the evidence resulting from it gradually becomes stronger till the whole be accomplished. The foresight of man is very limited. When a person of sagacity, who has had many opportunities of observation, and much experience of human affairs, sees matters in a certain train, he can, in many instances, with no inconsiderable degree of precision, foretell what the issue will be. But this foresight is circumscribed by narrow boundaries, and even within those boundaries it is liable to no small uncertainty. Some unforeseen accident may intervene, disturb the course of events, break the chain of connexion, and produce results different from those which were expected.

God, we may reasonably presume, is the only Being in the universe who perceives with certainty the future actions of free agents, and the remote consequences of all those laws of nature which he himself has established. Here we remark, that it is a gross abuse to argue from the divine prescience against the freedom of man. We may not be able clearly to reconcile them; and yet it may not follow that God is not omniscient, nor yet that man is not free. We have no good reason to believe that there is any incompatibility between the two. The whole difficulty of reconciling them lies in our incapacity. Of the divine omniscience we know but little, and in every case where any of the premises rest on our ignorance or incapacity, our conclusions may be very illogical. Prophecy, therefore, and the prescience of God, cannot logically be adduced as evidences against the freedom of man. Assuming it as a principle that God only foresees future, distant, and contingent events, it follows, that if we find any person predicting such events, and see those events happening agreeably to the prediction, we are authorized to conclude that the person was inspired by God, and employed in his service. In the sacred records, there are many predictions, on different subjects, which prove those who uttered them to have been under the influence of divine inspiration. But it is those which relate more immediately to Jesus, that at present engage our attention. They may be considered as of two kinds; first, those which foretold his advent; secondly, those which he himself delivered.

Of the first kind, we have not merely a few detached predictions of local, individual, and temporary interest, like the heathen oracles; but a great system of prophecy, delivered at distant periods through a long succession of ages, all pointing to the same person, and foretelling the same events. Those prophecies are not of a doubtful origin or ambiguous meaning. They are authentic and unmutilated records, which for many ages had been well known to the Jewish nation; and all the learned among that ancient people considered those predictions as foretelling the appearance of an illustrious personage, and a great revolution which he was to accomplish. Those predictions, like the morning light, gradually became clearer as the fulness of time approached; and they all terminate on Jesus, and receive their accomplishment in him. The family from which he was to spring, the place of his nativity, the time of his appearance, the works he was to perform, the sufferings he was to endure, and the nature and progress of his kingdom, were all the subjects of ancient prophecy. Those predictions had reached the ears, and attracted the notice of the Gentile world; and even heathen historians inform us that a general belief prevailed among oriental nations, that about that time a mighty prince was to appear in Judea. When we compare those predictions with the history of Jesus of Nazareth, we perceive such a correspondence between them, as constrains us to apply the predictions to him only, and to say, "This is he who was to come."

The predictions of Jesus himself bear a clear testimony to his divine character and mission. We have already seen that he foretold his own death and resurrection. The prediction was astonishing; its fulfilment is decisive evidence of his mission. We shall mention only one more of his predictions; that relating to the destruction of Jerusalem. It is recorded by the evangelist Matthew, in his twenty-fourth chapter. We have there an account of many minute circumstances that were to precede the siege, and that were to happen in its progress; and we have the dreadful catastrophe itself. The prediction was uttered at a time, and in circumstances, when no human sagacity could have foreseen the the calamitous event; and all, even the most minute circumstances of the prophecy, were exactly fulfilled. "The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy."

3. The character of Him in whom so many prophecies unite, and who performed so many miracles, is entitled to our attentive contemplation. It does not belie his claims, as the Son of God and the Captain of Salvation. It is the noblest, the most amiable and consistent character that is any where exhibited to us, either in the page of history or in the fictions of imagination. It is strongly marked by soundness of judgment, excellency of temper, and purity of morals. He displayed too much wisdom for a fanatic; too much virtue for an impostor. A majestic simplicity, fervent piety, integrity, candour, benevolence, temperance, meekness, and patience, all unite their charms, and shine with harmonious lustre in the character of Jesus of Nazareth. A devout veneration of God, and a dutiful regard to every divine command, appear throughout the whole of his conduct. His heart was often poured out in prayer to his Father. He delighted in the Sabbath and in the Sanctuary. To do the will of HIM who sent him was his constant study and supreme ambition. With him there was no bustling parade, no vain ostentation; all was sincere piety, and unaffected benevolence.

While his piety was free from superstition, from local or temporary prejudices, and from illiberal sentiments, benignity reigned in his heart, beamed on his countenance, and regulated his conduct. He was the friend of the friendless; the shield of those who had none to help them. He did not break the bruised reed, nor quench the smoking flax. He cherished every sentiment of humanity, and every aspiration after virtue. He was indefatigable in doing good to the souls and to the bodies of men; and in his labour of love, he persevered in spite of difficulties, calumny, and persecution. Active benevolence, patient fortitude, meek forbearance, and a forgiving disposition, were prominent features in his character. He was temperate, humble, and holy. His life is a perfect model of the fervour of devotion, and the dignity of virtue. Can there exist, for a moment, a suspicion that a person of such a sound understanding was himself deceived, or that such exalted virtue was concerned in imposture? It is impossible. The character of Jesus vouches the divinity of his mission, and the truth of his doctrine. What he enjoins on others, he himself practised. If his followers be called upon to walk in an arduous path, they are cheered by the sight of their Master proceeding in it steadily before them. In striving to obey his precepts, they are guided and encouraged by his example.

4. The doctrine of Jesus bears testimony to his character as a teacher sent from God. We assume it as a principle, that a revelation from God cannot contain anything contrary to sound reason; for both reason and revelation are the gift of God, and they are both bestowed upon us for the regulation of our hearts and lives. It were absurd to imagine that God has subjected us to two different and contrary teachers. He may subject us to two teachers, the one of which may communicate more information than the other; but there must be a congruity between them, so that by the lessons of our first instructer we may be able to judge of the truth and importance of the communications made to us by the second. Reason, as Bishop Butler has observed, is the only faculty we have wherewith to judge of anything, even revelation itself.

Revelation may inform us of truths which reason could never have discovered, or enjoin precepts which the dictates of nature do not teach us to observe. For example, it may inform us how transgressors of the divine law may obtain pardon and favour, or it may enjoin a particular time or manner of offering up our homage to God; points on which reason could not have made any certain discovery. Revelation may contain truths which our limited capacity cannot fully comprehend; and in this it will only harmonize with creation. In both we may perceive the same grandeur, and meet with similar difficulties. But these difficulties, instead of forming any solid objection against either, seem only to intimate that nature and revelation have a common Author. Our partial ignorance is a spur to attentive observation, and diligent inquiry.

[*] John, iii. 2.—x. 38.

While a revelation from God may contain truths which reason could never have discovered, or which our limited capacity cannot fully comprehend, it can contain nothing contrary to sound and unperverted reason: it must agree with the intellectual and moral perceptions of our nature. The doctrine of Jesus has this grand test of a divine revelation. It is consonant to the moral constitution of the human mind, and is in full accordance with the phenomena of the natural world. It decides what was doubtful, elucidates what was obscure, and imparts a new efficacy to what was formerly believed. It dispels the clouds which hung over the perfections and government of God, and gives a luminous view of the nature, state, duties, and prospects of man.

Mankind have always been conscious of the imperfection of their virtue, have been sensible of their guilt, and have had recourse to sacrificial expiations. The gospel teaches us that we have lost our native glory, labour under great moral disease, and are obnoxious to the penal visitations of the Almighty: it also teaches us that our heavenly Father, who with unwearied wisdom and goodness governs the universe, has mercifully devised a plan for our recovery; that he vouchsafes all needful aid to those who are earnestly desirous of treading in the paths of virtue; that he has provided a perfect propitiation for the sins of the world; and that they who make a wise and diligent improvement of the talents intrusted to their care shall be nobly rewarded, whereas they who neglect or abuse those talents shall be fearfully punished. It explicitly teaches the doctrine of immortality and future retribution, of which the human mind had always entertained some conception. In short, while it establishes a sublime faith, and a simple and spiritual worship, it inculcates an equitable and benevolent system of morals, which it enforces by the most exalted and awful sanctions. Some of these truths we shall afterwards more fully consider.

To be duly sensible of the excellency of the gospel, we must not forget the state of religion throughout the world when Jesus appeared. The nations professing themselves to be wise had become fools. They were wandering in darkness, and sitting in the shadow of death. With the exception of the Jews, polytheism universally prevailed. Among the multitude of deities which the heathen worshipped, there was not one irradiated with the attributes of purity, benevolence, and mercy: they were all capricious, selfish, revengeful. The faith of the nations was for the most part error; their practice for the most part vice. Even among the Hebrews, who enjoyed the lively oracles of God, religion was greatly corrupted. It was disfigured by vain traditions, and loaded with superstitious observances. But from the midst of this universal gloom the Sun of Righteousness burst forth with healing in his rays. By the breath of his mouth Jesus dissipated the clouds of error and delusion; he chased away the multitude of fictitious divinities that had usurped the empire of the moral world, and taught mankind to adore and obey one God, the Creator, Governor, and Judge of the universe. Instead of placing religion in rites and ceremonies, in gaudy pageants and costly sacrifices, he taught that we are to testify our reverence for God by living soberly, righteously, and piously, in the world. What a noble and rational view of religion does Jesus exhibit! How instructive, encouraging, and consolatory! His doctrine is adapted to the wants, the fears, and the hopes of man. And are we to suppose that a poor illiterate Jew, attended by a few ignorant and obscure fishermen from the Lake Tiberias, without supernatural aid, soared so far above the loftiest conceptions of the most illustrious sages of the heathen world, taught lessons of wisdom and virtue to which even Socrates would have listened with admiration and delight, and brought about a revolution in the opinions and practice of men, which the most enlightened philosophers could never accomplish, nor even conceive?

Considering these several arguments of which we have shortly taken notice, miracles, prophecy, the character of Jesus, and the excellence of the gospel, it must appear to every candid and serious mind, that the claims of Jesus as a teacher sent from God are well founded; that it is our duty to listen to him as the Ambassador of Heaven, and to follow him as the Captain of Salvation. If any complain that the evidence on this subject is not so decisive as it might have been, we reply that revelation is a moral plan for exercising our faculties and trying our dispositions. Its evidence is sufficiently clear, to give rational encouragement to hope, and excitement to duty. The design of the gospel is not to overpower our understanding by irresistible and compulsory evidence, but to afford such reasonable proof as is sufficient to satisfy moral inquirers, who are endued with faculties to perceive the truth, but who at the same time have power to resist it, and finally to forfeit all its blessings. Neither reason nor revelation force men to submit to their authority: both of them teach the lessons of truth, and point out the path of virtue, showing what we are to avoid and what to pursue, with the consequences of each. But they leave us to act as we please, after communicating this information and giving this warning.

If the evidence of the gospel had been irresistible and compulsory, it would not have harmonized with the other phenomena connected with our present state, and would have been unsuitable to a scheme of moral agency and final retribution. If we introduce irresistibility and compulsion; if we render it impossible to disbelieve and disobey, we destroy moral government, virtue and vice, reward and punishment. Bishop Butler has stated, that objections against Christianity, as distinguished from objections against its evidences, are in a great measure frivolous. And this is unquestionably true in considering the analogy between natural and revealed religion; for if the evidence of revelation be satisfactory, this places it on the same level with creation; and if the difficulties be similar, then revelation is not more liable to objection than nature. In the construction of the Universe, and in the scheme of Providence, as well as in our holy Christianity, the plan of the Almighty is extensive, and contains some things hard to be understood by us. Neither in nature nor in revelation can we minutely trace every step of the Divine procedure, and distinctly show how everything harmonizes in promoting the perfection of one great whole. But it is not rationally to be expected that such limited beings as we are should fully comprehend the works and ways of Him who is infinite.

CHAPTER II.

HARMONY OF NATURE AND REVELATION.

We have seen that Jesus Christ is the prophet of the church, commissioned by the Father to reveal his will to the children of men, consequently there can be no dispute about any doctrine in the Bible. It is the province of reason to weigh the evidences of revelation, and to ascertain the meaning of what it contains; but after this is accomplished there is no longer any room for doubt: it is our duty to believe and obey. Listening to Jesus as a teacher sent from God, let us attend to the account which he gives of the perfections and government of Him by whom he was sent.

Jesus Christ, like his servants the prophets and apostles, assumes the existence of the Almighty as a first principle; a truth too obvious to be denied, too interesting to be forgotten, and too important to be neglected. They address us with the solemnity and authority of the ambassadors of heaven, speaking in the name, and delivering the message of the Universal Sovereign. Occasionally, indeed, they glance at the proofs of his existence from creation and providence; but they do so rather incidentally than in a didactic manner: they state the argument, but do not dwell upon it. "The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth his handywork. Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night showeth knowledge. There is no speech nor language where their voice is not heard." "For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead." "He left not himself without witness, in that he did good, and gave us rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness." In these passages our attention is turned to the argument from creation and providence in proof of the Being of God. On this argument, however, the inspired writers do not enlarge; for their object was not to prove his existence, but to give evidence that they were his servants, commissioned by him to instruct his children. The gospel, then, is called not as a witness to the Being of God, for that it assumes; but to bear testimony concerning his attributes and government, his will and our duty. The representation of his perfections given in the Scriptures agrees with the draught exhibited in creation, and fills up the picture of the Divine portrait consistently with the grand outline sketched by the pencil of Nature.

1. Nature proclaims the Deity to be powerful, wise, and good; and with this proclamation revelation agrees. The Scripture character of God is worthy of the Universal Parent, who there appears in an attitude that must at once excite veneration, and conciliate affection. He is "the King eternal, mmortal, invisible, the only wise God, the Creator of the ends of the earth, who fainteth not, neither is weary." At his command the stupendous fabric of the universe rose into existence. He said, "Let there be light, and there was light:" he spread out the heavens as a curtain; and formed this lower world in the hollow of his hand, giving breath to them that are upon it, and spirit to them that dwell therein. He is the former of our bodies, and the father of our spirits; his inspiration gives us understanding. But he is not a being of mere power. He does not wield the thunderbolt in an arbitrary and capricious manner; nor with ruthless fury crush under his omnipotent arm those who have inadvertently transgressed his laws, or even justly incurred his high displeasure. He is an affectionate Parent; a wise, equitable, and gracious Sovereign. Benignity irradiates his countenance, impartial goodness pervades the whole of his administration, and consummate wisdom directs the operations of his mighty power. In him the rigour of justice is softened by the tender yearnings of mercy. He is holy and hates sin; but he pities the wanderings, and sympathizes with the afflictions of his rational and erring offspring. He is "in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them."

2. Nature shows us that the Creater upholds and rules the world. This doctrine is confirmed by the Holy Scriptures, which throw a clear light on the administration of the Almighty, and represent him as governing all his creatures, and all their actions. The Lord preserves man and beast: his kingdom rules over all: he reigns in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth. Nothing is so great as to resist his power; nothing so minute as to escape his notice. His vigilant eye is continually upon every province of his mighty empire: we can nowhere go from his presence, or flee from his spirit. All nature is under his direction and control: summer and winter, seed-time and harvest regularly return; day and night continually succeed each other, and the moon with unwearied constancy travels in her appointed course. The just and the unjust equally enjoy the advantages of this constitution.

The Lord employs the elements to accomplish the purposes of his will. He makes the winds his messengers, and causes the flaming fire to act in his service. He covers the heavens with clouds, prepares rain for the earth, makes grass to grow on the mountain, and clothes the plain with luxuriant crops: the eyes of all things wait upon him, and he gives them their food in due season. When he sees meet, he makes "the heavens brass, and the earth iron," and sends "cleanness of teeth" to a sinful people in all their borders. He poured the waters of the flood upon an impenitent world, and rained fire and brimstone on the guilty inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah; but it is comfortable to know that the righteous Noah was saved from the deluge, and that an angel led Lot beyond the limits of the devoted cities.

The elements, however, are not the only instruments of his providence. He can make the locust or the worm, as well as the winged seraph, execute judgment against a sinful nation. Without infringing free agency, he can influence his people; and permit, check, or defeat the counsels of men, making them subservient to the accomplishment of purposes which they never intended. He causes even the wrath of man to praise him, and the remainder of that wrath he restrains. War, and famine, and pestilence, are in his hand, and he can employ them to execute his will. He often bears long with a guilty people, warns and admonishes them; but if they disregard the alarms of judgment and turn a deaf ear to the invitations of mercy; if they still continue obstinate in sin, he gives them up to the perversity of their own hearts, and the vanity of their own imaginations, saying, Let them alone, let them fill up their cup, the hour of retribution will come. When the ways of a nation please the Lord, he makes even their enemies to be at peace with them, and joy and plenty are in their dwellings.

His providential care extends to individuals as well as nations. "The very hairs of our head are all numbered." If we acknowledge him in our ways, he will direct our steps. He may subject us to trials, but it is to improve our hearts; and we will not go unrewarded. Joseph long pined in obscurity and bondage; but he was afterwards exalted. Job was severely tried; but he bore all with patient fortitude and pious resignation, and his latter end was more prosperous than his beginning. On the other hand bad men are not unfrequently subjected to penal visitations, and their own minds execute a terrible judgment against them. Under the reproaches of a guilty conscience, Cain was a miserable fugitive and vagabond on the earth; and the condemnation of his own heart made the treacherous Judas precipitate himself to his place. Angels also are the instruments of Providence; they are the "ministering spirits sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation."

The righteous government of God discountenances all sin, and encourages rectitude of heart and life: it accomplishes wise ends by the best means, and neither wicked spirits nor wicked men can defeat the purposes of the Almighty. The workers of iniquity may tremble at the holy administration of the Most High, for a retributive Providence watches over human affairs; and although for awhile the wicked may flourish like the green bay tree, yet, sooner or later, judgment, like the whirlwind of the desert, will overtake them. The faithful, however, may rejoice that they are under an Omnipotent Protector, for the righteous Lord loveth righteousness; with a pleasant countenance he beholdeth the upright, and will make all things work together for the good of them that love him.

3. The Scriptures inform us that man, by the abuse of his freedom, has fallen into a state of moral disease, and is a transgressor of the divine law. This truth is taught by the voice of nature, and has been generally acknowledged by the human race. Hence, in almost every nation, the priest, the victim, and the altar present themselves to our view; but the unenlightened worshipper was utterly uncertain whether his services were accepted, and his sins forgiven. Accordingly we hear him in painful perplexity exclaiming, "Wherewith shall I come before the Lord, and bow myself before the high God? Shall I come before him with burnt offerings, with calves of a year old? Will the Lord be pleased with thousands of rams, or with ten thousands of rivers of oil? Shall I give my first-born for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul?" Sacrificial expiations were admitted by divine authority into the Patriarchal and Mosaic dispensations. Under the law the priest officiated daily at the altar, offering sacrifices for his own sins, and for the sins of the people. These sacrifices expiated transgressions, of the peculiar laws of the theocracy, and entitled to a life in the land of Canaan; but their value extended no farther. "It is not possible that blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins:" they derived all their saving efficacy from the great atonement which they prefigured.

The fallen state of man, recognised by nature, and acknowledged in the Jewish Scriptures, is clearly taught in the gospel; sometimes in plain, but more frequently in figurative language. We are represented as wandering sheep which have strayed from the fold, and are in danger of perishing; as sleeping, and unconscious of the perils with which we are surrounded; as blind, and not seeing the path which we ought to pursue; as sick and diseased; yea, dead in trespasses and sins. The law, originally engraven on our hearts by the finger of God, is partially effaced, but not obliterated: our faculties are weakened and disordered, but not destroyed nor wholly perverted; "for when the Gentiles, which have not the law, do by nature the things contained in the law, these, having not the law, are a law unto themselves; which show the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience also bearing witness, and their thoughts the meanwhile accusing or else excusing one another." Whatever be the nature of our malady, the gospel reveals a remedy of suitable extent and efficacy. Jesus appears in characters adapted to our necessities. If we be guilty, his blood cleanses from all sin: if we be weak, his grace is sufficient for us, his strength is perfected in our weakness. He is a shepherd to bring us back from our wanderings, and to recover us when lost: he stands knocking and calling to awaken us from our slumbers: he has eye-salve to anoint our eyes that we may see: he is a physician to heal our diseases: he has power to quicken us when dead, and restore us to life. In order, however, to reap these advantages we must be diligent in improving the talents intrusted to our care; for Jesus acts towards us as rational and accountable creatures. The wandering sheep must listen to the voice of the shepherd, and follow him; the sleeper, when he hears the alarm at the door, must not fold his arms in sluggish indolence, and cry, "yet a little sleep, a little slumber;" he must arise and be active: the sick must observe and obey the prescriptions of the physician.

The Scriptures exhibit God as a being of immaculate holiness, impartial justice, unsearchable wisdom, and boundless goodness. Of these attributes, the mission of Christ, the great fact revealed in the gospel, is a brilliant illustration. From sovereign grace the Father sent his only begotten Son, who is one with himself, "the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person;" he sent him to take part of flesh and blood, "that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, and deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage;" he sent him to bear our sins in his own body on the tree, to reconcile his offending children to himself, to demonstrate his detestation of sin, and, at the same time, encourage them to trust in his mercy, walk in his way, cherish those dispositions of mind, and pursue that course of action which he prescribes, in order that they may grow up in a meetness for a happy immortality.

The mission of Jesus is a dispensation which we cannot at present fully comprehend, and of which it becomes us to speak with reverence and awe. All the purposes which it serves in the moral government of God, who can explain? It may teach great lessons to different orders of beings, and affect the interests of others besides the human race. The vast range of its efficacy may extend far beyond our limited conceptions. It awakens the curiosity and increases the knowledge even of angels. It is the benevolent purpose of God, "in the dispensation of the fulness of times, to gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth, even in him:" "And to make all men see what is the fellowship of the mystery, which from the beginning of the world hath been hid in God, who created all things by Jesus Christ: To the intent that now, unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places, might be known by the church the manifold wisdom of God, according to the eternal purpose which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord." "For it pleased the Father, that in him should all fulness dwell; and, having made peace through the blood of his cross, by him to reconcile all things unto himself; whether they be things in earth, or things in heaven." But although our knowledge of this dispensation is limited and partial, there are several great truths connected with it which we may in some measure understand. These truths ought to engage our attention, make a deep impression on our minds, and have a powerful influence on our lives.

First, The mission and death of Jesus are a striking illustration of the divine nature and government; they form a vast scheme for maintaining the honour of God's perfections in extending mercy to the guilty, and are designed to teach great lessons concerning his righteous administration. He set forth Christ, "to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past through the forbearance of God; that he might be just and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus." This dispensation is expressive of holiness, and wisdom, and goodness. These attributes are intimated by the voice of nature, and plainly taught in the law; for the constitution of the natural world and of the human mind supports a moral government, and the divine law bears strongly on the same point, forbidding sin, encouraging righteousness, and being wisely and graciously fitted for preparing us for a more exalted state of existence. The violation of the law is dishonouring and displeasing to God, as it expresses a disregard of his sovereign authority, and tends to defeat his gracious purposes towards us. Hence wisdom and goodness, as well as holiness, are concerned in maintaining its honour. A wise legislator supports the dignity of his enactments by suitable expressions of his displeasure on occasion of their violation; and the great interposition revealed in the gospel is a plan for maintaining the glory of the Divine administration in pardoning the guilty.

Whether God, considered as an absolute sovereign, could have forgiven sin without any satisfaction, it does not belong to us to inquire. It is enough to know, that he has declared he would not do so; for, if he had done so, men might have imagined that he was a being of mere mercy; that the benignity of his nature would always triumph over his justice and holiness; and that he would never inflict punishment on transgressors. Iniquity, like an overflowing torrent, would have deluged the world, and ruin must inevitably have overtaken our race. But the death of Christ, as an atonement for sin, corrects such false ideas, and has a strong tendency to prevent the fatal operation of such misconceptions. We see the only begotten Son of the Father, when the iniquities of us all were laid upon him, suffering deep humiliation and unspeakable agony; but he triumphantly accomplished the blessed work given him to do. His sacrifice is as excellent as our sins are heinous; his atonement is commensurate with our guilt; his blood taketh away sin, has put an end to vicarious expiations, and brought in an everlasting righteousness. His offering was of a sweet smelling savour to the Most High, who saw that by it his administration was vindicated in the sight of all his rational offspring. This dispensation clearly shows, that though God is merciful, yet that he is not merciful only, but that he is just and faithful, and holy also; and that all his attributes are harmoniously exercised in the administration of his government. A wonderful provision is made for the pardon of sin, for deterring from iniquity, and for encouraging rectitude of heart and life. By the gracious operation of his Spirit, Jesus renews his people, and works in them "both to will and to do of his good pleasure." As he was delivered for our offences, and raised for our justication, so he is exalted as a Prince and a Saviour to give repentance and remission of sins, and to carry on to a glorious consummation the blessed enterprise in which he is engaged.

Secondly, The death of Christ is a powerful means of reconciling us to God, of assuring us of his love, of winning our confidence, our affection, and our obedience. Man before his fall loved and trusted the Creator; but when he sinned, he became conscious of guilt and apprehensive of punishment; fear, suspicion, and distrust, took possession of his mind. Adam in innocence listened to his Maker with delight; but, on his disobedience, a melancholy change took place. He no longer heard the voice of God with joy, he no longer hastened to meet him, but anxiously sought concealment. This is a true picture of the state of fallen man, and its image is reflected from every breast. Now, the death of Christ is an amazing dispensation for banishing that fear, suspicion, and distrust of God, which consciousness of guilt inspires. Here we see the countenance of our heavenly Father beaming with benignity; we see him manifesting inexpressible love to his prodigal children, and we hear his voice, in accents of lively compassion, inviting them to return to the bosom of his family, and share the provision and protection of the dutiful members of his household. Such a representation of the divine character is well calculated to cast out our fear, win our love, and secure our confidence and obedience. In this point of view the death of Christ is held up by the Apostle: "All things are of God, who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ, and hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation; to wit, that God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them; and hath committed to us the word of reconciliation. Now, then, we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us: we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God." Attend to the argument which the sacred writer employs to encourage the reconciliation, "For he hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him." God has thus given the clearest proof, the most affecting demonstration of his love; and shall not we, then, be constrained to love and to obey him? If his mercy fail to produce these effects, must not every other motive prove unavailing? On the divine benignity the faithful and pious worshipper may place the most steady reliance, for "He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things?"

4. All the precepts of Christianity are agreeable to the dictates of a sound mind; and its promises are happily fitted to calm the troubles of the human heart. The system of nature supports a moral government, and the doctrines and precepts of the gospel have a direct moral tendency. The Scriptures give clearer and fuller views of duty than what could be learned from the volume of creation, and enforce the discharge of what is incumbent upon us by the most powerful motives. From the perversity of their hearts, men are often inclined to lay the chief stress on external rites and ceremonial observances; but the gospel teaches us that no ritual worship can be pleasing to God, without holiness of heart and life; and that justice, mercy, and faithfulness, are indispensable matters of the law. Everything in the religion of Jesus, whether we consider the dispositions which it recommends, or the conduct which it enjoins, promotes the welfare of the individual and of society. In proportion to their obedience to his precepts will be the happiness of mankind; for in proportion to this obedience will they discharge with fidelity all the duties incumbent upon them in the several relations of life. If men generally cherished the same mind that was in Christ; if they were just and merciful, meek and holy, what a different picture would the world present from what it now exhibits! How incalculably would the sum of human happiness be increased! The beneficial influence of Christianity proves its suitableness to our nature, and strongly recommends it to our regard.

The rites of our holy religion are few and simple; Baptism and the Lord's Supper. It also sanctions the observance of one day in seven as sacred to the worship of God, Even the heathens were sensible that no man could steadily pursue a virtuous course without aid from on high; but if the Christian, on contemplating the extent of his duty, is ready in despondency to exclaim, "Who is sufficient for these things!" he is encouraged by a voice from heaven, saying, "Fear thou not, for I am with thee; be not dismayed, for I am thy God; I will strengthen thee; yea, I will help thee; yea, I will uphold thee with the right hand of my righteousness." "Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you: for every one that asketh, receiveth; and he that seeketh, findeth; and to him that knocketh, it shall be opened. If a son ask bread of any of you that is a father, will he give him a stone? or if he ask a fish, will he for a fish give him a serpent? or if he shall ask an egg, will he offer him a scorpion? If ye, then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him?" The Holy Spirit enlightens, comforts, strengthens, and guides the people of God on their way to the better country.

5. The immortality of the soul, as we have already seen, has engaged the attention of men in every age, and been recognized by people of every kindred and tongue. Many clouds, however, seemed to hang over this great truth, and to damp the fond aspirations of nature. But if on this interesting subject the torch of reason shines with a dubious ray, the bright beam of revelation dispels the darkness. Jesus hath made light and immortality clear through the gospel; he confirms the consoling doctrine by new evidence, and sheds around it a glorious and animating splendour. Amid all the vicissitudes of life, the faithful are comforted with the prospect of joining an innumerable company of angels, and the spirits of just men made perfect, when they have finished their pilgrimage in this world. The gospel not only teaches the immortality of the soul, but also the resurrection of the body; a point on which the voice of nature is silent.

Lastly, The gospel informs us of a judgment to come, and a state of final retribution; truths which the heathen recognized: but Jesus sets them clearly before us in majestic grandeur, and awful solemnity. The Lord shall come in his own glory, in the glory of the Father, and of the holy angels; the living shall be changed, and those who are in their graves shall hear the voice of the Son of Man, and shall come forth. "God hath appointed a day, in the which he will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained; whereof he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead." "And I saw a great white throne, and him that sat on it, from whose face the earth and the heaven fled away; and there was found no place for them. And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God: and the books were opened; and another book was opened, which is the book of life: and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works." The wicked shall be for ever banished from the presence of the Lord, and consigned to the place of punishment; but the righteous, under the conquering banners of the Captain of Salvation, shall rise in triumph to the city of the living God, where through eternity they shall rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory.

Thus, the gospel greatly enlarges our knowledge of the character and government of the Almighty; and reveals an amazing scheme of grace, by which, in consistency with the glory of his perfections, and dignity of his administration, he can receive the returning penitent into favour. Benignity and mercy diffuse a lovely radiance over all his attributes; and while the Scriptures assure us that he is a gracious Being, yea, that he is love, the death of Jesus Christ proclaims the same truth, in a manner that may convince every understanding, and affect every heart. "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God!" His love towards us passeth understanding. May love to this great and gracious Being reign in our hearts, and regulate our lives! May we, in the spirit of cheerful obedience, wisely improve our faculties and our privileges, and act suitably to the prospects which the gospel sets before us, so that at last we may meet with the approbation of our Lord, and inherit the kingdom prepared for the righteous!

CHAPTER III.

CHRISTIAN DUTY.

Belief in the being, perfections, and providence of God, and in the gospel, does not terminate in mere speculation; but is calculated to have a powerful and gracious influence on the heart and life. What, then, are the duties resulting from this belief? what are the dispositions which we ought to cultivate? what is the conduct which we ought to pursue? We may shortly answer, that it teaches us to live soberly, and righteously, and piously in the world; or, in other words, to perform our duty to God, our neighbour, and ourselves. All duty, indeed, may be considered as obedience to the will of God; for, if we obey the will of God, we will discharge our duty to our neighbour and to ourselves. Every devout affection, every social virtue, right temper, and right conduct, flow from a correct and steady belief in God, and in the gospel of his Son, as naturally as a stream from its fountain. But, in order that our conceptions on the subject may be more distinct, we shall consider our duty to God, to our neighbour, and to ourselves. While, however, we attend to these separately, we must not forget that in practice they go together, and operate on each other. They are harmonious parts of one whole. Even when performing our duty to our neighbour and to ourselves, we must be actuated by a devout regard to the will of our heavenly Father.

Frequent meditation on the moral attributes of God cannot fail to have a salutary effect on our temper and conduct, and to promote in us a continual approximation to his moral image. Some of the lustre of the divine attributes will adhere to our minds, like the glory which shone on the face of Moses when he came down from conversing with God on the mount. It is not enough to believe that God is, for it is essential to have correct apprehensions of his perfections and government. We must be acquainted with his attributes in order to know what affections to cherish, and what actions to perform; for the ideas which we entertain of the divine character have much influence on our hearts and lives. False notions of God lie at the foundation of all false religions. Hence flow idolatry, superstition, fanaticism, and every corrupt mode of worship. Whether we look to the high places of Moloch, or to the temples of Venus; to the human sacrifices bleeding at the altar of Odin, or to the self-devoted victim expiring under the wheels of the car of Juggernaut; to the Stylite on his pillar, or the Anchorite in his cave; we see the unhappy effects of false conceptions of God.

As misapprehensions of the character and government of the Almighty are the source of so much evil, it ought to be our steady aim to acquire just notions of the only true God, and of Jesus Christ his Son. For this purpose it behoves us to attend to the works of Creation, and to the Holy Scriptures. There is an admirable harmony in their combined testimony, and they mutually elucidate each other. We are particularly to study the Bible, which is a treasure of precious knowledge, and has a powerful tendency to make us both wise and good; to enlighten the understanding, and to purify and comfort the heart. Defect in duty arises from imperfection of knowledge, violence of appetite, or perversity of affection; all of which the Scriptures tend to remove or rectify. If we have right apprehensions of God, we will cherish reverential awe, grateful affection, dutiful obedience, filial trust, and cheerful resignation.

1. If we have right apprehensions of the perfections and government of God, we will cherish a holy fear and reverential awe of him. God is infinitely exalted above us. He is the Creator, we are the creatures of his hand: he is the Sovereign, we are his subjects: he is the Judge, we must stand at his tribunal, and hear our sentence of approval or condemnation from his lips. He is wise in heart and mighty in strength. Shall we not then, with holy reverence, lift our eye to him, who built and upholds the magnificent fabric of the universe, who leads the planets in their ceaseless revolutions, and who guides Orion and Arcturus in their courses? Shall we not revere him who sends forth the winds from their chambers, who presides over the tumults of the ocean, who commands the tempest and it is still, who shakes the earth, and the pillars thereof tremble? Shall we not revere him who is the author of our existence, and on whom we continually and entirely depend? We owe him incomparably more than the respectful affection due to a parent, and incomparably more than the reverence due to a king.

2. Right apprehensions of the perfections and government of God will produce in us grateful affection towards him.

God is amiable in himself, and he stands in the most endearing relations to us. He is the former of our bodies, the Father of our spirits, the preserver of both. On him we every moment depend; he is our benefactor, and from him all our enjoyments flow. Life, and all that renders life comfortable, are the gift of his munificence: his bountiful hand supplies our wants; his powerful arm shields us from danger. He bears long with our perversity, often preserves us from the consequences of our follies, extricates us from difficulties, delivers us from temptation, disappoints our fears, comforts us in grief, and puts songs of joy into our mouth. We are grateful to an earthly benefactor who has conferred on us some small and transient favour; and not to feel such gratitude argues a want of the best affections of our nature. Shall we not, then, love God for his excellencies and benefits? Shall not the whole current of our soul flow towards him from whom we have received all, and on whom all our hopes depend; yea, who has sent his Son into the world to enlighten our minds, to expiate our sins, to purify and save us? Bless the Lord, O our souls, and all that is within us bless his holy name; who healeth all our diseases, who forgiveth all our iniquities, who redeemeth us from going down to death, and who crowneth us with loving-kindness and tender mercies!

3. Grateful affection leads to dutiful obedience. We wish to please those whom we love and who are kind to us. But God is supremely amiable, and he is our great benefactor; therefore it is our duty, and ought to be our delight, to do what is well-pleasing to him. All his commandments are wise and good, worthy of him from whom they proceed, and divinely suited to make those happy who obey him. They are the dictates of unerring wisdom for regulating the conduct of creatures such as we are, and must tend to advance our welfare. At present, the commandments which relate to religious worship shall shortly engage our attention; and we must remember, that God does not require us to pay him homage because he derives any advantage from our adoration, but because it is beneficial to ourselves. It is the test of our allegiance, and the means of our improvement and happiness. The great design of religion is to promote in us a happy conformity to the moral image of God, and a consequent meetness for heaven. This is the chief aim of all our religious observances, of our prayers, of our praises, of the whole of our worship, both public and private. In proportion as this end is gained, our religion is profitable: without it, speculative dogmas and ritual observances are unavailing, and will produce to the individual no ultimate advantage. Outward worship alone is by no means decisive evidence that the heart is right with God; but the habitual neglect of this worship affords a strong presumption that the person who is guilty of it has no correct sense of his duty, honour, and interest.

Just apprehensions of the perfections and government of God lead to prayer, which is the aspiration of the soul towards the Almighty, and is the exercise of a weak, dependent, and guilty creature. It has been practised by men in every age of the world, in every condition of life, and in every stage of society. God invites us to pray: Jesus was often engaged in this pious duty, and he enjoins it on all his followers. It is the appointed means of obtaining blessings from heaven: we are to ask that we may receive. On this subject questions may be put, and difficulties started, which our limited capacity and knowledge do not enable us entirely to answer and obviate. This need neither surprise nor offend us, for in every department of nature we soon reach a barrier which no ingenuity or exertion of ours can pass. It ought to suffice us that a thing is reasonable in itself, though we are unable certainly to trace all the steps by which it is brought about, and we ought to be more intent on improving our privileges than in indulging a restless and unreasonable curiosity in things that are above our reach.

Prayer is a powerful preventive of temptation, and is well calculated to promote humility, gratitude, watchfulness, and a lively sense of our continual and entire dependence on God. Our prayers are to be offered up in faith, and in the name of Jesus, the One Mediator between God and man; while we are to be humble, fervent, and persevering, at a throne of grace, without any of that unceremonious familiarity which ignorant and vain persons have sometimes manifested in their addresses to their Maker. The instructions of Jesus and the example of his apostles are the best lessons for directing our prayers. With due attention to these, the pious mind, impressed with a lively sense of its mercies and its wants, will give way to the effusions of gratitude and the aspirations of prayer, in a manner that will not be disregarded by the God and Father of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Besides joining in the public prayers of the church, and exercising ourselves in private devotion, we are to pray in the family also, as family mercies are to be socially acknowledged, and the supply of family wants implored by joint supplication.

Through impotency of mind, irregularity of affections and passions, and the avocations and cares of life, we are apt to forget the Author of our existence and enjoyments, as well as our own most important interests. In cases where we are not impelled by the instinctive propensities or physical necessities of our nature, any duty which is not performed at stated periods is in great danger of being much neglected. Besides, men united in society ought to engage in social worship, and for this purpose public places and solemn times must be set apart. Hence the Sabbath is a noble institution, periodically encouraging us to serious consideration, and to the elevating exercises of religion. It administers to our physical comfort, and is happily fitted to promote our moral improvement. To him who labours assiduously for six days, the rest of the seventh is a seasonable and grateful relaxation from bodily toil. It refreshes and prepares for the labours of the week, and on it the inferior animals, which aid us in our toils, share in our rest.

But it is as a moral institute chiefly that the Sabbath at present claims our attention. We are not to consider this holy day as relating to a future state of existence merely, but as closely connected with our interest and happiness in the present life; as a day for serious meditation on the temper we are to cherish and the social duties we are to perform, as well as a pious preparation for the life that is to come. The public services of the Sabbath carry on a system of moral education, instructing us how to act as good members of the civil community to which we belong; and every sober and serious mind must be sensible of the value of such exercises. Our social duties, and the great concerns of our probationary state, ought never to be forgotten, but should be the principal aim of our lives, the daily subject of our private and family devotions. On the Sabbath we are more particularly called to those important considerations, and are invited to bestow upon them the most earnest attention. One day in seven is no unreasonable portion of time allotted to this service. Six days are allowed chiefly for our secular avocations; the seventh is more particularly devoted to our moral education, to the serious consideration of our present duties and future prospects. The duties of the Sabbath, as a day of religious exercise and rest from the ordinary business of life, no person who has correct notions of the perfections and government of God, and of his own nature, state, and duty, will either undervalue or neglect. We are anxious to secure our physical comfort, and shall we be careless of moral improvement? None but the depraved beings who are lost both to a sense of duty and interest, will act this infatuated and guilty part.

The public worship of the Sabbath, conducted by pious and enlightened ministers, is a happy means of intellectual and moral improvement, informing and strengthening the understanding, and purifying and exalting the affections. A pious assembly united in prayer and praise, and in listening seriously to the solemn truths of religion, communicate to each other a sympathetic fervour, and their devout worship, like incense from the altar, ascends through the Mediator with acceptance to the throne of God. The repetition of this holy glow of piety after short intervals, makes the children of God grow up like trees planted by the rivers of water. A noble model for imitation, and a perfect standard for measuring their character are continually before their eyes; and drawing refreshing and invigorating draughts from the wells of salvation, they go on, like the ancient pilgrims, from strength to strength, towards the holy Zion.

4. Dutiful obedience inspires with filial trust. God invites us to trust in him, and we have every encouragement to comply with his gracious invitation. He is Almighty; his wisdom is unsearchable; his goodness inexhaustible. Of these attributes we have clear evidence in creation and providence. His wisdom and goodness shine with brilliant lustre in redemption; and his truth and faithfulness endure to all generations. He has given us life, which is more than meat; the body, which is more than raiment. Having bestowed the greater, will he withhold the less favour? He has given us many great and precious promises, and these promises he will fulfil, for in Christ they are all yea and amen. Nothing befalls us without his knowledge. Without him not even a sparrow falleth to the ground, and all the hairs of our head are numbered. His eye is ever upon us. He knows all our wants; sees all our dangers, and will watch over the interests of all his faithful subjects. He has been kind to us in time past, and this may encourage us to trust in him for future blessings. A dutiful child never suspects the good-will of his affectionate parent. And shall we in any degree distrust the Father of lights from whom cometh down every good and perfect gift? We will trust in him, in the full assurance that he will make all things work together for our good. But while we place an unhesitating trust in his parental affection and care, we must be careful never to tempt him either by indolence or temerity. Prudent caution and active diligence must characterize our conduct; and, in the dutiful use of means, it behoves us, under the shadow of his omnipotent arm, to proceed with a steady intrepidity in the way of righteousness.

5. Filial trust leads to pious resignation. In the day of adversity the unenlightened see and hear only the gloom of the firmament, and the howling of the tempest; but the eye of God's dutiful children penetrates the darkness, and behind the clouds which overcast the sky sees the Almighty parent sitting on his heavenly throne watching over their interests, and overruling all events for their good. The government of God extends over all. Our afflictions are part of a great scheme formed by unerring wisdom. Each of them appears in the place which the Sovereign disposer of events has assigned. They are consequences of sin, and means of correcting our errors, and promoting our improvement. In the righteous administration of God, affliction is one of the great springs for moving the powers both of our intellectual and moral nature. It is the discipline which we undergo in the course of our education for a happy immortality, and never exceeds what is needful, or what may prove beneficial.

When the sun of prosperity beams upon us, and our cup of enjoyment is full, we are too much disposed to forget the fountain whence all our blessings flow. Hence God chastens us in mercy, to wean our affections from some idol, to awaken in us some neglected virtue, to make us look to himself, become partakers of his holiness, and meet for a happy immortality. "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and if we endure chastening, God dealeth with us as with sons." Often have the subjects of God's moral government had cause to say, "it is good for us that we have been afflicted." We cannot always avoid trials; but we may always apply them to wise purposes, as instruments of spiritual education, and means of preparing us for future glory. Pride or insensibility may affect to disregard afflictions: it is the province of wisdom to improve them. They are inflicted by our Father for a gracious purpose, and that purpose it should be our constant aim to promote. The excellence of the end to be attained may reconcile us to the means employed to bring it about. The weary pilgrim travels cheerfully through a thorny path, when he knows it is short, and will soon conduct him to the object of all his desire, and all his hope. And shall not the Christian bear with steady fortitude and pious resignation the transitory ills of life, seeing that they are the steps by which he is ascending to the mansions in his Father's house? "Our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory."

In the season of trouble the faithful draw strong consolation from the gospel. The world may frown, but they rejoice in the light of the Divine countenance. They may lose earthly substance, but they have an abiding inheritance in heaven. Friends may prove unkind, or die, but God's love is unchangeable: and if they on whom our affections rest close the journey of life before us, they rise to more exalted dwellings, and we shall soon overtake them in the peaceful habitations of the just, free from all the infirmities and imperfections which depressed their hearts, or clouded their excellence. Disease may come, and the hour of dissolution approach: but if this world fail them, better mansions are prepared for their reception. If they leave friends on earth, they are about to join a nobler society: and those friends whom they leave behind, they can, in full confidence, commit to the gracious providence of God. The body must slumber in the house of silence and forgetfulness, but the last trumpet shall sound, and then shall this corruptible put on incorruption, and this mortal put on immortality. "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? Thanks be to God who hath given us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

"What, O man, doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?" The first commandment is, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind; and the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself." The gospel teaches us to "live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world." Religion consists of two great parts; piety, or the duty which we owe immediately to God; and morality, or the duty which we owe to our neighbour, and to ourselves. In proportion as either of these is wanting, our religion is defective. Piety without morality is hollow and deceitful; morality without piety is like a house built on the sand. Although God has joined these two together, yet men often attempt to tear them asunder. Some value themselves highly on their piety, but pay little respect to morality; while others boast of their morality without any due regard to piety. Both are equally in error.

Nothing more clearly shows the darkness of the human understanding, and the depravity of the human heart, than the consideration, that though the character of the Pharisees is so plainly delineated, and so strongly condemned in the word of God, yet many who pride themselves highly on their religion are nothing more than mere Pharisees. If they give alms, a trumpet is blown on the occasion; if they pray, they take care that men shall know of their devotions, as well as if performed at the corners of streets. They compass sea and land to make a proselyte, and are ill qualified to improve him. They pay tithes of mint, anise, and cummin, but neglect the weightier matters of the law, justice, mercy, and faith. All they do is to be seen of men. How much soever such persons may esteem themselves on their religion, it is neither consistent with reason nor Christianity, for if we love God for his own sake, we love our neighbour for God's sake. We are not enjoined to love our neighbour in the same degree, but merely with the same kind of affection which we bear to ourselves; and to act towards him as we might fairly and reasonably expect that, in similar circumstances, he should act towards us.

All mankind are brethren. Every human being who comes in our way and stands in need of our aid is entitled to our sympathy. Human nature and distress form a legitimate claim to our friendly assistance. We are not to withhold our brotherly affection from any of our fellow men, because an imaginary line, a river, a ridge of mountains, or a channel of the ocean, may have separated their birth-place from ours; because their manners, customs, and political institutions are not the same with our own; because, by reason of difference of climate and manner of life their skin is tinged with a different colour; because they offer their tribute of homage to the Creator in a different manner; or because there is some difference or shade of difference between their religious rites and opinions and ours. The Jew is to love and do good to the Samaritan; the Samaritan to do the same to the Jew. We are to do good to all men as we have opportunity, but especially to them who belong to the household of faith. Miracles have passed away; but faith, hope, and charity, the permanent glories of Christianity, remain, and the greatest of these is charity. The sentiment of universal benevolence expands the heart, humanizes the mind, and fosters every generous affection; but jealousy, malice, hatred, and other malignant passions pervert the soul, and cramp and deteriorate the best feelings of our nature. They wage war with every manly and liberal principle. Instead of sweeping the globe with the guilty purpose of oppressing the weak, robbing the defenceless, exciting the sound of lamentation in the humble hut, and drawing forth the tears of the widow and the orphan, we will do what is in our power to promote the happiness of our fellow men. In the genuine spirit of brotherly affection, we will smoke the pipe of peace with the untutored wanderer of the American wilderness, and partake of bread and salt with the hardy native of the African desert.

In most instances it is to a very limited number of our fellow men than we can actually do good; but it becomes us to embrace them all in the arms of brotherly affection. Christianity, however, is a practical institute, and teaches us that our first exertions ought to be in behalf of those with whom we are most immediately connected. Relations and those who are nearest to us are first entitled to our attention, and others in proportion to the fair claims which the uncorrupted dictates of humanity give them upon us. Throw a stone into a calm transparent lake, and the circling undulations become feebler as they recede from the central point: so while our hearts vibrate with sincere good-will to all our fellow men, the vibrations are to be stronger towards those with whom we are more immediately connected. By acting as it becomes the affectionate children of God, by mutual love, and friendly co-operation we greatly lighten the burdens, soothe the cares, and heighten the joys of life; but by jealousy, malice, envy, and hatred, we incalculably aggravate the sum of affliction. Mankind often complain that they are unhappy; that they tread in a thorny path, and drink of a bitter stream. But whence do their sufferings and their sorrows flow? In a great measure from their own malignant passions. Remove the cause, and the effect will disappear. Banish malice, envy, hatred; let genuine good-will towards each other prevail, and a great portion of human misery will fade away, like darkness before the rising sun. It will dissipate the gloom which often clouds the countenance, and remove the grief which often preys upon the heart.

We love God from a sense of his perfections and his benefits. Love to God produces good-will to men; and all the social virtues are emanations of benevolence. They are the operations of this divine principle according to the different relations in which we stand to our fellow men. If genuine benevolence reign in our heart, it will lead, under the direction of a sound judgment, to the proper discharge of the duties we owe to others, which are so many streams flowing from this sacred fountain.

1. True benevolence inspires with the love of justice, and prompts him in whose bosom it glows, neither to oppress the weak, to impose on the ignorant, nor to overreach the unwary; but to give every man his due, and with steady and undeviating steps to walk in the hallowed path of equity. Deceit and dissimulation, fraud, and falsehood, are far from the humble worshipper of God: integrity is enthroned in his heart, truth dwells on his lips, and an enlightened sense of duty regulates the whole of his conduct. He faithfully performs every promise, and fulfils every engagement. Others respect and trust his word, because he respects and holds it sacred himself. His life is characterized by the simplicity of truth, and the dignity of virtue; and, in dealing with him, they who have an opportunity of knowing his character place unbounded confidence in his justice and faithfulness.

2. Benevolence and integrity are accompanied by candour in our judgments of our fellow men, and lead us to be moderate in our expressions of disapprobation, even when their conduct is justly liable to blame. Jesus has said "judge not, that ye be not judged;" and, therefore, his faithful follower does not indulge in unnecessary, severe, and harsh censures of others. He does not triumph over their errors, nor needlessly publish their failings. What is merely faulty he does not condemn as criminal; where a worthy motive can be assigned, he does not harber suspicions of a bad design, nor does he impute to malignant principles what may have proceeded from rash and unguarded impetuosity. In most instances, the circumstances of our neighbour are but partially known to us: there may be many palliations of his actions of which we are not apprized, and, therefore, the judgment of the candid person is as favourable as the case will admit. He who is duly sensible of his own frailty makes every reasonable allowance for the infirmities, weaknesses, and errors of his neighbour. Unless it be in his power to commend, he bridles his tongue: detraction and slander do not pollute his lips.

3. The disciple of Jesus Christ tenderly sympathizes with his brethren in the different circumstances in which they are placed; rejoices with them who rejoice, and weeps with them who weep. A humane and sympathetic disposition is the proper soil for the growth of every virtue: the absence of it is favourable to the growth of every vice. He whose heart is duly regulated, entertains a kindred feeling for all his fellow pilgrims in the journey of life. Under a proper sense of the value of an immortal being, he is deeply affected when he sees a brother treading in the paths wherein destroyers go. He uses all the prudent means in his power to reclaim him: the offender may perhaps be obstinate and audacious in wickedness, and discretion may advise to let him alone, and leave him to reap the fruit of his own doings. But if at times the good man turns away in hopeless melancholy from the obstinate transgressor, he never shuts his ear against the cry of the afflicted. The voice of a brother in distress always awakens the tender sympathies of his nature, and finds ready access to his heart. He yields to the impulse of his best feelings; hastens to the house of mourning to mingle his tears with those of the children of affliction, and administers that strong consolation which the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ affords under the trials of frail humanity.

While he comforts the mourner, he also, according to his ability, supplies the wants of the needy. With respect to them, simple condolence, fair words, and good wishes merely will not do. "If a brother or sister be naked, and destitute of daily food, and one of you say unto them, depart in peace, be ye warmed and filled; notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful to the body, what doth it profit?" Fair words and good wishes, how proper soever they may be in their own place, will neither feed the hungry nor clothe the naked. Our sympathy must be active. We must stretch out our hand to assist and to relieve. Our means may be limited; but if we make a wise use of those limited means, our exertions will not be disregarded before the throne of God. "Of a truth I say unto you, that this poor widow hath cast in more than they all." "If there be first a willing mind, it is accepted according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not."

Compassionate sympathy and beneficence towards the afflicted are advantageous to ourselves. They exercise, strengthen, and exalt our best affections, and promote in us a happy conformity to the moral image of the Father of lights, from whom cometh down every good and perfect gift. If we visit the house of mourning, by the sadness of the countenance the heart is made better. We learn impressive lessons of our frailty and dependence, and are taught to lift our eye to the God of salvation. A deed of mercy to a distressed brother fills the heart with a sublime complacency, and is a kind of foretaste of the joys of a more exalted state. In deeds of beneficence Jesus was much employed: he enjoins them on his disciples, and he will gloriously reward them. "When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory: And before him shall be gathered all nations: and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats: And he shall set his sheep on his right hand, but the goats on the left. Then shall the King say unto them on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world: For I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink: I was a stranger, and ye took me in: Naked, and ye clothed me: I was sick, and ye visited me: I was in prison, and ye came unto me. Verily I say unto you, inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

4. The spirit of benevolence will lead us to do what in us lies to live peaceably with all men. We will be careful not to offend either by injurious conduct, unreasonable pretensions, or provoking language. While we cautiously avoid every just cause of displeasure, we will employ all fair and honest means to conciliate the respect and good-will of our neighbour. In our intercourse with others, we will be mild and affectionate in our language, respectful and kind in our behaviour. In cases where we are exposed to provocation, we will be on our guard against irritable warmth and fierce impetuosity of temper; and will study on every occasion to act with the dignity of rational beings, and to practise the virtue of moral agents. We will never wantonly wound the feelings of a brother. Nay, even if he be fretful and irritable we will bear with him. Perhaps his mind bleeds under some secret wound which if known would entitle him to our sympathy and commiseration, and a remark which in other circumstances would produce little effect may pierce his soul like an arrow. While we are peaceable ourselves, we will, to the utmost of our power, promote peace among others. Some take pleasure in throwing a firebrand into the midst of friends, and rejoice in the flame which they have kindled. But such persons are actuated by the demon of unrighteousness, and must at last share the condemnation of the wicked. Jesus not only enjoins us to follow peace with all men, but also pronounces the peace-maker blessed.

5. While we are humane to the afflicted, and endeavour to live peaceably with all, we will exercise forgiveness towards the injurious. The disciple of Jesus, acting in the spirit of his Master, imitating his example, and obeying his precepts, is careful to give no provocation, to offer no affront, to do no injury to any man. He is not forward in taking offence, nor vindictive in the prosecution of quarrels that may be forced upon him. He overlooks affronts and injuries, so far as he can do so consistently with his own security and that of the public. Even when obliged to take measures to repel aggression, or to obtain redress of injuries sustained, he harbours no rancorous malignity in his breast, but bears about with him the spirit of conciliation. He remembers the precept of his Master, "bless them that curse you, and pray for them which despitefully use you."

The exercise of forgiveness may at times be considered a hard duty, but many motives combine to encourage and to enforce a forgiving disposition. It is the means of securing the approbation, respect, and good-will of our fellow men. It also contributes greatly to our own happiness; for all the malignant passions are as two-edged swords, and are generally as hurtful to ourselves as to our enemy. This is particularly the case with a vindictive disposition. In the mind that harbours revenge, the source of enjoyment is poisoned, and happiness withers like a blighted plant. Forgiveness conciliates the good-will even of an enemy, and the Christian must exercise a forgiving disposition in imitation of the example, and in obedience to the precepts of Jesus. He taught his disciples to exercise forgiveness, and he nobly exemplified his own lesson in the most irritating circumstances, and under the most grievous injuries. A prayer for his enemies quivered on his lips, even when expiring on the cross, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." "Put on, therefore, as the elect of God, holy and beloved, bowels of mercies, kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, long-suffering; forbearing one another, and forgiving one another, if any man have a quarrel against any; even as Christ forgave you, so also do ye."

The great duty which we owe to ourselves is to promote our real interests, not for any detached period, but throughout the whole of our existence. This cannot be done without performing our duty to God and to our neighbour. God has established a close connection betwixt our duty and our interest; by performing the one we will assuredly promote the other. Duty is the grand means of happiness. But although our duty is one great whole, yet we may consider some things more particularly in reference to ourselves. And among these none is of more importance than due care in self-government, and in the formation of temper. This object, if wisely and steadily pursued, will greatly contribute to our present comfort, and must have a salutary influence on our future welfare.

1. It is not uncommon to imagine, that temper is as little dependent on the will as the length of the arm or the colour of the skin. But this imagination is an unfounded prejudice, and produces the most unhappy effects. Persons first permit themselves to think that they can do nothing in the formation of temper, and then they attempt nothing, but allow it to grow up in wild and unpruned luxuriance. Notwithstanding all that may be said about natural constitution, and the influence of organic tendencies, I am fully satisfied that we can subject temper to the discipline of reason, and form it in any mould according to our pleasure. The irascible passions appear as early, and are as difficult to subjugate as any others; but we see that the most fretful and impatient persons, who are perpetually harassing their dependents with their peevishness and intemperate sallies, are able to restrain their ebullitions when in the presence of a superior, or in the company of an equal who would chastise them for outrageous conduct. Some persons, indeed, seem to think that temper, in many respects, has but little connexion with religion, and that care in the formation of it is of no great moment. If religion, however, consist in a happy conformity to the moral image of God, then the formation of temper is of essential importance, and is entitled to the most earnest attention of all who aspire to the Christian character. There is nothing in which our temporal happiness is so much in our power as in the formation of temper, and nothing will more conduce to our future welfare than wise exertions on this point.

A proud, irritable, discontented, and quarrelsome person can never be happy. He has thrown a tempestuous atmosphere around himself, and must for ever move in the region of storms. He has employed sure means to embitter life, whatever may be his external circumstances. He has been the architect of his temper, and misery must be the result of his labour. But a person who has formed his temper and dispositions of mind after a right model; who is humble, meek, cheerful, and contented, can commonly find a convenient shelter when overtaken by the storms of life. It should, therefore, be our early lesson to subject the passions, appetites, and desires, to the control and guidance of reason. The first are the gales to impel us in the voyage of life, but the last ought still to sit at the helm and direct our course. The stream, when it slowly descends with a hoarse murmur from the mountain and ripples through the plain, adorns and enriches the scene; but when it rushes down in a roaring and impetuous torrent, overflowing its banks, it carries devastation and ruin along with it: so when the passions, appetites, and desires, are kept under due restraint, they are a useful and felicitating part of our nature; but when they are allowed to rage with unbridled fury, they commit fearful ravages on the character which they were fitted to adorn and exalt. We must watch over the first movements of the heart, and not indulge with secret complacency in imaginations which we would be ashamed to avow. If we wish the stream of life to be pure, it ought to be our aim to preserve the fountain whence it flows unpolluted. "Keep thy heart with all diligence; for out of it are the issues of life."

2. An humble, sober, and reasonable mind is of incalculable value in performing the journey of life. Humility is no way allied either to that pusillanimity which shrinks from every danger, or to that meanness of spirit which pursues its own petty interests and selfish ends by low and unworthy means. It admits of the noblest ambition, the ambition of virtue, of intellectual and moral excellence, and of an emulous progress towards the perfection of our nature. Jesus has set us a noble example of humility, and he enjoins us to imitate him. "Learn of me, for I am meek and lowly." Humility is well pleasing in the sight of God, for it is founded on the manner of thinking concerning ourselves, which becomes creatures such as we are. The proud in heart are an abomination to the Lord, but he has respect to the lowly. "Humble yourselves, therefore, under the mighty hand of God, that he may exalt you in due time."

3. Along with humility we should cultivate cheerfulness. Humility has no connexion with pensive melancholy or timorous dejection. While the truly humble guard against the distraction of all violent passions and inordinate cares, they cherish a cheerful disposition of mind. There cannot, indeed, be genuine cheerfulness without the approbation of our own heart. While, however, we pay a sacred regard to conscience, it must be enlightened and directed by reason and revelation. And happy are the individuals who can say, "our rejoicing is this, the testimony of our conscience, that, in simplicity and godly sincerity, we have had our conversation in the world." An approving mind will contribute greatly to cheerfulness, and that equanimity which results from it, from trust in God, and from the hope of a blessed immortality, is equally remote from sour dissatisfaction, desponding melancholy, and frivolous hilarity. It smooths our path and sweetens our cup, rendering duty easy and affliction light.

4. Cheerfulness and contentment are close companions. They mutually encourage and strengthen each other, and are seldom found in a state of utter separation. Patience is exercised in bearing well those evils which naturally and immediately give us uneasiness. Contentment relates to those things which disturb us by reflection and comparison only, and has a great influence on the happiness of our lives, and the respectability of our characters. Many of the mortifications and disgusts which embitter life proceed not from any positive evils, hunger or cold, pain or disease, but from false estimates, fictitious wants, and imaginary grievances. Numbers, instead of being grateful for the advantages which they enjoy, keep themselves in a state of perpetual irritation and infelicity, by cherishing lofty pretensions, making invidious comparisons, entertaining false notions, foolish pride, and vain ambition. But instead of imitating these trifling self-tormentors, we should remember that intellectual and moral attainments, knowledge and virtue, are the only legitimate grounds of personal respectability among moral agents. We are under the wise and gracious providence of God, who watches over our welfare with parental affection, and, therefore, while we are diligent in the use of means, we will cheerfully submit both to do and to suffer what our Father sees meet. Contentment is the great secret of happiness. Without it neither the gold of Ophir nor the dominion of Ahasuerus can impart felicity. It is the richest mine and the best empire. Contentment, however, has no connexion with indolence or indifference about our temporal concerns. The human mind is endued with an unwearied activity; and this principle, which is the source of our happiness and means of our improvement, should be rightly directed in the diligent prosecution of some honest employment.

Lastly, While we are diligently pursuing our ordinary avocations, we ought ever to attend to the melioration of our moral nature, and to the improvement of our intellectual powers. Knowledge is honourable to a rational being. We have dominion over the inferior animals, not by our physical strength, but by our intellectual endowments; and the extension of our knowledge may be considered as an enlargement of our power. It is also instrumental in cultivating our moral nature; for unless our understanding be improved, our moral faculties will not be very exalted. In proportion as we are ambitious of moral excellence, we will, according to our opportunities, be active in the pursuit of intellectual attainments. Ignorance resulting from carelessness or sloth indicates no small degree of degradation, and will be visited with due retribution.

While we study to be growing in wisdom and in virtue, it becomes us frequently and carefully to examine the state of our mind. They who pay a prudent attention to their temporal concerns often look into the state of their affairs, that they may know whether they be in a thriving condition. This is as needful in our spiritual pursuits. It behoves us often to review the actions of our lives, and the affections of our hearts, and to inquire, as under the eye of God, and with a view to a state of future account, whether we be cherishing those dispositions and acquiring those habits which duty and interest demand. If this examination be conducted with due care, and in the light of revelation, it will be the means of discovering errors which otherwise might have passed unnoticed, and motives to diligence which may have been formerly unperceived.

We have commenced the career of existence which shall never end. Every step we take in life is to have an influence on those that follow. We should therefore be careful never by our present conduct to injure our future interests. As we are daily advancing on our way to eternity, we will daily be growing in likeness to God and meetness for heaven. In youth we labour to acquire that knowledge, and those habits which are requisite for discharging the duties of maturer years; in like manner, during the whole of life we should be employed in the diligent prosecution of that system of education which is requisite to qualify us for the duties and enjoyments of a higher stage of existence. We must never sit down contented with any attainments we may have already made either in knowledge or virtue. The wisest and the best have cause for persevering exertion, and room for growing improvement. Progress in excellence imparts present pleasure, and fits for future glory. We see what exertions the children of this world make to gain the objects of their ambition, honour, wealth, and power. For these they rise early and toil late. They traverse every climate, submit to every privation, encounter every danger. And shall the candidate for high intellectual and moral excellence, and for a blessed immortality, be more timid in encountering difficulties and dangers, or less strenuous and persevering in his exertions, in order to gain the objects of his lofty ambition? The path of happiness and glory lies before us. Let us steadily pursue it. As we approach the close of life, we will draw near the gate of our Father's house, so that when this world fails us, we may find ourselves on the threshold of heaven; and, when the voice of friends on earth dies upon our ear, we may hear the acclamations of the chosen spirits of the universe welcoming us to their dwellings in the paradise of God.

INTRODUCTORY ESSAY,

BY SAMUEL MILLER, D. D.

PROFESSOR IN THE THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY AT PRINCETON, NEW JERSEY.

THE Reformation from Popery is a theme which can never grow old. To the scholar, the statesman, and the moralist, as well as to the Christian, it presents an aspect of the most intense interest. The situation in which that great event found Christendom, it is impossible, even at this distance of time, to contemplate without astonishment and horror. Literature was discouraged, as hostile to religion. Free inquiry was utterly interdicted, as dangerous to the plans and interests of a tyrannical priesthood. The rights of private judgment were not only denied, but the exercise of them prohibited. The Holy Scriptures were locked up from the common people. All the avenues to liberal knowledge were, as far as possible, closed. Claims of authority over all rulers and subjects were advanced, which made the haughtiest kings and emperors to tremble. A large part of the wealth of Europe was in the hands of profligate ecclesiastics;—yet such was the blind devotion of the people, and also of the princes and nobles, that, although they saw the gross abuse of this wealth, they were ready to furnish increasing means of splendour and sensual gratification. Indulgences to commit every kind of iniquity were as publicly sold for money as any other species of merchandise. The lives of the clergy, as well as the body of the people, were not only dissolute, but abominable; a scandal to religion and an outrage on common decency. The clergy professed celibacy, but generally indulged in the grossest and most unbridled lewdness;—a lewdness which did not even attempt to save appearances. Of this the evidences were as loathsome as they were enormous. One example will serve at once to illustrate and confirm the meaning here intended. It is stated by grave historians that, at the celebrated Council of Constance, there came to that city to attend its sessions, besides many hundreds of cooks, musicians, barbers, and other ministers to appetite and luxury, at least fifteen hundred common prostitutes, for the open accommodation of the members of the Council! Nor was this the only sin for which they were distinguished. Their gluttony; their drunkenness; their avarice, rapacity and ambition; their incessant struggles for power; and their system of wicked extortion, and imposition on the easy credulity of the people —altogether presented a scene which beggars description!

Against this monstrous system of corruption and oppression no one was allowed to whisper a syllable. Every avenue by which truth might enter was closed and carefully guarded. If any one began to hint the least dissatisfaction with any doctrine or practice of the Church, and to propose reformation, in any form, he was immediately stigmatized as a "heretic;" and, if he did not consult his safety by flight, was immured in prison, or committed to the flames, and his property transferred to the coffers of his persecutors.

In this deplorable state of things, Christian doctrine, in anything like its simple and Scriptural character, was nearly banished from the Church. Christianity, instead of being found as its Master left it, a pure, vital, holy, and sanctifying system, was perverted into a disgusting round of outward observances, superstitions, and idolatry. Instead of the only living and true God, the great body of those who called themselves Christians, worshipped images, the workmanship of men's hands. Instead of a divine enthroned Saviour, they adored the bread and wine in the eucharist. Instead of the Sacred Oracles as a rule of faith and practice, the commandments of men were set up. Instead of the Bible, the bulls of Popes, and the collections of Canon Law were substituted. Instead of the authority of Christ, and his inspired apostles, the miserable legends, the vain traditions, and the despotic will of wretched pontiffs, who are represented, by the gravest historians, as monsters, or rather "devils" than men, decided everything. The sacred volume was little read, and less understood. The character of Christ was much talked of, but totally misrepresented. The "blood of Christ," and the "merits of Christ," were phrases in every one's mouth; but nothing more than solemn mockery was made of either. While the terms "mercy" and "grace" were loudly chanted, the most unblushing system of self-righteousness was everywhere not only held, but avowed and gloried in; and the blessed Saviour, though holy, harmless, and undefiled, openly made "the minister of sin." In short, the most gloomy superstition, the most unrelenting spiritual tyranny, and the most revolting moral profligacy formed the essential character of that system which the Reformers were happily made instrumental in removing from a large portion of Christendom.

The editors of the "Christian Observer," well known as members and warm friends of the established Church of England, when speaking on this subject, make the following just and weighty remarks:

"Another principle, strong enough to be called a passion in the whole band of Reformers, was that of proclaiming to mankind the doctrine of justification by faith in the merits of Jesus Christ.

"Some modern writers are fond of representing the Reformation as a mere effort on the part of the Reformers to shake off the burden of papal ceremonies. But it ought rather to be contemplated as the re-assertion of this grand principle, the establishment of which was sure to level to the ground all the gingerbread fabric of ceremonies which the Church of Rome had substituted in its place. The image of Dagon must fall when the Ark of God is introduced. It was not the mere desire to abolish ceremonies that influenced the Reformers; for a ceremonial religion is better than none. But it was to substitute the Saviour for real or fancied saints; it was to elevate Him to the throne which they had so long usurped. It was to teach men to "glory," not in themselves, or in canonized men or bones, but in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, that they lived and died. The Reformation is ever to be considered as the triumph of principle over force; and of the particular principle of justification by grace, through faith in a crucified Redeemer, over every device which priestcraft, or pride, or superstition, had conceived for propitiating an offended God. We are convinced that a vast majority of the errors in religion may be traced to that unremitting and indefatigable desire of the natural mind to do without Christ. In this respect, Popery is to be considered, not as the mere chance-religion of a country or an age;—as a church accidentally founded and cemented by the labours or arts of a few cardinals and pontiffs. It is to be considered as the real antichrist, the religion of human nature; as the great confederation of mankind to get rid of Christ: as an organized effort to substitute a sort of gilded machinery for that grand pillar of salvation, pardon by the free grace of God, and through the atoning blood of his Son. It was to such a confederation, then, deeply intrenched and guarded by its rich temporalities, and invested by its mere age with a factitious sanctity, that Zuingle and his brethren opposed themselves. Carried by the grace of God, and the force of this their master-principle, through every obstacle, they triumphed, in defiance of the strength of their enemies, and even of their own deficiencies, and built up that Church which is the mother of us all."*

In another volume of the same valuable work, the following just and strong views are exhibited.

"Popery may be termed, in few words, a system of paganized Christianity. Every religious institution of paganism had a tendency to chain down the understandings of its votaries to visible and corporeal objects; to distract their attention between a vast variety of such objects; and thus to keep their minds from aspiring to just conceptions of the Creator, and their hearts from rendering to him the fear, love, and homage which are his due. This was the general effect produced upon mankind by all the lying vanities of the gentile world—their demi-gods, their deified heroes, their local and household divinities, their temples, auguries, and oracles. After the establishment of Christianity throughout the Roman empire, much of the leaven of heathenism still prevailed. Its spirit was gradually transfused into all the doctrines, institutions, and ceremonies of our holy religion; and being powerfully aided by the general corruption of human nature, and by the ignorance and barbarism of those dark ages which followed the irruption of the Northern conquerors, it succeeded eventually in building up that fabric of superstition and unscriptural theology which was, at length, formally consecrated by the Council of Trent."†

It was against this enormous system of antichristian darkness, profligacy, and tyranny that the Reformers felt themselves called upon to wage war. And, accordingly, the benefit which they were enabled, by the grace of God, to confer upon their generation, and, indeed, on the Church and the world in all succeeding ages, was by no means of a confined or narrow character. Literature, science, civil liberty, and good morals were all essentially promoted by that great moral miracle which we denominate the Reformation, no less than the disenthralment and the reign of the gospel. While it electrified and convulsed, it, at the same time, enlightened and purified a large portion of Europe.

I have called this event a moral miracle. And, truly, when we consider, on the one hand, the strong and deep-rooted prejudices which were almost universally prevalent, when the Reformers went forth to their work; the wealth, power, and interest which were leagued against them; the deep and almost invincible authority which the force of habit, and of inveterate usurpation had imparted to the corrupt opinions and practices of the times; and the consequent formidable danger attending any attempt to shake that authority, and to demolish the unhallowed fabric which it had built up; and when we reflect, on the other hand, upon the seemingly accidental causes from which the Reformation originated; and the apparently inconsiderable means by which it was carried on, contrasted with its irresistible progress, and its mighty results,—results in which the Church and the world yet rejoice,—we cannot but see abundant reason for wonder, gratitude and praise. That thick darkness which had been so long brooding over the nations was in a great degree dissipated. The human mind, which had been for ages, as tame and passive as if it had been formed to believe whatever it was ordered to believe, and to bear whatever an unprincipled and tyrannical priesthood thought proper to lay upon it; was unexpectedly roused, became conscious of its dignity and rights, and disdainful of the yoke of mere authority. The fetters with which men had been bound for ages were, extensively, broken. The rights of private judgment began to be understood and asserted. The religious freedom which now began to dawn upon the nations gave a new impulse to literature and science; and, on the other hand, the lights and the emancipation of literature imparted a favourable influence to the study and the reign of a sound theology. In short, we may say, that human society, in all its relations and interests, was benefited by the event of which we speak to an extent which it is not easy to estimate, and which is daily unfolding itself more and more.

† Vol. XXIII. p. 135.

The attentive observer of human affairs, however, will perceive, that rich as were the services of the Reformers, and great as are, undoubtedly, the obligations we owe them—the all-wise and almighty King of Zion had been preparing the way for their ministry, and its results, for a considerable time before they appeared. A variety of circumstances contributed to this happy effect. The impolitic and ferocious violence of some of the Popes in the fifteenth, and beginning of the sixteenth centuries; the openly profligate lives of some others of these high functionaries, the abominable licentiousness which generally characterized their court and capital;—the shockingly corrupt manners of the clergy everywhere; the gross ignorance, and shameless effrontery of the several orders of Mendicants; the seventy years "Babylonish captivity," as it was called, at Avignon;—the grand Western Schism, of forty years continuance, which followed it, in which two and sometimes three Popes appeared, abusing and excommunicating each other,—loading each other with the most revolting insults, and reproaching each other, and not unjustly, with the most degrading vices—the grievous papal exactions of every kind, and especially the profligate system of INDULGENCES, that monstrous abuse of the most monstrous of all usurped powers; the intolerance and cruelty of the Inquisition; and the grievous wounds inflicted on the cause of truth and decorum by the ferocious wars carried on by some of the monastic orders, more especially by the Dominicans and Franciscans, among themselves. Surely, all these, which the writer of the important work before us strongly depicts, are quite sufficient to account for the hatred and contempt which appeared to be lurking in the breasts of so many at the beginning of the sixteenth century. The friends of the papacy, at the opening of the century, thought that all was not only tranquil, but safe. But it was only the portentous calm which precedes the heaving earthquake. The only wonder is that the explosion had not occurred years before; that the superstitious reverence of the people had not much sooner given place to a settled abhorrence and indignation, prompting them to rise as one man and throw off their chains.

At length, however, the time, even the "set time to favour Zion" had come. The Papal fabric, built up and cemented by the superstitions and the prejudices of ages, was destined, with respect to a large portion of Europe, to be prostrated in the dust. Instruments were raised up for the accomplishment of the work; and means apparently insufficient were made to prevail, with a power, and to an extent, which those whose instrumentality was employed, were by no means prepared to anticipate.

Every Christian owes it to himself, to his Master, and to the Church of God to study this great Revolution, in its rise, progress, instruments, establishment, and immeasurable effects. We are too apt to forget the toil, the dangers, and the privations which our fathers of the Reformation underwent, in securing those privileges in which we still rejoice. Few portions of history can be better adapted to instruct in truth, to animate in duty, and to excite Christians to be "followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises."

I do not forget that many who glory in the name of "Protestant," appear to have but little sympathy with those noble-minded Christian heroes who braved all the terrors of martyrdom for the sake of delivering the Church from the thraldom of error and superstition under which she had so long groaned. Some of these appear to imagine that, although the corruptions of the Papacy, as they were then exhibited, were such as fully to justify the Reformers in all that they said and did for their removal, yet that the character of the Romish Church has essentially altered since that time, and is now a system, if not entirely harmless, at least little adapted to inspire apprehension in the mind of an enlightened and liberal Christian.

This view of the subject I believe to be entirely erroneous. The system of Romanism is, in its nature, spirit, and purposes, precisely what it was when Luther, Melancthon, Calvin, and Cranmer, went forth in the name of the Lord, and lifted up their banner against her. She has not abated "one jot or tittle" of either her tyrannical claims, or her pestiferous corruptions. Indeed, considering the essential nature of her claims, they cannot be either mitigated or altered without being totally abandoned. That this has never been done, we have evidence of the most conclusive kind on every side.

The following remarks on this subject, in a work lately published, by the REV. JOHN SCOTT, a pious divine of the Church of England, and a son of the venerable DR. THOMAS SCOTT, author of a well known Commentary on the Bible, are worthy of the attention of those Protestants who imagine that all desire to examine and refute the claims of Romanists at the present day, are unnecessary if not improper.

"Does either piety or charity require us to keep any measures with that system, which, laying hold of God's best gift to the human race, the religion of Jesus Christ, converted it through successive centuries, into the very reverse of all for which it was designed; making it the instrument of darkness instead of light; of impurity instead of holiness; of tyranny, both spiritual and civil, instead of freedom; and even of renewed idolatry, instead of the pure and spiritual worship, which was to have subverted superstition, and banished all false religion from among men. Surely, in consistence with the most perfect good-will even to its votaries, we may desire to see such a system consumed by the spirit of the Lord's mouth, and destroyed by the brightness of his coming." Yes, whatever indulgence we may be desirous of extending to the professors of the Roman Catholic religion, (and let them have every indulgence, every privilege that they can enjoy consistently with the common safety,) yet let us never forget what popery was, and is essentially in itself, and what it will ever show itself to be in proportion as it is enabled to act freely, and to display its true character. It is one of the fashionable and threatening errors of the present day, that, in their zeal to show themselves liberal, and candid, and indulgent toward Roman Catholics, men are apt to soften down, and lose sight of the enormities, doctrinal and practical, of the papal system. Persecution, it is true, is a crime to which our fallen nature is prone, and into which all parties have, in different degrees, fallen; but let us not on that ground, with affected philosophy, but with real indolence and indiscrimination, and in defiance of all historic verity, pretend that popery stands, in this respect, on the same footing with other religious systems. No: PERSECUTION IS INHERENT IN THE VERY PRINCIPLES AND CONSTITUTION OF THE ROMISH CHURCH:—She has been in this, as in so many other respects, "the mother of abominations to the earth." If other professedly Christian bodies long retained the persecuting spirit, it was mainly because they found it so difficult wholly to eradicate the seeds of instruction which they had received from her hand; and while they have undoubtedly been occasionally stained with the blood of those who dissented from them, SHE HAS BEEN EVEN STEEPED IN IT—in the strong language of Scripture prophecy, DRUNK WITH THE BLOOD OF THE SAINTS AND THE MARTYRS OF JESUS. And the testimony which has fallen in my way, from the pen of her sanctioned and remunerated advocate, Pallavicini, to her unaltered and unalterable principles, however she may, from policy, suffer her unaccredited members for a time to deviate from them, or even to deny them—is so striking, that I cannot but here transcribe it. "The whole of our faith," he says, "rests upon one indivisible article, viz: THE INFALLIBLE AUTHORITY OF THE CHURCH. The moment, therefore, we give up any part whatever, the whole falls; for what admits not of being divided, must evidently stand entire, or fall entire."*

The truth is, as long as the Romish Church continues to maintain the universal supremacy and infallibility of the Pope; as long as she openly teaches the antichristian doctrine of merits, and sanctions the unhallowed traffic in indulgences; as long as she represents heaven as a part of the domain, so to speak, of St. Peter, to be parcelled out, and made over to men for money, just as the avarice or the caprice of the Pope and his emissaries may dictate; as long as she maintains transubstantiation, auricular confession, penance, the celibacy of the clergy, the worship of images, prayers to the saints, and for the dead; especially as long as she locks up the Scriptures from the common people, and obliges them to take both the contents and the meaning of the word of God, as she herself chooses to deal it out to them; as long as she "binds heavy burdens and grievous to be borne, and lays them on men's shoulders, while she herself refuses to touch them with one of her fingers"—she cannot cease to be ANTICHRIST—BABYLON THE GREAT—THE MOTHER OF HARLOTS AND ABOMINATIONS OF THE EARTH."

If we wish to know what the papacy really is, let us contemplate the system in those countries where it is armed with power, and where its spirit is acted out. Let us go to Spain, to Portugal, and to a few other portions of Europe, where the reins are, without restraint, entirely in popish hands. There we shall find the reign of superstition wonderful, nay incredible, to those who have not seen it; the moral profligacy not only of the people, but of the clergy also, perfectly scandalous; and the spiritual tyranny over the consciences, and indeed over all the rights and privileges of men clothed with a gloom and a terror of which we, in this land of liberty, cannot even conceive. Such, however, difficult as many Protestants find to believe it, is the native spirit of Romanism; and such, undoubtedly, would be the spirit acted out in our own country, if the character of our government, and the state of society admitted of such enormous abuse. Those who, for a moment, doubt this, must be as blind to the facts daily attested by the voice of travellers, as they are to all the instructions of authentic, unquestionable history.

Yet there are those serious Protestants who cannot be persuaded that there is anything dangerous in the character of Romanism! That it is an erroneous system, they acknowledge; but imagine that its errors are of a very harmless nature! And hence they disapprove of all preaching and writing against that system. They can hear Romish priests preach in favour of their highest and most offensive claims, without one feeling of revolt. But if a Protestant divine undertake to defend his religion against the denunciations of the Romanists, and to expose the antichristian and profligate errors of "the man of sin," he must expect to be censured by many as a "persecutor!" Let such read with seriousness and care the following work; and if they are not convinced of their mistake, we may consider their case as hopeless!

It will be perceived that this work was a Prize Essay, to which this award was adjudged by the National Institute of France. The author was CHARLES FRANCIS DOMINIC DE VILLERS, a native of France. He was born at Belchen, in Lorraine, in the year 1761. He became a lieutenant of artillery at the age of eighteen; but in the revolution he joined the prince of Condé at Triers, in consequence of which, on the failure of the royal cause, he was obliged to seek an asylum in Germany. After repeated removals, he settled at Lubec, where he wrote several valuable and popular works, particularly this "Essay on the Influence of the Reformation by Luther." He was afterwards professor of philosophy in the University of Gottingen; but was deprived of the office on the restoration of peace. He obtained, however, a pension from the Hanoverian government, and was made a knight of the polar star by the king of Sweden. He died in 1815.

As Mons. Villers was not an ecclesiastic; as the National Institute, when the prize was adjudged to his Essay, was very far from being under any ecclesiastical thraldom; and as the award was made in the midst of a predominant Roman Catholic population, we cannot imagine that there was any temptation to indulge in gratuitous bitterness respecting the subject of it, or to venture on any misstatement of facts. It has generally received, from competent judges, high commendation, and will well reward an attentive perusal. In regard to the opinions expressed by the writer in the various parts of his work, I cannot be supposed to vouch for them all. But it strikes me as an important work, ably executed, the general tendency of which is highly salutary.

VILLER'S ESSAY.

PART I.

GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS.

SECT. I.

On the State of the Question.

IF, during any of the centuries which preceded the sixteenth, and while no opposition had been raised against the supremacy of the Roman pontiffs, a learned assembly had been desirous of calculating the results of a schism, of a contrary opinion to that of Rome, the question would doubtless have been framed thus: "What are the evils and the scandal with which the church has been afflicted, on account of such an impious and pernicious doctrine?" At this time, when several respectable nations have separated from the Romish church; when the intimate connection by which all Europe is united has convinced Christians of that persuasion, that others are as virtuous, as well regulated, as enlightened as themselves, the question must necessarily assume another form. An assembly of philosophers, in the bosom of France, restored to the Catholic worship, proposes to ascertain the influence of Luther's reformation on the state of European society, on the progress of knowledge. This change in language implies a great one in opinion; and, in this point of view, the question may be said to answer itself.

As the institute have not added any explanatory outline to the question, the following considerations, the intention of which is to determine the object and the latitute of the answer, will not appear misplaced.

By a superficial observer, it may be thought that a religious revolution should only exercise its influence on matters connected with religion; on the worship and the discipline of the church: but long before Luther's reformation, the church and the state were so assimilated in every political body in Europe; their rights and their constitutions were so blended, that one of them could not be convulsed without the other experiencing the shock. The church, which had universally formed a state within a state, had carried its usurpations over the latter so far, that it threatened to swallow it up. All Europe was for a length of time in danger of yielding to the dominion of an absolute theocracy. The emperors of the new empire of the west, who saved it from that destiny, afterwards menaced it with the project of an universal monarchy. The kings of France, England, Sweden, and Denmark, the princes and free cities of Germany and Italy offered only a partial and alternate opposition to the pretensions of either of the competitors. A new impulse; a new and powerful tie, which united the oppressed against both the oppressors at the same time; an event which awakened every passion; the love of liberty; a religious and political fanaticism, which augmented the power of princes in a tenfold degree, by exalting the people, which, in short, offered to the leaders both independence and the rich prey of the spoils of the clergy; such an event, I say, must, in such a period, have produced an universal agitation in Europe. The systems of the modern states were shook by it to their foundations. During the long and grievous struggle which followed, everything acquired a different form, and a different establishment. A new political order arose from the ferment and general confusion: the different elements of which it was composed, long agitated by contending forces, yielding, at length, to the laws of gravitation of the moral world, took the places in it assigned to them by their respective weights, but which, in most instances, were not those they had formerly occupied. A new series of ideas also arose from this conflict of opinions; men dared to think, to reason, to examine those things which, before, required only a blind submission. Thus a simple attack on ecclesiastical discipline produced a considerable change in the political situation of the states of Europe, and in the morals of its inhabitants. The institute was therefore inspired with the true spirit of history in encouraging the solution of the problem which it has so ably proposed. It is honourable to a writer to be called upon to treat of religion and politics, the two cardinal points of human life, before such an assembly. One of the first fruits of true liberty is the power of discussing these important objects without restraint, and the country where this privilege is exercised must incontrovertibly be free.

* Scott's History of the Church of Christ, I. 228, 229.

In inquiring what has been the influence of the reformation of Luther, the institute shows clearly that it does not consider this influence as existing, at this time, in an active manner. In fact, near three centuries have elapsed since the first explosion. The agitation occasioned by it became gradually calmed; the power which originally gave the impulse, and which produced so many new events, has ceased to act as a moving force, as a productive principle. The greater part of the institutions which it created, and of those which it modified, have been preserved; some are extinct; but those which remain are now guided by the universal course of events, and the reformation is no longer the immediate cause which directs their progress. It has nearly accomplished everything of which it is capable; its influence is now perceived only mediately, without convulsions, and by the course of the institutions originating from it. The time is therefore arrived when the advantages or disadvantages which have resulted to the human race from it, may be inquired into, enumerated, and discussed. It will doubtless be conformable to the views of the institute to confine myself to an exact specification of all the proximate consequences of the reformation, and to be satisfied with a slight notice of the remote ones. To engage in the details of these last, it would be necessary to draw the immense picture of the history of Europe subsequent to that period, since there is scarcely any great event, in which some result of the reformation, such as the present constitution of the Germanic body, for example, or the republic of the United Provinces, has not, in its turn, exercised a greater or less degree of influence. We should never get freed from this labyrinth of mediate consequences; for, in this point of view, the influence of every political or religious commotion extends to infinity. To this day, we are more or less affected by what passed in India, Arabia, Greece, and Italy, in very remote times: we still live very perceptibly under the influence of the irruption of the northern tribes, of the crusades, and of other political movements which have become the principles of action to the people. The line of deviation, often crooked, sometimes retrograde, in the improvement of nations, is produced by the complicated action of many different forces: to mark its escapes, its aberrations, by putting a just value on the powers which have contributed to it, is the province of the philosophy of history. The author of the present essay will esteem himself fortunate, if his judges are of opinion that he has performed this task, with respect to that period of modern history in which the reformation was the predominant power.

Nevertheless, it is not possible to engage in an inquiry into the effects of the reformation, without being, in some degree, obliged to give way to this reflection; "Is not the great event which I consider as a cause, in itself so much a simple result of other causes, which have preceded it, that the true origin of all that has followed it must be referred to them, and not to it, which has only been an intermedium?" Without doubt such is the situation of the mind in these researches. While it looks forward, its point of departure seems to be the fixed base from whence all the successive steps proceed. If its looks are turned back, the first point appears to it only the necessary consequence of those which have preceded it, and as a passage to arrive at those which follow. To the mental eye, every cause, in ascending, becomes a simple effect; each effect becomes, in its turn, a cause, in descending. The inclination which we feel to attribute everything which follows an event to the event itself, as though it was the cause of it, is the clew which guides us in the arrangement of historical facts; it is the law of cohesion by which the present is united to the past. To proceed in this manner from the effect to the cause, until we reach a first cause, subsisting by itself, and which cannot be the effect of any other cause, is a necessary consequence of our knowledge, which seeks an absolute principle to build its speculations on. It is on this slippery path that metaphysics is lost. A man who, without knowing the nature of the course of a river, should arrive on its banks, seeing it here gliding through an extensive plain, there confined within narrow valleys, in another place foaming beneath the precipice of a cataract; this man would take the first turning where it might be concealed by a projection, for the origin of the river; ascending higher, a new turn, the cataract, will occasion the same illusion; at length, he reaches its source, he takes the mountain from which it issues for the first cause of the river; but he will soon think that the sides of the mountain would be exhausted by so continual a torrent; he will see clouds collected, the rains, without which the dried mountain could not supply a spring. Then the clouds become the first cause; but it was the winds which brought these here, by passing over vast seas; but it was the sun who attracted the clouds from the sea; but whence arises this power of the sun? Behold him then soon entangled in the researches of speculative physics, by seeking a cause, an absolute foundation, from which he may, finally deduce the explanation of so many phenomena.

Thus, the historian who inquires what was the cause which led to the reduction of the authority of the popes, to the terrible thirty years' war, to the humiliation of the house of Austria, the establishment of a powerful opposition in the heart of the empire, the foundation of Holland as a free state, and so of other occurrences, will, at first, see the origin of all these events in the reformation, and will attribute them absolutely to its influence. But urging his inquiries farther, he discovers that this reformation itself is evidently only a necessary result of other circumstances, which precede it, an event of the sixteenth century, with which the fifteenth, to use the expression of Leibnitz, was pregnant; at most, the cataract of the river. How many are there who are still of opinion they have found the first cause of the French revolution in the deficit, in the convocation of the states-general, in the tiers-etat, in the curates! Others, who carry their views a little farther, attribute it to the parliament Maupeou, the extinction of the Jesuits, &c. They are all right in that limited point of view which they have taken. Those, however, who contemplate the progress of human nature during a succession of ages, see this enormous mass of individual cases roll on, each of which, animated by its interest, its passions, and its peculiar spirit, seems desirous to counteract the progress of all the others; but notwithstanding their infinite diversity, all these motives have common features tending towards certain ends, which, finally, are the same; these features, these tendencies common to all, form a collection of powers, or rather a single power, which is that of the human race, that of a universal spirit, which, concealed through ages, guides and governs them. Under the dominion of providence, (that sun of the moral world, to use again the expression of a philosopher,) this spirit of humanity, by its continual action, prepares and disposes events. This great revolution which surprises us, is only a product, a result, a striking manifestation. Is it therefore to it, is it not rather to the influence of the causes, which have themselves preceded and led to it, that the events which have followed it should be attributed?

In the case in question, therefore, it is requisite for the historian to attend to what had passed before the great event which he examines; to ascertain the influence of the causes, by which the event itself was brought about, and in what degree these same causes have influenced the series of subsequent events. It is also requisite for him to consider what would have happened through the slow and progressive course of humanity, which is sometimes called the natural course of things, if the great event, if the convulsion in question, had not supervened. Finally, he must determine what particular modifications in its results have been occasioned by the proper and individual character of this event; the character of the age and of the nation in which it occurred, and that of the men who had the principal share in it.

SECT. II.

On the Essence of Reformations in General.

As the mind rises through the series of events, and passes from each effect to its cause, to attain, at length, to a first cause, which serves it as a principle, and where it forms the first link of its chain; in the same manner it descends from causes to effects, eager to arrive at a last result, an absolute effect, which is satisfactory of itself, and is not required to become a cause or to act the part of a simple medium leading still further. This effect which must terminate everything, the last link of the chain, and final result of all which has preceded it, is the object sought by the mind, the place of repose at which it finally consents to stop. All its speculations on human events are divided into this double inquiry of principle and object: from what do they arise, and to what do they tend? It is within these two points that the action of the mind is restrained, and it chooses them more or less proximate, or more or less remote, according to its capacity, or to its existing wishes. But when it has not attained, on the one hand, to a cause which it feels warranted in taking for a primitive one, and, on the other, to an object which it considers as final, the mind of man remains in suspense, it vacillates within a compulsory equilibrium, and experiences the inquietude of an unaccomplished purpose. It is true, it may be possible for it to give up that space which it has determined not to investigate, and to assign a boundary within which the entire exercise of its power shall be restrained; but even this resignation is not in the power of every mind, nor is it, perhaps, in the primitive nature of any.

Let us therefore allow him who reflects on the history of the human race to ask, to what tends this succession of tumultuous events, of commotions, of transmutations in things and in opinions? Let him dare to give free vent to his thoughts in the investigation of the final end of so many progressive revolutions. He can only find it in that sublime idea of a state of things, in which the destination of humanity, in the aggregate, being perfectly accomplished, all its physical and moral powers having attained the highest degree of developement, men would be as good, as enlightened, as happy as the original dispositions of their nature would admit of. Not that he will be able to show that this golden age of morality, this chiliasm of philosophy, can ever be realized, such as a beneficent dream represents it to us. But in the efforts of men, in those of nations, we cannot misconceive that tendency to improvement, to an order of things more just, more humane, in which the rights of all shall be better secured, and these rights be more equally distributed. Let us acknowledge that absolute perfection will never be the lot of mortals; but let us, at the same time, avow that this perfection forms the ideal object of their wishes, that it is the desire of their reason. It is not asserted that they will reach it, but it is unquestionable that they aspire to it. Perhaps the geometrical phenomenon of the assymptote is repeated in the moral world, and that, continually approaching to a point of meeting on the curve, we shall never touch it. Nevertheless the hope of the approximation alone is sufficient to inflame exalted minds, and is an object worthy of them. Alas! what would be the fate of the generations which succeed each other, what the despair of him who meditates upon them, if the laws of a creation, incessantly active, were not discoverable through the chaos of human affairs; if, in the darkest commotions which threaten to engulf all things, the light of providence did not permit the distant view of a happier futurity? It is certainly true that in the unbridled tempests, the whirlwinds raised by the passions on the ocean of time, the direct road to this object cannot always be strictly followed; and to deviate, to pause, become too frequently necessary. The observer, sometimes deceived, may suppose the progress retrograde, while, at the same time, it is not so; for all are not provided with a compass sufficiently correct to point out the path it ought to follow. But he who asserts that it is retrograde, by so doing admits the existence of the object; for to retrograde is only to remove farther from it. And admitting that this backsliding takes place for a time, can it, from thence, result that afterwards the approximation shall not be made with greater celerity? Is not that a contracted sight which cannot penetrate beyond the point at which it is checked? To judge of all the road, it must be contemplated entire. That part of it which humanity must pass through after us, is unknown to us; but we may form an opinion of it by what has been already done. Until our time mankind have advanced on it, and it is to be expected that our successors will also advance; Greece and Italy, savage at the first, were far behind Greece and Italy in the refined period of their improvement. But however eminent this amelioration may, in many respects, have been, it was individual to each of these nations, exclusive to all others; it belonged to the citizen of Rome, to the citizen of Athens, but it did not belong to man. All the rest of the globe was barbarous and enslaved, slaves in fact to a few thousand individuals. Could the developement of civilization be always restrained to a few cities, to so contracted a corner of the earth? Could the millions of human beings, who vegetated in the nations from the Oby to the Elbe remain eternally strangers to it, and serve only as a supply to the armies and the galley-slaves of the privileged people? Doubtless no. There must be a dispersion of knowledge among them; there must be a mixture, which would convey the spirit of Latium and Achaia into Cimbria. The means of accomplishing this was, either that the small body, in possession of knowledge, must overcome these innumerable tribes, and penetrate to the extremity of continents almost inaccessible; or, otherwise, that the multitude of these rude nations should conquer the small people and become blended with them in the very focus of knowledge. After the employment of the first alternative, the Romans having penetrated as far as their strength, and a bravery worthy of eternal admiration, permitted them, the second, and more natural method, was brought into action by the mysterious arbiter of human destiny. The people of the north overran the south of Europe, and brought their ignorance into it. Chaos seemed restored; knowledge twinkled faintly and with difficulty here and there in the midst of profound night, which lasted for a time proportionate to the foreign mass which had newly appeared: it required ten centuries of fermentation to assimilate such a quantity of heterogeneous elements with the superior ones which had been blended among them. At length knowledge burst forth again on all sides. During three centuries since its re-appearance, it has spread and made an unheard of progress. The civilization of Athens and of Rome have been rediscovered, not only through all Europe, but at Philadelphia and Calcutta. Rome and Athens which our arts and our knowledge would astonish, would also admire the humanity of the European, whose boast is that he is a man, and who no longer suffers slavery to taint his soil. This then has resulted from the horrible irruption of the barbarians in the fourth century, and thus at length time has justified Providence, the power of which, for one, or even for several generations, appears sometimes to have wholly ceased to act. I have selected this example because the apparent degradation of humanity, during the long interval of the barbarism of the middle ages, is, generally the favourite theme brought forward by the opponents of perfectability in support of their opinion.

And if we enter into the detail of the gradual civilization of these barbarians, who are the progenitors of the most polished nations of the present day, what will first engage the attention? Power, the only right: each individual; each master of a castle, at war with all his neighbourhood; and these wars, which may be said to have been fought man to man, deluging the land with blood, carrying desolation into every corner of it, taking place without any law but the ferocity of the conqueror. What a dismal picture is that of the Gauls, for example, in this anarchial state! By degrees, the valour, or the fortune of some of the chiefs brought extensive provinces under their dominion, in which they introduced order and discipline, and the inhabitants were relieved from the horrors of a universal and unceasing warfare: finally, these provinces themselves became united under a single government; millions of men, formerly separated into a multiplicity of hordes, which massacred each other indiscriminately, were from thenceforward compatriots, brothers, subject to the same laws, restrained by the same discipline. Where murder and unchecked pillage held their sway, safety, harmony, and order are now seen; Gaul has become one homogeneous whole, over all the extent of which reigns that perpetual peace which is felt, but not acknowledged. Will our civil wars be brought forward? These, at least, have been the effect of accidents, of crisis against nature; they can no longer be said to be the permanent and constitutional state of the whole of a country. The curative power of the entire body speedily brings a remedy, and experience has proved that they become more and more easy to extinguish. We may therefore conclude, in despite of that gloomy disposition which occasions so many to be ardent admirers of the past, merely that they may more freely depreciate the present, that our time is far superior to that of the Goths and Vandals; and although humanity has risen through all the distance which separates them, the consoling prospective, that our posterity will reach a better and happier state, is not denied to us.

I solicit the indulgence of my judges for this, almost involuntary, effusion of my soul. I know the language of speculation may be hazarded before sages, whose intention is to add the consolatory views of philosophy to the study of history. But is it possible to avoid directing the attention towards an amelioration of human affairs, while meditating on the consequences of those sanguinary revolutions, of which the reformation effected by Luther, offers so memorable an example? At each of these great convulsions of nations, should we not accuse the divine providence of tyrannical absurdity, if the result of so many evils was only to precipitate mankind into a worse state than that from which they had been freed? But no; after these deplorable crises, in which so many individuals have been sacrificed, it is not uncommon to see a better order of things arise, to see the whole species advance, with more freedom, towards the great object pointed out by reason, and attain to a new developement of its improvement, at each new explosion of its powers.

From these premises we may consider the gradual improvement of the human race as consisting in an uninterrupted succession of reformations; some of them silent and slow, the lingering results of ages, of the individual persuasion of powers, and of opinion, which, in the end, supersedes errors; others, striking and powerful, the sudden results of a burst of light which strikes all eyes, of the lassitude of long oppression of an excessive necessity of restoring an equilibrium in some part of the political or religious system. The latter are the periods, the military stones to the human race in their progress through time. History numbers them with care, investigates their results, and determines by them the divisions of her work.

Men of meek minds, warmed by a mild philanthropy without enthusiasm, who are more affected by a horror of present evils than they are flattered with a hope of future good; those moderate minds which are terrified at a violent procedure and the fury of revolts; these, I say, adhering to the ameliorations, the reforms which time brings round without agitation, desire, and with justice, that good should never be manifested but under a beneficent form. Wherever they perceive the burst of passions, arms provoked by arms, thunder answering thunder, they sigh, they are grieved, they protest equally against both parties. Frequently they declare against that which has first broken the repose so dear to them; although, very often, this is in reality innocent, in reality driven to extremity by oppression. May we not rank in this class a great number of the adversaries of our last revolution, so many worthy and upright men who have been crushed in the shock of parties? In this manner, the aversion of some distinguished men of the sixteenth century, not to the doctrine, but to the events of the reformation, may be explained. Erasmus called it the Lutheran tragedy; and it was, in fact, because the drama marked its issue as tragic, that this wise and circumspect man, whose favourite motto was otium cum dignitate, refused to act a part in it.* But to desire that good should only be effected by good, is to make humanity a romance; it is to convert history into an idyl, and the universe into an Arcadia. Unfortunately it does not happen thus. Nature, among the multiplicity of benefits which it bestows on the earth, afflicts it with hurricanes, inundations, subterraneous fires, the types of the dreadful scourges which are sometimes found in society, and which are often occasioned by the faults of our predecessors, sometimes by our own. It is necessary, therefore, for the man who would enjoy his own period to submit to them, and to consider them as the accomplishment of the profound laws which guide the great whole; laws which we can never misinterpret, except when we presume to judge of their operation too partially, and in too contracted a point of view.

The amelioration of his institutions, whether political or religious, which man unceasingly aspires to, consists in bringing and keeping them as near as he possibly can to the peculiar spirit which constitutes their essence. The exterior forms with which they are clothed are seldom so agreeable to the spirit as to admit of its entire action and accomplishment. It too frequently happens that the clogged wheels of the machine suspend and render the impulse of the mainspring irregular. It is the nature of man himself, who is a compound of soul and body closely united, which subjects all human institutions to this discordant duplicity. Contained in, and, as it were, shackled by the corporeal organs given to him for its manifestation, his understanding cannot give freedom to the exercise of its ideas, nor produce them as ethereal as it conceived them. To act and be perceptible, externally, thought must be allied with a body, to which it gives its form, and which is communicated in its stead. Hence, for example, arise the extreme importance of language, the faculty of thinking and the truth of this position, that without language we should be unable to combine our ideas. Thus, for the use of man, every institution requires to be provided with a body, a physical and sensible form. The spirit of all religions is, without doubt, originally the same, as well as that of all governments. The one consists in acknowledging, as laws imposed by God himself, the moral laws and rules of duty engraved on the hearts of all men; the other, in securing his natural rights to every member of society. But what would that religion be, what that government, which depended only on this simple idea, which should only be a pure spirit? It would not be an organized machine, capable of acting in the human world; it would not be a human institution. To become so, it must have an external form, organs, a visible and material consistence.

Nevertheless, the unalterable eternal spirit, which forms the soul of these institutions, remains always what it was, always similar to itself. But this is not the case with the body, the external form. This, subject to the influence of the physical world, of human passions, variable, perishable, is modified by accident and by events. In proportion as its configuration becomes changed, as its organs become cramped, thickened, overcharged, the oppressed and shackled spirit loses its primitive action and direction; sometimes stifled under a monstrous aggregate, it entirely ceases to manifest itself; the phantom no longer has life or pliancy; it possesses only the rigidity and heaviness of death. Thus the pure and sublime spirit of Christianity, to which no form less pure and less simple than itself is fitting,* was successively smothered, during a long series of ages, until the sixteenth century, by a continual load of foreign elements, which had vitiated its action, and, gradually, produced a misshapen body, from whence issued all the ills which the errors and the passions were capable of generating. Thus history, the depository of woful experience, shows us almost always, that the political constitutions, established to maintain natural justice among the people, degenerate in the end, and finish by being clogged with a mass, inimical to liberty and to the public welfare. This opinion, almost always confirmed by the event, is therefore very generally received by those who reflect on the fate of nations, "that a government, democratic in its principle, is successively, and in a shorter or longer period, converted into an oligarchy, or monarchy, and finishes by degenerating into despotism."

* It is known besides that Erasmus was not of a disposition to sacrifice his interest to his opinions. He aspired to a cardinal's hat, and although he might not succeed, his anxiety for it gives a clew to his conduct towards the reformers. The Catholic clergy still retained more dignities and more riches than the protestant clergy; with the people of the stamp of Erasmus, this reason was sufficient to induce them to declare in favour of the first.

* Fenelon, in his Lettre sur l'existence de Dieu et sur le culte digne de lui (in the second volume of Œuvres Philosophiques) repeats several times, that the Christian religion is only the love of God. At page 16, he quotes Tertulian, who, with the same idea says, that the soul is naturally Christian; and at page 28, St. Augustine, according to whom, there can be no other worship but love, nec colitur ille nisi amando. "This," according to Fenelon, "is the reign of God within us; it is the worship in spirit and in truth; it is the sole end for which God has made us." It is obvious that the Holy See would find this mode of being a Christian not very agreeable.

Hence, at certain epochas, springs the desire generally felt by all upright and disinterested minds, of a reform in the great human establishments. The external form is in general too revolting to the spirit. What must be the issue when, no longer harmonizing with it, it constrains, oppresses, paralyzes it! It must, in the end, burst forth, it must free itself from a body which no longer supplies it with organs calculated to second its developement. Mankind, who all, in a greater or less degree, possess a correct idea, a type of this spirit, are enraged against the haughty and pernicious colossus; they crush it in their indignation, and compel it to give back the holy flame which it concealed; light and vacillating, they are unable to seize it; they must enclose it in a vessel formed by their hands, they must unite it to a new sensible form. Thus after having destroyed the old edifice of the Roman communion, the confession of Augsburg, and other similar codes were requisite for the Christians separated from it; after the destruction of the French monarchy, it was necessary to fix the spirit of government, and that of the natural rights of man, in the positive forms of a new constitution.

But in forming a judgment of these reformations, how necessary is it to attend to the general spirit of the time and of the country in which they have been effected? From this double circumstance, as well as from the individual character of their author, and of his principal co-operators, from the design and the local object of these persons, &c. they receive their modifications, their peculiar colouring. Moses, leaving Egypt at the head of a troop of mutinous, superstitious, sensual slaves, whom he had to reduce to submission, to make soldiers capable of every enterprise, and animated against every nation which might occupy the territory on which he purposed to establish them; in such circumstances, Moses directed the reform of his people so as to conduce to the accomplishment of his designs. Mahomet, reforming a free and proud nation, sensual to excess, but capable of exaltation, and of virtue, succeeded in investing himself with a great character, and reduced the exterior form of the pure deism he preached to very simple terms. Both of them blended the religious constitution, which should be suitable to all men, with the political constitution, which can only be calculated for one nation; they confounded the church and the state, and, by that, rendered their religion purely local. With respect to Jesus, in conformity to his celestial origin, he separated the cares of the state from those of the church, whose empire he proclaimed was not of this world. In the midst of the Jewish nation, which had received from Moses, during their forty years' residence in the desert, a legislation suitable to the wants of their first establishment, in Palestine, but which had reached the highest pitch of the necessity for reform, Jesus undertook that of all mankind, inasmuch as he rejected the forms which were only calculated for a local spirit, and called them to the universal spirit of religion, which is the same to all men. Thus the work of his reformation, from the truly divine spirit which is the soul of it, and the simplicity of the forms in which it is clothed, would be adopted by every upright man, whose single heart was unsophisticated by the restraint of local forms. The divine reform effected by Jesus is therefore essentially, and in opposition to the other two, cosmopolite, or catholic, according to the true etymology of that term. Perhaps the form given to it by him was too simple, and when the religious society founded in his name spread over the whole earth, it might be necessary to add to this form. Hence also the power which the legislator might on this point, have transmitted to the future church. But the right of applying a suitable form was not that of vitiating it, of overloading it, of rendering it opposite to the spirit itself, of which it should have only been the organ. The spirit of Christ was no longer perceptible in the constitution of the western Christian church, in the fifteenth century. The subordination of the church to the state, in human and terrestrial matters; the difference of the two, in that relating to the earth and in that relating to heaven, that primitive distinction, had been violently effaced; the extraneous spirit of some fanciful institutions had crept into the incoherent phantom of modern Christianity; all was blended and falsified; a reformation was required, a restoration of the primitive spirit, a simplification of the external form. This reformation was effected in the sixteenth century, in a part of the west; and it was called by the name of Luther, who was the courageous and principal promoter of it.

It may also be observed that the exterior form of religious institutions, being the part which more immediately affects the senses of man, and, consequently, engages his passions, and, on the contrary, that the spirit which animates these institutions, corresponding strictly with his understanding, it results, first, that the more a society is composed of ignorant, sensual men devoted to matter, the more does it require of external practices, of precepts purely ceremonial, in its worship; and the passionate attachment for such a worship, arising from the senses, may be carried to an excess, at which it sets all attempts, even of the most convincing nature, at nought; and, secondly, that the more a society of men is enlightened, the more the intellectual faculties are cultivated in it, preferably to the sensual ones, the more the spirit of its other institutions has remained pure, the less superfluity will it admit in the constitution of its worship, and the more will it be disposed to a reformation in this respect.

The passionate attachment for what is simply the body and form of religion, the attachment which produces a misapprehension of the spirit, and transfers to the accessories, the dogmas, the exterior of a worship, that veneration which belongs only to the divinity, this deviation, so common among ignorant and sensual men, is the origin of superstition. Pernicious, fatal disposition, which, fixing the focus of enthusiasm in the centre of the senses, and the passions, leads to the greatest excesses, and the most horrible cruelties.

The contrary inclination, that by which man, following the impulse of his spiritual nature, is disposed to reject all form and body in religion, to be devoted only to its spirit; this exclusion of an outward and visible worship, is the road which leads to mysticism. It is frequently the portion of thoughtful and solitary men, who, not feeling a necessity to influence other men, think they can dispense with the senses, and keep to the pure spirit of religion. This attachment to the spirit, divested of everything local and accidental, must produce sentiments nearly similar, in all who indulge in it. Hence the singular conformity observed between the opinions of our mystical Christians, Quesnel and Fenelon, and of some Spaniards and Germans, with those of the Bramins of India. Mysticism, the common lot of mild and contemplative minds, may very readily produce an intellectual fanaticism, but it is attended with no danger to society, provided the mysticism is sincere, and not brought into action by hypocrites. Our revolution, during its short existence, had its superstitions, its mystics, and its hypocrites. The dryness of this digression, which must now be brought to a conclusion, can only be excused by the necessity which the author felt to throw every light on the point of view, in which, as it appeared to him, it was requisite to consider the influence of a revolution which began with the domains of religion, and to bring it thus forward as the first lineaments of his work.

SECT. III.

On that of Luther in particular.

Two objects are principally dear to the heart of man, and it is not uncommon to see him sacrifice all his other interests, even life itself, to them. The one is the preservation of his social rights, the other, the independence of his religious opinions; liberty in his civil actions, and liberty in the operations of his conscience. To both of them he affixes a value equal to that of his existence. The idea of recovering them, when lost, carries him to the highest pitch of enthusiasm; that of losing them, throws him, while he possesses them, into a despair, which fits him for any undertaking. Both these dispositions lurked silently in almost every part of Europe, at the beginning of the sixteenth century. One nation, which had lost its civil and religious liberty, began to feel the weight and indignity of its chains; another which still enjoyed a portion of independence, shuddered at seeing it on the point of being taken away. Every state in this part of the world, and more particularly the confederation of states which formed the empire of Germany, had long been tormented with the opposite opinions arising from the obstinate contest between the emperors, successors to the Cæsars, and the Popes, successors to St. Peter, a contest, of which the prize would have been an unlimited monarchy over all the ancient territory of the Roman empire. Both competitors asserted, or claimed equal rights to Rome, and it was clear in their eyes, as well as in those of all Europe, that the master of Rome, would be equally so of the empire, so difficult is it to eradicate vulgar prejudices! This magical name of Rome still charmed for ages after its real glory had vanished, and its power is not wholly extinct even in our days. One of the most unfortunate habits among men is, that of being mechanically persuaded, that what has endured for a long time must endure for ever; that an existence of one day establishes a right for that which follows; that history can only be a periodical repetition of the same events, and that every age must resemble other ages.[*] Rome had long been the capital of the world, and therefore it followed, that it must always remain so. At first no one thought of denying this consequence, or of leaving the mastery of Rome to itself. They fought for a long time to know who should keep possession of the sovereign city, and to which of the two rivals they should submit; they disputed with vehemence for a choice of tyrants.

The pretended right of filiation, which the princes who had succeeded Charlemagne thought they had over Rome and over the empire, is well known. They called themselves Cæsars, because the ancient Cæsars had been emperors in Rome, and Rome was mistress of the better part of Europe; the prince, therefore, who was called Cæsar, ought incontestably to reign over Rome and over Europe, in his quality of emperor. This was long thought an undeniable argument.

The right of the Popes was not quite so clear, but it was not the less revered. Since Rome was the natural mistress of all the universe, and the prince who had resided so long at Rome was the head of the empire, it was evident that the Bishop of Rome must also be the head of the church. By degrees, through the medium of machinations, of measures skilfully commenced and obstinately followed, this primacy of the Roman pontiff was established, though not without difficulties and troubles. When Rome was afterwards without an emperor, the dignity of the pontiff naturally increased; from the second rank which he had till then held, he found himself in the first. And when the Frank and Roman princes adopted the singular ambition of being crowned emperors in the city of the Cæsars, the Popes did the honours of the empire, and, in crowning its new heads, appeared to bestow them. From the time the Pope acquired the privilege of crowning the emperor, infatuated Europe would acknowledge no other but him who had received the crown from the hands of the Pope. Hence the flatteries, the submissions, the concessions of the princes claiming the empire, to obtain the good will of the pontiff. Disposing of the principal crown, he concluded that the others were also in his gift. Sovereign of an innumerable clergy, rich, active, and dispersed through every nation; reigning by this means over all consciences, it was easy for him to establish the opinion that he was charged with the power of God on earth, the vicar of Jesus Christ, the ruler of kings.[†] If a prince attempted to withdraw from this authority, received from heaven, the pontiff anathematized him, expelled him out of the communion of the faithful, and his deluded subjects avoided him like a pestilence. In general he went and solicited the pardon of the irritated vice-god, appeased him by the most abject submissions, and by the acknowledgment of all the rights which the arrogant pontiff demanded: after which, the repentant sovereign was re-established in his charges and his honours; and at each similar attempt, the power of the Popes, sanctioned and increased, became still more strengthened.

God forbid that I should be suspected of the vile design of insulting the clergy, and the head of the Roman church in this work. Now, when ages of humiliation, of despoliation, of persecution itself, have expiated ages of pride, covetousness, and intolerance, it would be barbarous to charge the successors with the crimes of their predecessors. The present members of the priesthood are not those of former days. How grateful would it also be, to be able to believe that the ancient spirits, which, after a period of vain-glory, brought so many days of disgrace on the church, was wholly extinguished in its ministers! Let us, however, hope that the greater number of them participate in the knowledge of their cotemporaries, that the harshness of modern orthodoxy has given place to a spirit, milder and more conformable to the ancient spirit of the gospel. Neither the latter pontiffs, who have manifested virtues truly apostolical in the Holy See, nor a multiplicity of modest and learned priests, are involved in the severe judgments which the vices and misconduct of the pontiffs and priests of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries merit. Who will impute the crimes of Nero to Marcus Aurelius, the enormities of Alexander VI. to Pius VII.? But this observation made, the historian, whose task is to paint events as they happened, must be allowed to explain the causes of the indignation and revolt of nations in a period already far from ours; he must be allowed, I say, to cast off dissimulation, and to think and speak with the cotemporaries of the facts which he details, to expose the disgrace, of those who have merited disgrace, and to justify the fury of the oppressed, by an undisguised recital of the oppression.

The consideration of the essence of the revolution effected by Luther, in Europe, involves three principal points, which satisfactorily determine its nature and subsequent influence. By not attending to all the three, we should probably misconceive the real essence of this great event, and should not discover, in its aggregate, the general action and spirit of mankind in the sixteenth century, a spirit, every power of which was developed on this occasion.

The first of these three points is the political state of the European nations, their internal position, their situation with respect to each other, and with respect to the head of the empire and the head of the church.

The second is the religious state of these nations, their greater or less obedience to the decrees of the pontifical throne, and the disposition of princes in this respect.

The third, which is intimately connected with the two first, and more immediately with the second, is the state of the sciences and of letters in Europe, which, having become barbarous in the fifth century, had been plunged in darkness and chaos during the succeeding period, but which, for about three centuries, had been progressively, though slowly, improving in knowledge.

It is only by a thorough investigation of these three points of view that we can arrive at a satisfactory knowledge of the general spirit and position of the European states in the sixteenth century, and, by it, to an exact acquaintance with all the consequences of the reformation. But how will it be possible, here, to enter into the immense detail, the researches, and the developements which this triple picture would require? The author must confine himself to a slight indication of the principal objects, and to showing what an historian might do.

Sketch of the Political, Religious, and Literary State of Europe at the commencement of the Sixteenth Century.

I. POLITICS.

A MULTITUDE of governments had been formed in Europe, out of the wreck of the Roman western empire, at the head of which were, for the most part, the leaders of the northern tribes which had overturned the empire. Alternately weak and powerful, these states, which were long without consistence, changed their masters and their form, according to the chance of events; they were raised, aggrandized, fell and were extinguished; and through all these vicissitudes, few ideas of a union, or an agreement among the weak to oppose the more powerful, could be perceived; there was not as yet any trace of that grand and fruitful thought of a balance of power. Nevertheless the feudal aristocrasy had gradually lost its strength; the crusades and the other wars which had impoverished the nobility; commerce and industry, which had enriched the trading class; the knowledge which had been disseminated in it, and which had awakened it to a sentiment of the prerogatives of man, and of his natural rights, at length, led to the establishment of a civil existence for the third state, and to its influence on governments. The inhabitants of some of the cities, which were constituted free, even dared to assume the sovereignty in them, which would not fail to produce some effect on opinion, at that time so much enveloped in darkness, and so much the offspring of prejudice.

[*] Past examples, were they even true, prove nothing for futurity. This assertion is more certain, "whatever is possible may happen." FREDERICK II, Histoire de mon tems, Œuvr. posth. Tom ii. p. 70.

[†] This is not only the language of the bulls issued from Rome at this and subsequent periods, but is also that of the most popular and most disseminated writings of that time, which proves that the prejudice was pretty generally established. In the preface to the Miroir de Souabe, a work of the latter part of the thirteenth century, we read, "Since the time that God took upon himself to be Prince of Peace, he sent the two swords which he had in heaven for the protection of Christianity, to the earth, and gave them both to St. Peter, the one for temporal, the other for spiritual justice; that of temporal justice, the Pope entrusts to the Emperor, for the service of the church, and according to the will of the Pope, &c." The remainder is the exact words of Boniface VIII. in his famous bull Unam Sanctam, issued in 1302, and which finishes thus; Porro subesse Romano Pontifici omni humanæ creaturœ declaramus, dicimus, definimus, et pronounciamus omnino esse de necessitate salutis. Such a declaration may be allowed to pass without a commentary.

Italy, divided into a great number of feeble states, some monarchical, others republican, distracted internally by the jealousy and hatred of these petty states to each other, and by the insubordination of the individual barons and lords who aspired to independence, was still the unhappy theatre of the invasions of its powerful neighbours, the French, the Germans, and the Spaniards, who all aimed at obtaining a firm footing in it, some at Naples, others at Milan, Mantua, &c. This beautiful country was a prey to desolations, which succeeded each other without intermission. Its weak sovereigns, now taking part with a powerful conqueror, now jealous of his progress, and conspiring to expel him from their country, in general, only saved themselves by perfidy, fraud, and a crafty policy, which has ever since been one of the most prominent traits in the Italian character. This country, long the richest in Europe. and the centre of all its commerce, was on the point of seeing the source of its opulence dry up, on account of the new outlets which had been opened to commerce on the ocean, by the Spanish and Portuguese vessels.

The Turks had just possessed themselves of the seat of the eastern empire, and carried their victorious arms westward, into Calabria, Hungary, and to the very gates of Vienna.

Poland, freed during the course of the fifteenth century from the convulsions of an anarchial aristocrasy, exhausting all its strength within itself, was almost nothing without. In the northern part of it, the Knights of the Teutonic Order, under pretence of converting the infidels, had formed themselves into a government, which was the first origin of the kingdom of Prussia.

Russia can scarcely be said to have had an existence, to the west of Europe, where it has since acquired so much ascendency.

Sweden and Denmark were also nearly nullities to the states situated to the south of them. The kings of Denmark, after many wars and vicissitudes of fortune, had subjected to their dominion, Sweden, impatient, and constantly disposed to throw off this foreign yoke. A hero, sprung from its bosom, accomplished this undertaking. Gustavus Vasa became the legitimate sovereign of the country he had delivered.

The North of Germany, which might have been called Saxon Germany, since the ancient Saxon race were its governors, was divided into states, most of which were of small extent and not rich. They were united to the south of the empire only by the bond, at that time so loose and so ill-defined, of the Germanic confederation. However, the emperor being incessantly harassed by the Ottomans, had the most powerful motives for keeping on friendly terms with these Saxon princes, who were able to afford him some assistance. This part of the empire had seen a formidable league of commercial cities, united by a common interest, formed in its bosom. The Teutonic Hanse was raised to oppose the pillaging of the feudal plunderers, who, from their castles, or rather from their retreats, infested the roads in their neighbourhood, and despoiled the merchants travelling from fair to fair. The cities of Lombardy, and those on the Rhine, had formed similar confederations, and these associations of free men, whose activity was so beneficial, were of the small number of establishments, really humane, in these early days, which modern nations may be proud of.

Bohemia had more particularly shown the example of a republican spirit to Europe, though it was only applicable to the liberty of conscience. The partisans of the Bohemian martyr, John Huss, had maintained their religious creed by prodigies of valour and perseverance. The Austrian princes had not been able to make them renounce it. An agreement had been entered into between the prince and his subjects, on the article of worship. This example seemed to invite the remainder of the Christian world to free itself in the same manner. It was not because the brave Bohemians made use of the chalice in their communion service that they were commendable and worthy of imitation, but rather because, in this respect, they did that which their consciences directed them, and had by their courage obtained it as a right.

The south of Germany was nearly subjected to the same partition as the north; but the strongest half of this country made part of the states of the colossal house of Austria, which, invested with an almost hereditary claim to the imperial dignity, enriched with all the states of Burgundy under Maximilian, with the crowns of Spain under his successor Charles the Fifth, and with a portion of Italy, no longer disguised its plan of universal monarchy. This power was predominant at the beginning of the sixteenth century, and threatened to swallow up all the others.

Nevertheless, its noble rival, France, which contributed so powerfully to save Europe from this disgrace, France had at length repulsed from her territories the English, who had so long contended for a part of it. The permanent and hired army, which the kings were obliged on this occasion to keep on foot, was of singular utility to them in uniting to the crown the provinces which had their peculiar lords, in despoiling these great and small vassals, and enriching the state at their expense. Louis XI. had nearly completed this increase of the royal power. Charles VIII. and Louis XII. had tried their arms in Italy against the imperialists. Notwithstanding their reverses, they had at least shown them that they might become formidable. After them, Francis I. found himself at the head of a powerful force, without doubt the first in Europe after that of Austria.

Between these two powers, and at the expense of the first, a republic of simple energetic mountaineers were formed, who were the first to teach modern Europe to believe what is related of the courage of the Spartans at Thermopyla, and of their virtues in Laconia. The Swiss had resumed the right, which every man will seize whenever he is able, that of living independent and being masters of themselves. They supported themselves against the jealousy of Austria, by relying on the protection of the Kings of France.

England, which had so long neglected the station to which nature had called it, that of a maritime power; which had so long wasted its most valuable means on the conquest and defence of a few provinces in the west of France, had, at length, had the good fortune, as it may be called, to see its armies driven from the continent, and forced to return to their island. This apparent loss became a real advantage to the nation, which, in the end, directed its activity to the establishment of its liberty and of its fleets. England was not, in the sixteenth century, what it has become since; but it was, at that time, in the rank of the chief powers of Europe, and Henry VIII. a violent and unsteady prince, who commenced by writing against Luther like an angry theologian, and finished by copying him, would have played a much more important part in Europe than he did, if, less occupied with his passions, his amours, and his cruelties, he had made a wise use of his power in foreign countries.

Spain had long consumed its strength, on its own soil, in contending with the Moors, who, for ages, had occupied the best and finest parts of it. At length these conquerors were expelled. Ferdinand of Arragon, who had acquired the glory of accomplishing this deliverance of Spain, married Isabella, and, thus, joined Castile and Arragon. These united states fell to Charles the Fifth, and, under him, Spain was only a province of the vast Austrian monarchy.

At the same time, the political system, and the new species of warfare which was now introduced, became more and more favourable to the great powers. The invention of artillery rendered castles and simple walls useless, and required the erection of fortresses which were too costly for the small princes and states. Their standing armies also gave the great sovereigns a decided advantage over those who were unable to support the expense of them. The princes of the empire had more reason than ever to dread that Charles V. would serve them as Louis XI. had treated the lords of France. But notwithstanding this danger, they weakened themselves still more by dividing their states among their heirs, and by assigning portions of them to all their sons, as though the people and the provinces were their property; this right had not then been called in question.

The Europeans, who, till this time, had been confined within the limits of the old world, had just launched beyond it; the road to India and to America had been discovered. While enterprising navigators were, in this manner, subduing an ocean which had been thought unconquerable, every mind seemed also desirous of being liberated from the narrow circle of ideas within which they had been confined for ages. The human race advanced perceptibly towards the point of maturity of a new epoch. A change in the order of things, an approaching commotion seemed at hand; a rumbling was heard in the bowels of the volcano; ardent vapours burst forth, and streamed through the obscurity. Such was the menacing fermentation which appeared in the political state of nations from the commencement of the sixteenth century,

II. RELIGION.

Religious superstition, which had tormented all these nations in a greater or less degree, began to moderate in some of them; and enlightened men were met with in every country who opposed it with effect. The doctrine of the Vadois and that of the Albigenses, in France, were not forgotten. Wickliffe had raised his voice in England, and had been heard. The Hussites, and their success in Bohemia, have been mentioned above.

Every prince bore the insolence and ambition of the Roman Pontiff with a greater or less degree of impatience. Some of them dared to oppose it openly, and the university of Paris had, more than once, been made the organ of sovereign power to answer the menaces of Rome. They had the courage to appeal to a future council, which they, without ambiguity, deemed superior to the Pope. Other princes, whether from conviction or policy, still bent the knee to Rome, and appeared to make a common cause with the head of the church. Charles V. for example, could not avoid remaining attached to the holy see, whose support in Italy, a country over which he wished to reign, it was his interest to procure. His subjects in Spain, where the Inquisition had been lately introduced, and where the long terror inspired by the Moors had kept the people in the most superstitious catholicism, would instantly have revolted against him had he appeared a less zealous Catholic than themselves.

The countries which possessed a republican constitution, and which maintained in themselves a greater inclination for liberty, were also those least timid towards Rome. It is known with what noble firmness the senate of Venice constantly opposed a bulwark to its usurpations. There are some cantons, essentially republican, of Holland, Holstein, and of all Lower Germany, which have never been really papists, and which the reformation found ready reformed.

Besides, the eyes of men began to open. The impolitic violence of some Popes; the scandalous life of others; the shameless licentiousness of their court, and their capital; the corrupt manners of the clergy; the ignorance and effrontery of several orders of mendicants, the faithful satellites of the holy see; the seventy years captivity at Avignon; the schism of forty other years which followed it, in which two and sometimes three Popes appeared, each having a party, abusing and excommunicating each other, loading each other with the most revolting insults, and reproaching each other with the lowest vices; unexpected disclosures which covered both rivals with ignominy at the same time; the exactions of every description, but particularly the indulgences, a monstrous abuse of the most monstrous of powers; the intolerance and cruelties of the Inquisition; all these will surely account for the hatred and contempt which everywhere lurked secretly against the Romish hierarchy. What then must be the fate of a power built solely on opinion, the moment that opinion is withdrawn from it? To doubt its rights, was to take them away; to probe its foundations, was to sap them; to examine, was to destroy.

The Popes, however, who were perhaps most sensible of the deep wounds inflicted on their kingdom, suffered no outward signs of it to appear, but affected that security which imposes on the mind. They yielded sometimes, and gave way when necessity compelled them; but they changed their tone as little as possible, always hoping that a better time would come, a time of bigotry and obscurity, in which they could display, in all its magnificence, their obstinate system of Lamaism. The irritable Paul III. as daring as Hildebrand, cited the king of England to appear before him, and, on the refusal of the no less irritable Henry VIII. he declared him deposed from his crown,* him and his descendants to perpetuity. Pius IV. treated the Queen of Naples in the same manner; Pius V. pronounced the same sentence on the proud Elizabeth, of England; and on each of these occasions, the vicar of J. C. displayed, with assurance, his incontestible rights over all crowns and over the whole globe. He disposed of America as it was discovered, and even before it was discovered;* and he had his legion of writers, of theologians and civilians who demonstrated with intrepidity, all the sanctity and the proofs of these rights. The grateful church has placed the names of several of them in the calendar.†

This gloomy system, which brought civil society under the iron dominion of an exclusive church, without the pale of which there was no salvation,‡ must have gradually alienated the most sensible men from it. Complaints and murmurs arose on every hand; thousands of voices united in demanding a reformation of the church, in its head and its members, its faith and its manners; these were the consecrated terms. Three councils in succession, at Pisa, Constance, and Basle, had unveiled the wounds of this decayed body, and had probed their depth. The falling off and discontent had become more than ever perceptible at the beginning of the sixteenth century, and it was in this state of things that the young and voluptuous Medicis ascended the pontifical throne. An admirer of the fine arts, from which he sought only fame and gratification, a crafty but presuming politician, prepossessed with contempt for the German rudeness of manners, under which he was unable to discover that strength and manliness of character, all the energy of which he had to encounter, Leo X. was not qualified to enter the lists with Luther; and the arrogant weakness of the one, opened numberless advantages to the intrepid firmness of the other.

III. KNOWLEDGE.

THE ignorance which the barbarians of the north had brought with them, seconded by the wars and continual devastations, which, subsequent to their appearance desolated Europe, had nearly effaced every trace of improvement. The small portion of instruction which was languidly propagated during several centuries of the middle age, was only found among the ecclesiastics, and principally in cloisters. It was in these sanctuaries, which were frequently respected by the ferocious combatants, who respected nothing else, that a few manuscript books were copied and preserved, the annals at Magn.) This may truly be called pontifical rage! He is not contented with pursuing and declaring them infamous to the fourth generation, he stretches to eternity, and strikes the last descendants of the great grandchildren.

(Bullar. Magn. T. I. p. 454.) Singular public right of Europe at that time, which was founded on such instruments! It may be observed that the apostolic chancery, which in other respects does not plume itself on its great accuracy in geography, does not acknowledge any legitimate sovereigns on the earth but Christian princes. All the others may be dispossessed, without even the necessity of giving them notice of it.

[‡] The quality of Roman Catholic had wholly superseded that of man, and even of Christian. He who was not a Roman Catholic, was not a man, he was less than a man; and, were he a sovereign, it was a good action to deprive him of life. This was the ordinary language of the casuists of Rome, on this subject: I quote, at random, the words of one of them; "Ostendimus jam satis aperte justum esse, ut hœreticus occidatur; quo autem genere mortis sit occidendus, parem ad rem facit. Nam quocunque modo occidatur, semper consulitur ecclesiœ." Alphonsus a Castro. (De justa Hæreticorum Pœna, Lib. II. cap. 12.) This Castro wrote at a time when the commencement of the reformation might have taught gentlemen of his profession to have been a little more circumspect. Volumes might be filled with similar passages, and the perusal of them brings to mind the horrible joy expressed by Gregory XIII. at the news of the massacre of St. Bartholomew.

the time were written, a mixture of theology, most frequently extravagant, but sometimes astonishing by its subtlety and its happy elucidations, of logic, and of metaphysics, almost wholly disfigured and misunderstood, was taught. It will be obvious that scholastic divinity, which has had so many periods and such various fates, is alluded to; a desert uninhabitable by common sense, but here and there presenting fertile spots, on which the hand of beneficent nature may be recognized, and the mind dwells with enchantment.

If churchmen preserved the slight tradition of knowledge in this manner, it must also be confessed that, in their hands, it sometimes became dangerous, and was converted to pernicious uses by its depositaries. The domination of Rome, erected upon a scaffolding of false historical proofs, required the aid of these faithful auxiliaries, who, on the one side, were to employ their half-knowledge in fascinating every eye, and, on the other, to prevent these eyes from discovering the true light, or being illuminated by the torch of criticism. The local usurpations of the clergy, being, in many places, founded on similar titles, stood in need of similar means of support. It therefore followed, that the small portion of knowledge which was permitted, must have been mingled with errors, and that nations must have been kept in profound ignorance, the foster-parent of superstition. Study was rendered as inaccessible as possible to the laity: that of the ancient languages was treated as a monstrosity and an idolatry. The reading of the holy writings, that sacred patrimony of all Christians, was particularly and severely interdicted: to read the Bible, without permission of the superiors, was a crime; to translate it into the vulgar tongue was a temerity deserving of extreme punishment. The popes had very good reasons for preventing the words of Jesus Christ from reaching the people, and for interrupting the direct communication between the gospel and the Christian. When objects of such importance as public belief and public worship are kept in mystery by compulsion, the darkness must be universal and impenetrable. The numerous legions of mendicant monks not being sufficient for this purpose, the horrible inquisition was devised, to extinguish every spark of knowledge which might appear through the gloom of night, in blood and in tears.

But the efforts of man cannot prevail eternally against the course of nature. The dawn must infallibly appear; the day must follow, and, with its rays, illuminate the phantom of darkness, which had become, at once, the ridicule and the admiration of mankind. The university of Paris already had offsets and rivals worthy of it, in Germany and in England. That of Wirtemberg where Luther and Melancthon first came into notice as professors, had been lately founded. Princes, carried away by the general spirit, by an emulation of glory, by the ravishing splendour of so many new lights, promoted this regeneration by such establishments. It became impossible to impose silence on so many schools, which sought celebrity by striving to excel each other. The ancient languages, history, criticism, were publicly taught in them, notwithstanding the clamours of the partizans of ignorance. In them science was liberated from its leading-strings, and broke, by degrees, its antiquated paction with error. A commerce with distant countries, the knowledge of a new world, had disposed men to receive new ideas. The art of printing, an incalculable advantage to the human race, and the highest which the mind ever received from industry, lately invented in Germany, on the banks of the Rhine, multiplied knowledge to infinity, and took away all means of hiding it, from thenceforward, under a bushel. At the other extremity of Germany, on the banks of the Vistula, Copernicus had been examining the heavenly bodies, and unveiling their true courses, which the pontifical bulls have not been since capable of altering. On investigating the history of the early years of the sixteenth century, it is impossible to avoid considering this period as one of the most decisive for the improvement and amelioration of our species.

During this first conflict between light and darkness, both parties became more inflexible, more fixed in their opinions, and prepared for the encounter. At the head of the party friendly to knowledge, the public opinion had placed the spirited Erasmus of Rotterdam. His keen satires against the dissoluteness of the clergy, and against monastic stupidity, had produced a lively sensation. He contributed powerfully to the birth of a taste for erudition and criticism. Reuchlin, a philologist and very learned writer, who had taught in almost every part of Europe, was, at that period, settled in his native country, Germany, and excited an enthusiastic eagerness for the study of languages, particularly Greek and Hebrew, for reading the sacred works in the original, and for the illustration of the Bible. The theologian-inquisitors of Cologne, and among others the fiery Dominican, Hochstraten, who had solicited and obtained an imperial edict, commanding the burning and exterminating of every Hebrew book, entered into a dispute with Reuchlin, and endeavoured to demonstrate that the study of Greek, as well as of Hebrew, was pernicious to the faith.* Perhaps, according to their mode of judging, they were right, and every species of study was dangerous to the inquisition, and to the power which employed such auxiliaries. However that may be, this dispute made a prodigious noise, and terminated by covering the abettors of ignorance with shame. The Hebraists triumphed. Ulrich de Hutten, a young gentleman of Franconia, warm and of great talents, a warrior, poet, scholar, and also theologian, on this occasion wrote the celebrated Letters from obscure Men (Epistolæ virorum obscurorum), a satire replete with spirit and point, which brought indelible disgrace on the opposite party. Reuchlin, and some others, were suspected of having contributed to them.

Such were nearly the principal features in the picture of Europe, in respect of politics, religion, and intellectual improvement, at the time of the reformation.

The Reformation.

CATHOLICISM was not a religion which had been given, completely formed, and at once, to a new people, where it might have acquired a uniform aspect. Christianity introduced at different times, into nations which differed greatly, had received a local modification from each, arising from the peculiar disposition of the nation. Thus the Roman language, introduced into the several countries of the empire, here met with the language of the Goths and Lombards; there, with that of the Celtæ and Teutonic: in other places, with the Gallic, Saxon, or Cantabrian; and thus gradually became Italian, French, English, or Spanish. Christianity itself, during its successive transmutation into Roman catholicism, changed in its essence by the innovations of the court of Rome, and of the monks and theologians, did not everywhere undergo uniform variations. With a fundamental similitude in the principal dogmas, it acquired a different physiognomy in different places. Thus, even in our own times, the catholicism of Madrid does not entirely agree with that of Paris; nor is that of Rome similar to that of Vienna. In some places it had acquired a greater tendency to superstition, a form more overloaded, more material, more calculated to stifle the spirit; in others, on the contrary, it was less clogged with material bonds, and had preserved more of a disposition to mysticism; the spirit had remained more free, and more perceptible. These varieties on the character of the religion proceeded from those in the characters of the nations; some were more sensual, more dissipated, more exterior, if the term may be admitted; others, on the contrary, more reflecting, more serious, more retired. Italy on the one hand, and Saxony, on the other, will furnish us with an instance of this diversity; and it is natural to select these two countries, since one was the seat of Catholicism, and the other became that of the reformation.

Italy had long been the residence of the chiefs of the Roman empire. The luxury and the corruption of the Asiatics had penetrated into the city of the Cæsars, and into the rest of the country. The riches of the whole world abounded and circulated there. The effeminacy of the latter time of the empire fixed the Italian character. Subdued afterwards by a number of conquerors, who succeeded each other without intermission, this fine country was, for ten centuries, the theatre of continual wars between foreigners, who came there to contend for it. The Italian, never master of his own territory, always oppressed and subjugated, naturally became deceitful, cunning, dissimulating, selfish. Commerce constantly enriched him; but he hastened to consume, in enjoyment, the wealth which he foresaw might soon be snatched from him by violence. A taste for luxury, pomp, and voluptuousness, with that of the fine arts, became his consolation. The magnificence of the ancient ruins which surrounded him, influenced that which he gave to all his works, to all his religious edifices. Worship became the business of the senses, and religion a mythology; splendid ceremonies superseded simple prayers; saints and images became the intercessors with an almost forgotten God, and the immediate objects of devotion. No doubt the populace, and uninformed men, would adhere very strongly to this system of superstition, which captivated their senses, and lulled all their vices; but what wonder if he, who began to think and examine, should at once and entirely reject this system, where he could discover only the work of man, and that he should remain without a spark of religion? It was a necessary consequence that the Italian must be a papist or an atheist; he must either adore our Lady of Loretto, or not adore at all; hence there never was so many atheists as in the country and neighbourhood of the sovereign pontiffs.[*] The most violent bigotry, or the incredulous libertinism of Aretin, is the inevitable lot of those who no longer give credit to all their religion, or no longer discern its spirit. An old proverb says: "When the water of the bath is thrown out of the window, the child is thrown with it." A religious reformation was impossible in this country. Those who were good Catholics would not have permitted the removal of a single relic; those who were not, were nothing; they acquiesced in the external forms, but had neither moral nor religious interest in them, nor had they any desire for an amelioration, which they neither thought of or believed in.[†]

* Even the faculty of theology of Paris, about this time maintained before the Parliament, "that religion was undone, if the study of Greek and Hebrew was permitted." The mendicant monks held a very different language; on this subject one of the private soldiers of the army of Hochstraten gives the following explanation. It is Conrad de Heresbach, a very serious and very respectable writer of this period, who employs the true terms of a monk; "a new language has been invented, which is called Greek; guard carefully against it, it is the mother of every species of heresy. I observe in the hands of a great many people, a book written in this language, which they call the New Testament; it is a book full of thorns and serpents. With respect to Hebrew, it is certain, my dear brethren, that all who learn it are instantly converted to Judaism." Here is a specimen of the spirit of papacy during this century. Would it have been right or proper to have suffered it to proceed thus unobstructed?

What a different appearance was offered by Saxony! Its people had never been softened either by luxury and opulence, or by too mild a climate. There resided an indigenous nation, energetic, open, who, from the ninth century to our era, had never been subjugated. On the banks of the Elbe they stopped the flight of the Roman eagle, which was unable to penetrate into their provinces. In later times this nation had given conquerors to Europe; the Angles, the Normans, the Burgundians, the Franks, swarms broke off from Saxony, had subdued Great Britain, Gaul, and other provinces of the west. Those who continued on their own territory, attached to their ancient and simple national worship, had allowed the remainder of Europe to embrace Christianity, without being tempted to imitate it, and to quit a creed, with which was interwoven the memory of the illustrious actions of their forefathers. When, after a desperate resistance of three and thirty years, Charlemagne succeeded in compelling them to receive Christianity, they adopted it with sincerity and simplicity; but it may be supposed that it never would become to them what it had become to the Italians. Here it attracted the eye less, and affected the heart more; there it was more of worship; here it was more of religion. Serious men, of manners generally pure, naturally practised a purer and more spiritual Christianity. They always bore the yoke with which the court of Rome had burthened them with secret impatience, and they threw it off on the first opportunity which offered; but, in rejecting this parasitical covering, which was grafted on the gospel, the gospel itself remained to them; they had not stifled its spirit; papism was not the total of religion to them; it was still of importance to them to have a religion; an interest in religious concern was alive and active in them; they were capable of a reformation.

The intellectual improvements of the two people differed in the same proportion. The fine arts, everything conducive to the enjoyments of taste, everything flattering to the sensibility, physical or moral, had become the objects of Italian activity. The calm, equal, persevering activity of the Saxons, was directed to the abstract sciences, to philosophy, to historical researches. When the reformation burst forth, there was not a single theologian of Italy capable of encountering those of Saxony; some of them had the presumption to attempt it, a presumption always the associate of ignorance; they were defeated, and covered with confusion. In revenge, Italy boasted loudly of her poets and her painters; she had not produced a Luther, but Saxony had not produced an Ariosto.

To the peculiar dispositions which have been indicated, Saxony also joined the indignation and discontent, which was common to it with the rest of Europe. To support the expenses of a luxurious court, Leo X. had lately imposed upon Christianity the heavy burthen of a new indulgence. The pretext was the edification of the superb basilick of St. Peter; but a proof that this motive was not, at least, the only one is, that Leo had lately made a present to a greatly beloved sister of the sums which were to arise from the levy on Lower Saxony, as far as the Baltic Sea. This circumstance was known to every body; and the Dominican Tetzel had the audacity to come into the neighbourhood of Wittemberg to open his traffic in indulgences, to advertise his venal mission, and to trust to sermons, so extravagant and so gross, as scarcely to be credited at the present day.

Martin Luther, a doctor, priest, and Augustine monk, was, at that time, professor of philosophy and theology in the new university of Wittemberg, where an excellent and rigid spirit of assiduity, of love of the sciences, of true religion, and of liberty of thought prevailed. Luther's parents were poor; his talents alone had raised him to the situation he filled. He was among the first who applied with ardour to the study of the new knowledge, which was cultivated by the most eminent geniuses of this century. The first rays of the rising sun had no sooner struck the high places, and most elevated summits, than Luther discovered, before the multitude, the new day which began to break. He devoted all his intellectual powers to the success of reviving letters, watched their progress, and rejoiced at the victory obtained by the partisans of the ancient languages over the inquisitors of Cologne; he had also acquired celebrity by some good productions of this description. Supported by an indefatigable zeal, by a wonderful memory, he had acquired the most perfect acquaintance with the holy writings, the fathers, and other ecclesiastical antiquities. One of his principal objects was to overturn the scholastic divinity, by banishing Aristotle from the domains of theology, and by demonstrating from this singular compound of the logic of pagan philosophy with the doctrine of Christianity, how much the first had been misunderstood and both had been corrupted. In every encounter he overwhelmed the scholastics with his arguments and his wit, and covered their science with confusion and ridicule. His individual character, which has had such influence on that of the reformation, was energy and uprightness. Ardent and calm, high spirited and humble at the same time; irritable and warm in his language, when provoked by injurious treatment; mild, and inimical to every species of violence in action; jovial, open, of ready wit, and even a pleasant companion at the table of the great; studious, sober, and a stoic in himself; courageous and disinterested, he exposed himself with tranquillity to every risk, in support of what he believed to be the truth. Commanded to appear before the diet of Worms, he presented himself there, notwithstanding the terrible and very recent example of John Huss, with dignity, simplicity, and firmness. Far from setting Rome at defiance in the outset, he wrote submissively to the Pope, and exhibited no other appearance of superiority but that of his immense knowledge over Cajetan and the other theologians, deputed by Rome to convert him. Harassed afterwards with insults and outrages, he replied to them with animation; excommunicated by the Pope, he publicly threw the bull of anathema into the fire. Luther knew all the intrinsic weakness and abuses of the pontifical court. He had been sent to Rome on the business of his order, some years before, and there everything which struck his eye filled his heart with indignation. It is very probable that from that time, he secretly conceived, if not the design, at least the wish, for the deliverance of his country; and, like his ancient countryman Arminius, who had served in the Roman legions in Italy, before he repelled the same legions from Germany, it was in Rome that he learned to despise that Rome, which, at a distance, appeared so formidable. From such characteristics we cannot misconstrue one of those superior beings, who, though participating in some of the defects of their age, are made to govern it, and carry it with them on the road to perfection. I may also add that, after having refused the offers of the court of Rome; after having been so many years the founder and almost patriarch of a new church; after having been the friend, the adviser, the spiritual father of so many princes, who, through the reformation, had been enriched with all the possessions of the clergy, of which he might have obtained a rich share, Luther lived and died in a state bordering on poverty, and left to his wife and children only the esteem due to his name.

[*] We may add to these the reasons given by Machiavel, an eye-witness, for the Italian impiety and corruption; and it will not be denied that he had sufficient penetration to see very clearly from what the evil arose. He expresses himself thus: "The greatest prognostic of the approaching ruin of Christianity is, to see that the nearer people are to Rome, which is the capital of Christianity, the less devotion they have. The scandalous examples, and the crimes of the court of Rome, have occasioned Italy to lose entirely every principle of piety, and every sentiment of religion. The rest of us Italians have therefore this first obligation to the church and the priests, for having become impious and profligate." Disc. sur la prem. Decade de Tite-Live, lib. i. chap. 12.

[†] The Italians proved clearly by the event, that they were wholly incapacitated for a reformation. Some years before Luther, the ardent Savonarole preached nearly in the same manner at Florence, as the Saxon reformer preached afterwards, against the indulgences, the misconduct of the papal court, &c. The infamous Alexander VI. reigned at that period: far from declaring for Savonarole, as the people of Wittemberg declared for Luther, those of Florence fell upon the unfortunate, but too honest man for his time and his country, dragged him to the pile which was kindled by the executioners of the inquisition, and saw him burnt, uttering exclamations of joy, and crying, Long live Pope Borgia!

Such a man must have been filled with indignation at the approach of the shameless Tetzel. In the sermons, which he usually preached, Luther exposed the abuse of a traffic in indulgences, and the danger of believing that heaven, and the remission of all crimes, could be bought with money, while a sincere repentance, and an amended life were the only means of appeasing the Divine Justice. The Dominican answered these sermons with fury; Luther replied; advanced another step; called in question the authority of the Pope, and gave the signal of revolt. Thus began the reformation.* It found a multitude of minds prepared to receive it, and also some enlightened and eloquent men disposed to become its apostles. The learned and moderate Melancthon, and the hasty Carlstadt, both at Wittemberg; in Switzerland, Zwingle; in France, Calvin soon appeared, and communicated their particular opinions to the work of reform. The great majority of the German nation, (which must not be confounded with the preponderance of certain governments, such as Austria, &c.;) that of the Swiss nation; a very great number of individuals in France, Poland, and Hungary; Denmark, Sweden and England separated in a few years from the Roman church, and refused all obedience as well as tribute to its head.

However, notwithstanding the general dispositions already mentioned; notwithstanding the universally acknowledged want of a reform in the church; notwithstanding the eloquence and the strength of Luther, this memorable revolution would, doubtless, never have been consolidated, it never would have acquired a political consistence, if another interest besides that of religion and truth had not lent it support, and made it an interest of state. The princes of the north of the empire, to whom resistance to ambitious Austria was next to impossible with their ordinary means, saw, in the new enthusiasm of their people, an unhoped-for opportunity of obtaining extraordinary succours, and of opposing the whole mass to the imperial arms. An intimate union between each prince and his people, as well as an alliance between the whole of these provinces, and these people, which before would have been a chimerical enterprise, became a necessary consequence of the common interest which spoke to all hearts. Besides the temptation of the treasures of the clergy, which each prince added to his own revenue, the allurement of independence, the gratification of an inveterate hatred against the court of Rome, all contributed to force the acquiescence of the chiefs, and to hurry them down the same torrent with their people. Whatever might have been their motives, it cannot be denied that the league of Smalcald was the first effective union of free princes and states against their oppressors, in modern Europe; that it laid the foundation of a better conduct, and of liberty of conscience. Some of the reasons which were capable of diverting Charles V. from embracing the reformation have been already mentioned. It was enough for him to see it adopted by those princes of whom he was the natural adversary. Francis I. might have declared for it and introduced it into France. His conduct was guided, partly by his own religious opinions, partly by his politics and his projects on Italy. But finding a formidable party arising in the empire against his Austrian rival, he seconded it efficaciously, and with all his power.

This is not the place to enter into the detail of the events which have accompanied, followed, and consolidated this memorable revolution. Besides, the Institute has demanded its results and not its progress. It will therefore be sufficient to observe, that this important affair almost wholly occupied all the powers of Europe, from the year 1520 to the middle of the following century. Amidst various successes, triumphs, and defeats, alliances and desertions, the Protestant states succeeded in giving a constitutional existence to their confession, and in dividing the empire with Catholicism. While Luther lived, he supported the character of a minister of peace, and employed all his influence to maintain it. The civil war of the peasants of Suabia and Franconia troubled the early days of the reformation. Sects of fanatics were formed in different places, but principally in the circle of Burgundy, and in Westphalia. The short reign of the Anabaptists of Munster, and of their king, John of Leyden, offered a spectacle of horrid disorders. The Protestants witnessed the excesses of these false brethren with sorrow. Luther and Malancthon wrote against them, and demonstrated that these enormities were, at the same time, contrary to Christianity and to the true spirit of the reformation. After an almost uninterrupted peace under the four emperors who succeeded Charles V. during all the remainder of the sixteenth, aad first years of the seventeenth century, the war which kindled fiercely under Ferdinand II. on the subject of the religious capitulations of Bohemia, was soon converted into a furious struggle between the two parties. The object was no less than the utter extirpation of Protestantism, the annihilation of the Germanic constitution and liberty, and the absolute dominion of Austria over the empire, which would have given the means of extending it still further. This horrible conflagration, which for thirty successive years, ravaged Europe, from the confines of Poland, to the mouth of the Scheldt, and from the banks of the Po to the Baltic, depopulated whole provinces, annihilated agriculture, commerce, and industry in them, cost the lives of many millions of men, and retarded the study of the sciences in Germany, which, at first had made such rapid progress, for nearly a century. This fatal war had lasted twelve years, and notwithstanding the prodigies of constancy and valour of the confederate princes, they were on the point of sinking before their powerful adversaries, when a hero, the successor of Vasa, the immortal Gustavus Adolphus, left his kingdom, at the head of an invincible army, and, at the expense of his own life, which he lost victorious at Lutzen, saved the liberty of Germany, perhaps of all Europe, and the creed which he possessed in common with the princes of the Evangelical body, which was the name given to those who had separated from Rome. Denmark, which had previously been willing to engage in this quarrel, was soon constrained to abandon it. The assistance of Sweden was more effectual. It is doubtful whether the military annals of any nation offer a period more worthy of admiration than the eighteen campaigns of the Swedish army in Germany. France also joined her victorious arms to those of Sweden, in support of the Protestant party; it was in the course of this war that the names of Guèbriant, of Puysègur, of Turenne, and Condè, were rendered illustrious, and it was through it that the monarchs of France began to acquire a marked preponderance in the affairs of the empire.

France itself, however, had not been wholly free from the internal troubles and commotions which revolutions of such magnitude bring with them. After an obstinate civil war between the reformed party and the Catholic party, the reigning dynasty was renewed in the person of a reformed prince, who became, however, a Catholic on ascending the throne.

Spain, after the abdication of Charles V. had its own kings, to whom the Low Countries were obedient. But the spirit of the reformation had introduced its ally, the spirit of liberty, among them. The United Provinces threw off the yoke of Philip II. with courage; and founded in their morasses, a confederation, very nearly resembling that which had been formed on the mountains of Helvetia. The Hollanders became what a free people near the sea will become, what nature had interdicted to the Swiss; they became rich and powerful, and took rank among the principal states of Europe.

* The acrimony with which the fury of parties throws calumny upon men of eminence is well known. Luther experienced this more than any other. For example, it was attempted to attribute the cause of his zeal to the discontent of the Augustins, who, as it was said, were envious, because the Dominicans were entrusted by the Pope with the preaching of indulgences. There is nothing surprising in this fable, the invention of Cochlæus, being given by Maimbourg; but it is inconceivable how Voltaire and Hume should have repeated it as a certain fact. This commission had long become so odious, and so disreputable, that no man, and Luther least of all, could have envied the Dominicans, who, besides, were almost exclusively in possession of these indulgences, as well as of the inquisition. Doctor Maclaine has added a note to his English translation of Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History, vol. iv. chap. 2, in which be shows beyond dispute, the folly of this imputation. It may not be useless to insert it here, where it has been thought necessary to open the true sources of the reformation, that a more correct judgment may be formed of its nature and its influence. To remove every doubt on Maclaine's authority, as well as on the falsity of the allegation, and to give an example of a good historical criticism, this note shall be inserted at length at the end of this volume.

England, amidst troubles, also occasioned by religious innovations, resumed its true destination, that of maritime power.

At length the reformation produced the two most celebrated assemblies which the history of modern times affords. The one on the affairs of religion, the Council of Trent, in which so much intrigue, eloquence and knowledge were displayed, and of which, the decrees, more or less modified, have become the principal basis of the canon law to the states of the Roman communion. The other, political, the Congress of Munster and Osnaburgh, which put an end to the dreadful thirty years war by the treaty of Westphalia, the master-piece of human prudence and sagacity, which, for the first time, brought the European nations into a connected system of political bodies. It was during the continuance of this long congress that the art of negotiation was brought to perfection, that the necessity for a balance of powers, of a weight and a counterpoise, by which the strong might be restrained, and the weak protected and upheld, was recognized.

After this too rapid view of the principal events which immediately followed the reformation, we may hazard a few conjectures on what, most probably, would have happened in Europe, if this had not supervened. In fact a little more prudence and reserve on the part of the court of Rome, or a little less inflexibility in our reformer, or more indifference on the part of the princes, and, perhaps, this great explosion might have been strangled in its birth. It required a Luther to effect it, but a multitude of favourable circumstances were also required, that his efforts might not be vain. How many voices had been raised before, without being heard, without reaching the ears of those they were intended to move!

SECT. IV.

Conjectures on what might have happened in Europe, if the Reformation had not taken place. Would the Spirit of the Hierarchy have changed?

If, in the sixteenth century, and during those which followed it, the torrent of events had pursued the same course as it had previously taken, nothing could have saved Europe from an approaching subjugation, from the yoke of an universal monarchy. This danger, although imminent, was not, however, very perceptible to the multitude. The people had not made common cause with the princes, against it; the princes had not made common cause with each other: intrigue and interest had too easily divided them. But by what means could the men, who in those days had almost forgotten they were men, be moved and directed to one common object? the clergy possessed riches which they sought to retain; the third estate, still little better than bondmen, had their traders and merchants, who sought to enrich themselves. Between these two classes there was another, jealous of both, robbing them sword in hand, whenever it had the power, and against which, these two were obliged to be guarded. Besides, the gentleman was proud of being unable to read, and the clerk was but little better instructed. How distant were they from any notion of a police, or a regular society, from the rights common to all men, and from equality with each other! How much more distant were these ideas from the minds of the peasantry! These were so ignorant and so occupied with popes and clergy, with emperors and nobility, with saints, miracles, and feudal duties, that sound reason, or a consideration of their rights, could find no access to them. Excessive oppression produced, here and there, and at different times, occasional revolts, which, for want of concert, were of no advantage. Each time some thousands were massacred, and the chains of those who escaped the butchery were riveted faster. In general, they were ignorant that it was possible to exist in any other way than in performing the corvee[*] for their lords, and being plundered by the soldiery. Nothing but religion remained, in which there was a common and an active interest of all the classes.

The popes and the emperors, in the long and obstinate struggle for their claims, had, happily, counterbalanced each other during the first centuries, and the efforts of one party had frequently neutralized those of the contrary party. If the Pope was not as powerful, the House of Austria met with more obstacles to the subjugation of Europe; while at the same time, but for the resistance of the Emperor, the Pope would have succeeded, with great facility, in constituting himself, without a power of altering it, the great Lama of the West. Thus one evil was long a remedy for the other; but this struggle could not continue for ever, and one of the two must, in the end, prevail. One Pope had already conceived the idea of placing the imperial crown on his own head, and an Emperor that of placing the tiara on his. At the accession of Charles V., the power lodged in his hands was so preponderant, that he might easily have triumphed over all his adversaries, and carried the favourite project of his predecessors, of bringing the whole western Roman empire under his dominion, into execution. If, by their unity, and by that alone, weak states have been seen resisting powerful coalitions, what might not have been achieved by so formidable a force, vested in one hand, and with such a leader as Charles V. against Europe divided, and without concert. The policy of this Emperor is so well known that there can be no doubt but he would, in furtherance of this great design, have compromised with the head of the church, and, the more effectually to subdue the other nations, by his means, would have allowed him the second place in the empire, with an unlimited power over consciences. The holy inquisition was become the tool of both despots, and had, for some centuries, maintained superstition, political slavery, and slavery of thought, over the whole of Europe. The reformation alone would check this torrent; it, at once, extinguished the ambition of the two projectors, who had aimed at giving chains to Europe. Arrogant Austria is for ever sunk and repressed. The Roman pontiff has lost a part of his dominion, and has retained only a precarious power in what is left. Finally, powerful governments have arisen; rivals in everything which can contribute to the glory or welfare of nations, they, for the most part, second the action of the new spirit which animates the people, and strive to efface, by degrees, all traces of the barbarism of the middle age.

It is said by some that "the successive progress of knowledge would insensibly have led to the same results, and have avoided all the evils which arose from so terrible a commotion, and such long wars." But they must not have considered that in the system of an infallible church, all the decisions of which are dictated by the Holy Spirit, a reformation, such as was necessary, becomes impossible, and that it is even contradictory to the spirit of Roman Catholicism. It is also doubtful whether the wished-for change would have happened so soon, or have been so complete. It is certain that, at the time of the reformation, the heads of the Catholic religion, who, at first, saw only fame and gratification, or a disposition to elegance of manners, in the renovation of letters, and, with these views, had encouraged them, began to perceive their danger, from too great a portion of knowledge being infused into men's minds; and, that a very striking reaction was manifested on their part. This reaction was not soon checked in the states belonging to the house of Austria in Germany, in Spain, in Italy, and in Belgium, where all the means of the inquisition, and of censure, were put in action to shackle the flight of thought, and to repel the progress of knowledge. Let the political, religious, and literary state of the greater part of these countries, during the following centuries, be compared with the state of Protestant Germany, Holland, and England, in the same points of view, and let a judgment be formed, free from prejudice, of what would have been the consequence, if the same conduct had become universal and despotic in Europe.[*]

[*] A day's work due from the vassal to his lord, to be done in person, or by his team or plough. T.

[*] Let the same comparison be made at the present time; in all those countries which were long under the Austrian lash, we shall find bigotry and superstition, instead of religion and morality; ignorance and prejudice, instead of sound and solid instruction; gross sensuality, instead of all the noble qualities which distinguish a man, when he has received a more elevated and more liberal education. Whoever has observed Austria, Spain, and Belgium narrowly, will feel the truth of this remark. There is no doubt but the universal spirit of our time has penetrated here and there, and given rise to some exceptions. Lombardy in particular, situated between France, Germany,

As to what might have been expected, in the end, from the popes and the clergy, if they had been allowed to act spontaneously, in all their power and credit, a judgment may be formed from the moral and physical state of most of the domains, subject, immediately, to ecclesiastial princes.[*] It must be acknowledged that the spirit of papism is exclusive and intolerant; now the spirit of an institution cannot cease to act, unless the institution cease also. A very decisive observation is that the virtuous and humane Innocent XI. during a pontificate of twelve years, was scarcely able to execute any of his meritorious designs. The popes, more prudent since the reformation, weakened, almost nonentities, have yielded, unwillingly, in different contests; but it was the power, not the will that was wanting. Many attempts have been made to unite the reformed church with that of Rome; the latter has rendered all these endeavours abortive by refusing to relax in any of her claims. Towards the close of the seventeenth century, the Emperor Leopold I. took much pains on this subject, and plenipotentiaries were named on both sides. The negotiations also extended into France, between Leibnitz on the part of the Protestants, and Pelisson and Bossuet for the Catholics. The latter displayed all his eloquence. but, at the same time, all the inflexibility of his own mind, and that of his church: according to him, there could not be any question of accommodation, but only of submission. When we reflect on the haughty and violent language then held by so enlightened a man as Bossuet was, it is not possible to prevent a belief, that if, perchance the Romish clergy should regain their power and wealth, they would become as fanatic and persecuting as heretofore.[†] The intrigues of the Catholic party to bring back the princes of the reformed party to the Roman communion, would be deserving of being known; such, for example, as those they put in practice with the Elector of Saxony, and with Queen Christiana, of Sweden. The evil disposition towards those sovereigns who remain separated from Rome is very visible; and, to this day,[‡] the Holy See has not formally acknowledged the King of Prussia. Long after the reformation, Clement VIII. prepared the form of an oath to be taken by the bishops and archbishops, in which are laid down all the principles of despotism and intolerance of Rome.[*] Without pre-

Venice and Genoa, and which submitted with reluctance to the Austrian yoke, could not be entirely brutalized. A remarkable testimony, which exposes the barbarism still existing at the close of the eighteenth century, in Catholic Germany, is the narrative of his adventures, lately published by M. Schad, Professor of Philosophy, of the university, of Jena, who was formerly a Benedictine in the convent of Banz, from whence, happily for himself, and for that philosophy which he cultivates with success, he escaped. Nevertheless, these monks of Bantz passed for the luminaries of Catholic Germany. The excess of their superstition would scarcely obtain credit, were it not related by an eye-witness, who was long the victim of it.

[*] It is grateful to me to be able to instance a striking exception. All Europe will join me in naming the illustrious Elector Archchancellor of Dalberg, whom history will record among the best of princes; who is proudly claimed by the sciences; and who fills a station in the literary world, analogous to that which his high dignity secures him in the political.

[†] Every year in the service of Holy Thursday, the Pope still excommunicates and curses all the heretics, and particularly the Lutherans, in these terms: "Nosigitur, vetustum et solemnem hunc morem sequentes, excommunicamus et anathematisamus ex parte Dei omnipotentis, Patres et Filii et Spiritus Sancti, ac nostrâ, omnes hereticos, nec non damnatum, impiam et abominabilem Martini Lutheri hærasin sequentes, ac omnes fautores et receptatores, librosque ipsius Martini aut quorumvis aliorum legentes, et generaliter quoslibet defensores." (Buller Magn. Luxemb. 1741, T. I. p. 718.) Who would have thought, after even the most zealous Catholics had blamed the impolitic revocation of the edict of Nantes, by Louis XIV. that a prince should still be found in Europe capable of resolving on a proceeding so inhuman and so fatal to his states. The Archbishop of Salzbourg, Baron of Firmain, in the year 1732, afflicted his country with a similar desolation. After unheard-of persecutions exercised on those who were not Catholics, he at length ordered them to quit their country, to the number of 30,000, without daring to carry anything away, or to take their families with them. Such an emigration exhausted this small territory. The unhappy fugitives were received by the Protestant states of Europe, who provided for their subsistence: a great part of them went to people and clear districts in North America, where the descendents of these Salzbourgian emigrants are still to be met with.

[‡] The reigning Pope has just declared, in a brief addressed to Prince Ruspoli, that he ought to be considered as the supreme head of all the orders of knighthood: in this he has been guided by the example of his predecessors. In the thirteenth century, when the Teutonic Knights had conquered Ducal Prussia, and established themselves in it as sovereigns, Innocent IV. declared by a bull, dated 1243, that this conquest belonged, of right to his see. His word are as follows; "Terram Prussiœ .... in jus et proprietatem B. Petre suscipimus, et eam sub speciali apostolicæ sedis protectione ac defensione perpetuis temporibus permanere sancimus ...." (Acta Borussica. T. I. p. 423). A sovereignty so well acquired, will not be willingly abandoned. When the Electors of Brandenburg took the title of Kings of Prussia, and all the powers of Europe, with the exception of Spain, acknowledged them in that quality, Pope Clement XI. exclaimed loudly, and wrote to every prince to rouse him against the unheard-of temerity of the Marquis of Brandenburg. In the brief of the 16th April, 1701, addressed to the King of France, are the following passages. "Etsi nobis persuasum sit, majest. tuam nullo modo probare consilium, deterimo in christianâ republicâ exemplo, a Friderico marchoine Brandeburgensi susceptum, dum regium nomen publice usurpare præsumpsit .... factum hujus modi apostolicarum sanctionum dispositioni contrarium, et hujus sanctæ sedis auctoritati injuriosum, ... ex quo scilicet sacra regalis dignitas ab homine acatholico non sine ecclesia contemptu assumitur, et quidem marchio se regem dicere non dubitat ejus partis Prussiæ, quœ ad militarem teutonicorum ordinem antiquo jure pertinet; nos rem silentio præterrire non possumus, ne muneri nostro deesse videamur .... expetimus, ne videlicet regios honores illi tribuos, qui illorum numero nimis incaute se junxit, quos increpat simul et reprobat sermo ille divinus: ipsi regnaverunt et non ex me, principes existerunt et non cognovi ...." And in the Orationes consistor. Clementis XI. it is seen that this Pope, giving an account of this event, and of his bull to the college of cardinals, relates, "that the Margrave Frederick has arrogated to himself the title of king in a manner at once impious and unheard-of among Christians; it being well known that, according to the pontifical laws, an heretic prince should rather lose his ancient dignities, than acquire a new one." Is not this the languarge and the principles of Hildebrand, the same pretensions, the same abuse of passages of the Bible, singularly applied to modern times? It might, perhaps, be supposed that the Holy See had afterwards retracted this protestation, and acknowledged a monarch who treats his Catholic subjects with an exemplary equality of rights. Nothing less. When, in 1782, Pius VI. took a journey to Germany, a Prussian minister used some endeavours with him to obtain a formal recognition of the crown of Prussia, Pius, who, at that time, did not wish to embroil himself with a German prince, answered politely, and promised that, on his return to Rome, he would assemble a congregation of cardinals, without whom he could not come to any determination, to deliberate on the subject. This congregation has never been called, and the Pope has forgotten his promise. The pontifical calendar, printed at Rome, with the approbation and privilege of the Holy Father, has continued, as before, to make no mention either of the kingdom or the duchy of Prussia, nor even of the electorate of Brandenburg. In the genealogical table of this house, (1783) the great Frederick is thus described: Charles Frederick, (Marchese,) Marquis; a title so trifling at Rome as to be ridiculous. Prince Henry of Prussia is described as brother to the Marquis. Neither is there any mention of an electorate of Hanover in this calendar. In general, everything determined on by the odious treaty of Westphalia, is of no value at Rome. The thundering bull of Innocent X. against this instrument of peace to the Christian people is well known; and his successors have, from time to time, renewed these anathemas. In this respect, the pontifical court lives outlawed in the midst of Europe, and is separated from the political communion. In 1782, on occasion of some differences relating to the Prussian part of the diocese of Cologne, the King of Prussia relied on an article of this celebrated treaty; the Pope replied, in unqualified terms, that the treaty of Westphalia was of no value to him, and could not bind him in any manner, not having been acknowledged by his see; "Non può valutarsi a quest' oggetto la separazione che si suppone satta in virtù dell' art. V. della Pace Westphalica; giacche é noto, che la S. Sede non ha mai riconosciuta questa Pace contro di cui Innocenzo X. si protestò, non solo in voce . . ma anche con due sue constituzioni . . . . . cosi permetera che il S. Padre non convenga in une ragione la quale s'opporebbe a tutto cio." This letter is well known in Berlin. The same calendar of state, quoted above, under the head of the population of Rome, enumerates also the foreigners, and amongst the rest, states "Heretics, Turks, and other Infidels about 100!"—These are recent facts; and a thousand others might be brought forward. I ask every impartial judge if they are of a nature to inspire a very great confidence in the voluntary amendment of the system of the pontifical court and of the spirit of papism?

[*] "Fidelis et obediens ero domino nostro papœ, ejusque successoribus. Consilium quod mihi traditari sunt nemini pandam, Pajudice, what could be expected from such regulations? What would absolute popes have done, when supported by bigoted and jealous emperors, who would have been united in spirit and interest with Rome.

There is not anything, therefore more vague, more uncertain, more destitute of real foundation, than the assurance, gratuitously given by the antagonists of the reformation, that the renovation of knowledge would, insensibly, have corrected all the abuses in the church and in policy. We most assuredly see few traces of this pretended amelioration in the government of the ultramontane states, or of those who have remained most immediately subjected to the yoke of papism. What has, for several centuries, kept our neighbours, the Ottomans, with whom also we have so much commercial intercourse, in a barbarism similar to that of the Christian nations during the middle age? It is religious superstition; it is their muftis, their faquirs, their dervises, who have kept among them a dislike to true knowledge, and to philosophy. We occidentals had plenty of such opponents, and even worse than the orientals; we had an inquisition, which they have not, the terrible reign of which we should, perhaps have seen perpetuated to our days, but for the reformation. Charming road to a better state of things! In the sixteenth century, some of the European states, and a great number of individuals, thought it right to take another. The Catholic princes, agents of Rome, endeavoured to deprive them of that liberty. They waged a war of extermination against the Protestants who could take up arms: they burnt and massacred, with incredible fury, those who could not. They then exclaimed: "See, of how many evils are these refractory wretches the cause! What a flame have they kindled in Europe! They are guilty of all their blood which we have shed, of all the scaffolds which we have prepared for them!" Strange recriminations, which many people have given, and still do give credit to; so easy is it to dose in the career of an established order of things which has endured for centuries! And since the order established in the sixteenth century was supported by a double power, by the secular arm, and by religious fanaticism, which would neglect nothing to maintain it, it is very evident that time would not have produced a salutary change, without a commotion, at least equal to that which took place.

Is not this mode of considering what might have happened and what has not happened, in some respects a description of the influence which the reformation has had on the state of things in Europe? But let us examine more in detail, what its positive results have been.

PART II.

INFLUENCE OF THE REFORMATION.

FIRST HEAD.

On the Political Situation of the States of Europe.

Mens Agitat Molem.
The active power of thought is superior to the inert power of a mass.

Before the reformation, Europe was, in general, subject to two powers, the spiritual and the temporal. On the one hand, the head of the church extended his authority and his pretensions over every state indiscriminately; on the other, a great number of bishops and prelates had become temporal sovereigns of the flocks, which, at first, were entrusted to their spiritual guidance, and there was not any country in which the clergy, high and low, secular and regular, did not possess considerable wealth and privileges, and enjoy great authority. The church constituted a powerful body which pressed hard upon the political bodies, and, in a greater or less degree, influenced their existence. Hence every remarkable alteration in the church occasioned a change in the political order; now a revolution which had commenced in the domain of religion, must have exerted its first influence on the church. It is therefore natural to treat first of this, as well with regard to itself and its head, as to its relations, and those of its members, with the different governments; next we shall examine what influence the reformation, considered in a political point of view, has exercised on the states of Europe, both Protestant and Catholic; finally, we shall take an historical view of the system of equilibrium introduced into Europe since that epocha, of its variations, and of the powers which have alternately acted the principal parts in it, until the period at which the influence of the reformation on it ceased.

SECT. I.

Of the Church in itself, and in its Political Relations.

The popes lose half the empire, more than half Switzerland, all Denmark, Sweden, Holland, and England, the rich tributes which flowed from these countries to Rome cease entirely. The credit of the sovereign pontiff with all these Christian powers is annihilated. Still if it had only been a new irruption of barbarians, an earthquake, an inundation, or, in short, any physical cause which had ravished these delightful possessions from the Holy See! But it was an active force, a dangerous epidemy, which produced such evils to it. It was nations and princes, who of their own free will, through conviction, had dared, to withdraw themselves in this manner from the pontifical authority. The example was to be dreaded, both at the time present, and for the time to come. It was easy to foresee that sooner or later this example would be universally followed. The church which had seceded from Rome, subsisted with decency and honour; religion, the gospel, morals were respected in it; the rights which had been arrogated by Rome were allowed their just value in it; good writings on this subject were everywhere disseminated; they were even read in the Catholic countries, and produced an effect on them; and even on the steps of the pontifical throne, more than one ironical sneer contemned the Tiara. It was this which rendered the wound deep and incurable, and which the popes would not suffer themselves, at first, to believe, in all its extent. Even after this terrible blow, the pride of Hildebrand and the vices of Borgia were seen for an instant, in the Christian world. But at length, time and hard experience have convinced them of their real situation; they are resigned, at least in appearance, to the station of humility and of submission which has ever since been their lot among the powers of the earth. The Catholic sovereigns, on their part, have from that time considered the pope as a political spring, to bring into action for the accomplishment of their designs, and as a means for converting the credulity of their subjects to their own benefit: hence the conduct held to him; but the apparent respect has since then

A word more on the famous bull, In Cæna Domini, which contains the whole elixir of ultramontane orthodoxy, and in which are deposited the principles which make, and always will make, the secret basis of the conduct of the Holy See. This bull, written in 1610 by Paul V. and promulgated in 1627, by Urban VIII. is a complete collection of the anathemas issued centuries ago against those who are refractory to the orders of the vicar of J. C. It excommunicates heretics, schismatics, pirates, and corsairs; all who dare to appeal to a future council against the bulls and briefs of the Pope, princes who establish new taxes without the permission of the Pope; those who make treaties of alliance with Turks or Heretics; those who complain to the secular judges against the wrongs and injuries received from the court of Rome, etc. etc. These revolting terms were long the law in the Roman dominion, and even in some provinces of France, such as Roussilon and Cerdagne, until, at length, the courageous M. de Cappot, advocate-general to the superior council of Roussilon, in the month of March, 1763, took measures against this abuse of the ecclesiastical power, and put a stop to the annual publication of the bull. See the work entitled Jurisprudence du grand-conseil examinae dans les maximes du royaume, Avignon, 1775.

been only idle etiquette. It is too well known that the Vatican is but an extinguished volcano. The spontaneous acts of Rome have had no effect, while a simple courier, secretly expedited from Paris, Vienna, or Lisbon, to this ancient capital of the world, procured, sometimes a bull for the extinction of a religious order, sometimes a reform, sometimes a regulation, so many proofs of submission given by the weak successor of so many arrogant pontiffs, who only purchases his precarious existence at the price of every complaisance which is required of him.

So considerable a portion of the riches and credit of Rome having disappeared, the excessive luxury, the flatterers, the parasites also disappeared by degrees. This gave birth to a reform of manners, to a change of life, which was become quite indispensable to the Roman clergy. Those of the Protestant Church were, in general, poor, learned, and exemplary. So many eyes opened upon the contrast of the two bodies, created an imperious necessity for lessening it, and even for removing it wholly. Besides the Popes and all the members of the Roman clergy, living in their time, and participating in their lights, would, themselves, have blushed at a conduct similar to that of many of their predecessors. Those particularly who have filled the functions of pastors in times nearer to our own, have generally lived in the exercise of the most eminent virtues. The head and the clergy of the Romish church have, in a great measure, become what they always ought to have been. It is very true that this church has commenced a reform; but it is also true that this reform is only an immediate consequence, and perhaps, a compulsory one, of that effected by Luther, who, in this view of it, must also be considered as the reformer of the Catholic clergy.

What has been just said of the weakness and humiliation of the Roman clergy, must not, as has been already observed, be understood of the time immediately subsequent to the reformation. Since the political troubles which arose in Europe, in consequence of it, had all a religious character, and originated in religious disputes, it is natural that the ecclesiastics should act an important part in them, and that princes should consider them as necessary agents in these affairs, and employ their counsels and their ministry.

In fact, during this period, we find a number of churchmen holding the principal situations, and becoming of weight in the state. The famous Council of Trent, which occupied and agitated every court, from 1545 to 1563, also rendered ecclesiastics indispensable in the cabinets of their sovereigns. On the other hand, the high opinion at that time entertained of the refined politics of the Roman court, was a prejudice very favourable to priests of every description. The political importance which was acquired by some members of the clergy, could not but affect the whole body in a degree, and doubtless the church is indebted to it for the consolidation and maintenance of many of the rights which it would have lost from that time. Many of the violent measures entered into by sovereigns, and of which the history of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries offers numerous examples, also arose, without doubt, from the inquisitorial zeal of such counsellors. Nevertheless some of these priest-ministers conducted themselves more as servants of the state, than as servants of the altar, and the minister sometimes got the better of the priest. At length, this last period of sacerdotal importance vanished. It was annihilated in an instant, after the treaty of Westphalia, where religion ceased to be the main-spring of politics, and the action of governments was directed by other principles; such, for example, as a financial and commercial spirit, the influence of which still continues, and may continue for a length of time.

To the same motives may be attributed the rapid elevation and immense credit of the new order of Jesuits, who, born by the side of Protestantism, and, at the same time, were destined from their birth to combat and counterbalance it. These new soldiers of the church, constituted in a much more formidable manner than the army of mendicants, raised in the barbarous ages, and inventors of a system of tactics much more suitable to the spirit of the new one, did everything for the enfeebled church which could be hoped for from human powers, directed by the most profound prudence, zeal, perseverance, genius, and a combination of talents. They got possession of courts, of nations, of confessionals, of pulpits, of the education of youth, of missions, and of the deserts of the two worlds. Nothing appeared to them impossible in extending the dominion of the Holy See to places where it did not exist, or in consolidating it where it was still maintained. In pursuit of this object they dreaded neither persecutions nor calumnies. Represented as ambitious, fomenters of troubles, corrupt men, and even, as regicides, by their adversaries, they opposed the stoical severity of their lives, their services, and their studious austerity, to these accusations. This is not the place to enter into the detail of the movements produced in the politics of Europe by this celebrated society, the influence of which arose only from the reaction of Catholicism against the reform. It is sufficient to observe, that if the latter could have sunk, and experienced a counter-revolution, the Jesuits would doubtless have effected the great work. So far from this, that the enemy, whom they flattered themselves they could crush, gave them the mortal blow: the genius of modern times declared against the spiritual tyranny of Rome, and, formed by the reformation into an effective power, has reduced those audacious defenders of papism to a nonentity. To consummate, and, at the same time, to bear testimony to the humiliation of his party, it was necessary that the pope himself should be compelled to discard them. A victim to the general spirit of humanity, which in its progressive advancement decrees the ruin of every institution inimical to it, Ganganelli signing with humid eye the bull for the extinction of the Jesuits, was only the precursor of the unfortunate Louis XVI, who, in less than twenty years after, was forced to send away his army, his nobility, his guards. Whoever reflects on history cannot withhold admiration from a society which has constantly shown such courage, concert, perseverance, and address in its plans: while acknowledging the ill it may have done, he will be unable to avoid doing justice to all of great or useful which it has produced. Its radical vice, and the principle of its destruction, lay in the institution itself. Destined to support the edifice of the hierarchy, which imperceptibly mouldered away, on every side, the hand of time, and opinion which guides it, must necessarily overturn this last rampart, attached to a vast ruin which nothing could uphold.*

The aspect of the clergy in the countries which have adopted the reform, is totally different, its members do not wish to be other than what they can, and ought to be, the ministers of the word of God, the guardians of the public morals. Freed from all obedience foreign to the country from which they receive their stipend, become husbands, fathers, citizens; they have no longer any interest but that of the state in which they live. They are appointed either by the prince, or by the magistrate, or by the people: Luther brought the Saxon church, in what relates to its internal government, to the democracy of the first age, and the hierarchy to a moderate system of subordination. The churches which have followed Calvin are still more democratically constituted. But the clergy no longer form a civil corporation in any of them. Some public marks of honour and deference are the only privileges of the ministers. According to the words of their master they give unto Cæsar that which is Cæsar's, by rendering unto God that which they owe him. The abolition of auricular confession† cuts off, at one stroke, the infinite ramifications by which the hierarchical despotism had taken root in all parts, and deprives the clergy of their incalculable influence over princes, grandees, and women, and over all families.

The constitution of the church, in Denmark, in Sweden, and more especially in England, has continued more conformable in appearance to the Roman hierarchy, for reasons peculiar to these three countries, and which are to be found in their history. One of the principal was the attachment of their sovereigns to the system of episcopal subordination, which they thought more favourable to their authority. The Puritans, Presbyterians, and others, had given sufficient indications of republicanism, to alarm their princes for the consequences of this spirit, so nearly connected with that of Protestantism. The favourite motto of the Stuarts, "No Bishop, no King," is well known. Thus these kingdoms have retained Protestant bishops, who enjoy moderate revenues, and some civil prerogatives attached to their situations, as being members of the states, or of the House of Peers, etc. But these prerogatives are individual, and it would be wrong to to suppose from this circumstance, that the clergy still forms a distinct order in these nations.[*] In some parts of Germany the principal guardians of worship are called general superintendents. Ecclesiastical affairs are discussed by tribunals, called consistories. They are established by the prince, and it is by no means uncommon for their president to be a layman; as, for example, in the free towns, it is the syndic of the senate.

* Some individuals, animated by a blind zeal, still make weak and vain efforts to revive the order of Jesuits. They will not succeed. A moral impossibility opposes them. Their order was a natural product of the time in which it arose; to the present time, it can only be a foreign and parasitical plant, which must wither for want of nourishment. Our age cannot acknowledge the sons of Loyola for its children. A few retreats, in which their feeble remains may be concealed, where they may secretly propagate superannuated principles, will be their only reliance. They must never more quit them to domineer over opinion, and through it, over the world; it is opinion which will wound them there, and will change even the spirit of their sectaries.

† It is necessary to guard against blending the auricular confession of the Roman Catholics, with the particular confession, still in use with some Protestants. They are two very different things, which scarcely have any resemblance to each other, except in name.

The Protestant princes have everywhere become the supreme heads of the church. This circumstance has contributed greatly to the increase of power which has followed the reformation in most of the governments of Europe, and which may be considered as a consequence of its influence. In the Protestant countries, the immense vacuum occasioned by the sudden cessation of all ecclesiastical authority and jurisdiction, was immediately filled by the civil power, which increased in proportion. In the Catholic countries, the church, terrified and menaced, also gave some ground to the authority of government. The wars, both civil and external, which, in most states, were the consequence of the religious animosity, in the end, enabled princes to render their power unlimited, as will be shown in speaking of each state in particular.

A proximate consequence of the reformation, and of the oppositions, the actions, and reactions, it set in motion, was also the establishment of various sects of Christianity as dominant religions in the countries where they had taken root. Formerly, when only one communion was known, such an idea could not have existed. Papism governed by its own power, and not by the law. When heretics were persecuted, it was not by a law of the state, but by a requisition from the Pope, to whom the prince gave his aid. One effect of the reciprocal jealousy and opposition of these sects was to exclude from all the places of state, and frequently, even from the throne, all who did not profess the same faith, or had not the same creed, as that adopted by the bulk of the nation and by the government. From this legal arrangement arose a new species of intolerance, which, hitherto, had remained unknown, and which was established in the different Protestant communions, as well as among the Catholics. Hence the revocation of the edict of Nantes and the civil disability which weighed so heavily on every citizen of a confession different from that which was predominant. In some Catholic countries this disability amounted to a civil death. A reformist could not possess goods in his own right, nor bequeath them, nor marry, nor have legitimate children; happy if he was not hunted by dragoons, and did not perish by their hands, or by those of the executioner: for it must be confessed that the Catholic states pushed this intolerance much further than the most intolerant reformists.

Finally, there are very few of the states of Europe that have adhered to the Holy See, in which it has retained all its prerogatives. Venice and Portugal have always shown themselves refractory; and so has Spain at times. A multitude of Protestants, Socinians, and Dissenters of every confession, have sprung up in Poland, Hungary, and Austria. It has been the same in the ecclesiastical principalities of Germany. In France, besides a very great number of individuals who have adopted the reform, the kings and the parliaments have on many occasions, shown themselves but little favourable to the ultramontane pretensions; and, in more instances than one, the monarchs have threatened Rome to follow the example of Henry VIII. The courageous Gallican church has had more than one worthy successor of Gerson and Richer; and it has required great management to keep it an integrant part of the patrimony of St. Peter. The council assembled at Trent to reconcile all the church of Christ, only marked its divisions more strongly. This assembly issued a multiplicity of decrees which the greater part of the Catholic states did not adopt without great modifications, and which soon fell into disuse, for want of a power to enforce their execution. This council, which was to reinstate the Popes, produced Sarpi's book, which has done them more harm than ten councils can remedy. M. de Marca, Archbishop of Toulouse, in his Treatise De concordiâ sacerdotii et imperii, and more especially M. de Honthiem, suffragan Bishop of Treves, in his work[*] published under the feigned name of Justnius Febronius, have completed what Sarpi so happily began. The successive efforts of the Christian states to attain independence, are connected by an uninterrupted chain with those of the first reformers. Thus we must consider, as consequences of the same influence, the reforms attempted, and, in part, effected, in the clergy of Austria by Joseph II.; as well as the total dispossession of the clergy of France, and its political annihilation by the constituent assembly; and, finally, the general secularization which has been lately effected in Catholic Germany.[†] It is obvious how easy it would be to show that the remote source of these great events is in the reformation, which alone, as is very evident, could have made them possible; and that the fall of the Roman clergy, which began at that time, has only been completed in our days.

SECT. II.

On the principal Christian States.

Here a double point of view manifestly offers itself; that of the interior situation of the different states in themselves, and that of the exterior situation in respect of each other. The first must exhibit the proportion of their strength; that of their prosperity; the power of their princes; the liberty of the people: the second relates solely to the system of equilibrium introduced into Europe since the reformation.

FIRST POINT OF VIEW.

Internal Situation of the States.

The influence of the reformation has been more perceptible on the states in which it arose, and acquired consistence, than on those which have not adopted it. It therefore appears natural to begin here with the former.

And in the first place, let us attend to their common destinies, as Protestant states.

1. PROTESTANT STATES.

The immense sums which, under every name and pretext, these states sent continually to Rome, and which exhausted their currency, have ceased to leave the country: they circulate in it; they give a new activity to commerce and industry; a new prosperity to the subjects; and an increase of strength to the government: while, on the other hand, public credit experiences temporary checks in them. Treasures are concealed or buried, from a dread of the future, the standard of coin is changed, emigrations become frequent, the insecurity which is a consequence of the uncertainty of a triumph of parties, lessens the credit of landed property! money being more transportable, is in greater estimation than it; but man, in himself, more particularly acquires a price superior to both of them; his intrinsic value being more useful is more felt, and becomes the most esteemed of all property.

This is one of the best effects of these terrible commotions which, deranging all rights, the offspring of social institutions, leaves, in their stead, only greatness of soul, virtue, and talents, the produce of nature alone.

The immense possessions of the clergy, as well secular as regular, are placed at the disposal of the governments. Most of them wisely turn this good fortune to advantage, pay their debts, fill their coffers, apply the property of whole abbies, and other ecclesiastical possessions, in useful establishments, in schools, universities, hospitals, orphan houses, dwellings, and rewards for the old servants of the state ; measures, by which this property is restored to its primitive destination : and finally these governments are placed in a state to support the wars, in which every one sees that the existing crisis must inevitably plunge them. Some of them, however, dissipate the wealth they have acquired, without thought : others are obliged to leave the better part to the nobility, Denmark for instance, as will be noticed hereafter.

[*] It is useless to notice the only two evangelical bishops of Germany, that of Osnaburgh, and that of Lubeck. These two bishoprics have been secularized in favour of the houses which have long possessed them.

[†] More terrible attacks perhaps still await the Papal authority and the Roman clergy, in this country. What friend of knowledge and of humanity but observes with interest the measures taken in Bavaria by an enlightened and benevolent prince, who will regenerate this fine country, by promoting learning and industry at the expense of superstition and monarchism ? May all his beneficent views be accomplished without opposition. The immortality which awaits him, the homage of every good man, the benedictions of his subjects, will be his certain recompense.

Governments not only dispose of the wealth of the church, but they also find that they have the disposition of the wealth, the persons, and all the strength of the people. The cause of religion is become that of every individual : the resources which this disposition offers to princes are incalculable. We have seen what it was able to effect in the first war against Charles V. and afterwards in the thirty years war against the two Ferdinands. What the most imminent danger of the state could not have obtained from the individuals of it, religious zeal brought about without difficulty ; for it, artizans, tradesmen, farmers ran to arms ; no one attempted to screen himself from the taxes though they had become triple their former amount. In the violent agitation in which the danger of their religion had put all minds, life and property were devoted, and the efforts and the burthen, which in a state of greater tranquillity, would have been insupportably distressing, were not felt. The dread of an inquisition, of the scenes of St. Bartholomew, opened sources of power to the league of Smalcald, to the Prince of Orange, to Queen Elizabeth, to Admiral Coligny, which would have been closed in every other state of things.

When once a people of their own accord, enthusiastically, and for several successive generations, have made common cause with their princes, a public spirit of concert and harmony is produced between the people and the government, between the head and the members, which is salutary to the country, and is sometimes continued in it for ages. We cannot err with respect to this disposition in the Protestant nations, if we examine them narrowly ; and the histories of them, that of Prussia in particular, exhibit many instances wherein it was manifested.

But if through his quality of head of the church, and through the confidence of his people, a Protestant prince acquires more stability and more authority, the very nature of the event which puts this new power into his hands, requires that he should make the most legitimate and most equitable use of it. He has only acquired power to serve and to defend the nation, not to oppress it. The most accurate observers have noticed, that nature has particularly fitted the people of the North to be republicans ; and it cannot be denied that several of those who have embraced the reformation have always been actuated by this spirit, as for example, the Saxons, the Swiss, the Dutch, and the English : it may even be said, that the reformation itself was only a positive application of it. This shock in its turn, awakened all the energy and the accessory ideas of it. The will to be free in matters of conscience, is, at the bottom, the same as the will to be free in civil matters. Now this will can accomplish all that is required, and there are no slaves, but those who wish to be so, or who have not the strength of will to put an end to it. The energy of men's minds at length constitutes true liberty, as their effeminacy makes tyranny necessary. The calm and sober sentiment of the high dignity of man, is the only solid foundation of true republicanism ; it is by it alone that equality of rights, and reciprocity of duties are established. Christianity, in the purity of its essence, inspires this sentiment ; for which reason it is very common and general, in the evangelical countries. The constitution of England has been much admired, I shall not dispute on its value ; but that which renders this uncouth constitution so good, is the patriotism, the dignity, the independence of the peasant, the citizen, the gentleman of England. Introduce the sentiments of slaves into all those hearts which now swell with freedom, and you will soon see the use of this fine palladium of a constitution. Prussia and Denmark have no parliaments, nor any visible barriers to the royal authority, yet they enjoy the most admirable liberty, but there, the invisible barriers are in the mind, even in that of the prince, nursed and trained in the spirit which animates the nation ; they are in the great simplicity of manners, the most remote from luxury and pride. There we see powerful princes habited like their subjects, going like them on foot or in a plain carriage, without attendants, without etiquette ; during their youth, simple officers in the national army which they are one day destined to command. What modern state can boast of a king like the immortal Frederick II.? what nations of a union of princes so distinguished and so wise, as the Protestant nations of Germany ? Sweden instances with pride the four Gustavuses. Two extraordinary women, Elizabeth and Catharine have filled thrones in Europe during the last centuries ; both of them were reared in the principles of Protestantism. Finally, can France forget the best of her kings, and the best minister of that king, were both disciples of the reform.

Having spoken of this disposition of the public spirit amongst the Protestants, ought I to notice here the progress they have made in the science of legislation, and the other sciences connected with it, such as administration, statistics, &c. ? or, should I reserve these considerations for the section in which I am to treat of the progress of knowledge ?

The uncertainty which I feel in this respect proves that everything that concerns man, in society, has a very intimate connection, and that the great business of his liberty depends very closely upon the true culture of his mind.

It will be therefore sufficient to observe that the ecclesiastical authority being, before the reformation, closely interwoven with the civil authority, in many places, and wholly blended with it in many others, it was impossible to probe and discuss the rights of the one, without the examination being extended to the rights of the other. It was asked, by what authority the popes claimed the power of setting up, and dethroning kings : this naturally led to an inquiry into the first authority by which the kings were instituted. These respective rights of the church and the state being brought into discussion, it was not impossible to touch on this important question, without a speedy recurrence to the rights of the people. It was found that society, considered as a religious union, that is to say, as a church, had a right of choosing its ministers, and fixing its creed : it was very easy to conclude from this, that, with regard to its political union, it had also a right to elect its own magistrates, and to give itself a new constitution. The emperor opposed the new religious creed ; it was therefore asked, whether in matters of belief the emperor ought to be obeyed. In 1531, the faculty of right, and that of theology of the university of Wittemberg unanimously replied in the negative. From thenceforward, there was nothing but debates on the limits of obedience due to sovereigns, and on those of the resistance which might be offered to them. Zwingle pronounced his severe cum Deo potest deponi against the oppression. Before Luther, such a language had never been loudly and explicitly heard in Europe. He dared to speak great truths, and he led the way for many others.* The writings of the first reformers on politics mostly breathe this spirit. When the long wars of Germany and Flanders were terminated, the same spirit was developed in some excellent work still received as classical, and in which the rights of the two powers, those of the princes, and the people ; those of political bodies with each other, are discussed with spirit and precision, very different both from the ancient spirit of the schools, and the demagogic exaggeration of the eighteenth century. Germany, Switzerland, Holland, England, even France, in which the reform had spread considerably, although the government did not adopt it, produced a number of similar writings about this period. Some of the principal ones will be noticed in one of the articles of the second section.

The reformation, therefore, which, at first, was only a return to liberty in the order of religious affairs, became, for all these reasons, also a return to liberty in the political system. Princes relied on this liberty, they sought it, and embraced it, as well as their subjects. For this reason the Protestant sovereigns have constantly held a different language towards their people; they have professed other principles of liberality and humanity, than the Catholic sovereigns, their cotemporaries. Their people have been long familiarized to the language and the principles of reason; they know that it is the basis of their government, and they are accustomed to the discussion of their interests and their rights, which produces no emotion in them; the liberty of thinking and writing is as natural to them as the air they breathe. This may induce a reasonable belief that a political revolution, similar to that of France, is not practicable in the states which are not Catholic; the most essential results of such a revolution are already completely established in them, and cupidity cannot now be stimulated by the possessions of the church. Consequently there are no people more submissive to their princes and to the laws of their country than the Protestants, because these laws are conceived in a right spirit; princes and subjects are equally patriots and republicans, and every one knows by experience the moderate medium proper to be kept between speculative democracy and practical democracy.

* In his book, de la guerre contre les Turcs, Luther himself says, " No one had yet taught or understood; no one knew any thing concerning the secular power, neither whence it came, nor what was its office, nor how it could be agreeable to God. The best informed held the temporal power and authority to be worldly and profane, nay, pagan and impious, and a state of danger of salvation. In a word, good princes and lords (being otherwise so disposed to piety) considered their state and dignity as less than nothing, and in no respect agreeable to God; and therefore became true priests and monks, though without cap and cowl. Moreover the pope and clergy, were all in all, over all and everything, like God himself, in the world; and the civil authority was in darkness, oppressed and misunderstood. At present I am reproached with being seditious; although I have (by the grace of God) written wisely and usefully on the secular power, so as has not been done by any teacher since the time of the Apostles, (unless perhaps St. Augustine;) this I can say with a safe conscience, and the world can testify it.

It is asserted that, at first, Francis I. appeared very favourable to the doctrine of the reformers of the church.* His beloved sister Margaret, Queen of Navarre, protected it publicly. At that instant, the fate of the kingdom depended on the party which he should embrace. If he had adopted the reform, all France would have followed his example: the fate of Protestantism, in Europe, would have been sooner decided; the civil wars in France would doubtless not have taken place, nor would the revolution of the eighteenth century. Everything assumed a contrary aspect, because the prince conceived lively apprehensions of the political consequences of the reformation. Brantome relates that one day, in a conversation on this subject, the king accidentally said, "That this novelty tended principally to the overthrow of monarchy, both divine and human."† In fact, this prince showed, in the end, an irreconcilable hatred to Protestantism, of which his successors inherited too much: the lesson remains.

But if Francis I. thought in this manner, is it not permitted to take his opinion for an authority, and to consider the establishment of the French republic as a remote, but necessary, corollary to the reformation, as the republic of the United Provinces was a proximate corollary, and that of America another, nearer than ours?

In some of the extravagant sects which arose from the reformation, such as that of the Anabaptists, we may observe the same pretensions to absolute equality and liberty, as occasioned all the excesses of the Jacobins of France: the agrarian law, the pillage of the rich, made part of their creed, and war with the castles, and peace to the cottages, might have been inscribed on their ensigns. At first these enthusiasts gave great uneasiness to the princes of Germany. Luther was much hurt at their excesses, and frequently reproached himself with having, though innocently, given rise to them. However they were soon repressed. England was not so soon freed from the disturbance of its Presbyterians and Independents, as will be seen in the article relating to that power, in the detail to which we are about to proceed.

It may be added, that all the Protestant princes and states benefited more or less by the labour and industry of a multitude of the proscribed, who emigrated from the Catholic countries, where they were persecuted, as happened particularly to the Protestants of France, at the revocation of the edict of Nantes; while the Catholics, tranquil and tolerated, under the dominion of the Protestants, never thought of quitting and impoverishing their native land.

We may also observe, that in the Protestant countries, agriculture and industry were enriched by the suppression of numerous holidays, lost to labour in Catholic countries, and which are, in reality, negative quantities, that diminish, by all their amount, the aggregate of national industry and riches.

Germany.

Before the reformation, the German empire was an irregular aggregate of states, which chance, convenience, or events had united into an ill-formed confederation, the constitution of which was a true chaos. The individual forces of these different states, without direction, without unity, were almost a nullity as confederate forces, and incapable of acting externally. The Golden Bull, a strange production of the fourteenth century, fixed, it is true, some of the relations of the head with the member; but nothing was less clear than the public right of all these independent, though united states. The personal character and power of the emperor were generally the only motives which decided the degree of respect paid to him by the other princes. During the long reign of the indolent Frederick III., called the Pacific, who slept on the imperial throne from 1440 to 1492, this throne lost nearly all its consequence. Maximilian I., notwithstanding all the efforts he employed, had much difficulty in restoring it. Among the most powerful of the electors and other princes, there was not a single one sufficiently so to make himself respected externally. They all lived at home, more like private gentlemen and fathers of families than like sovereigns, and were scarcely anything more than the richest proprietors in their provinces. There was no likelihood that any of the reigning families would raise themselves from this general lethargy above the rest. Each prince divided his states among his children, who were often very numerous, which, instead of strengthening, weakened the dynasties. None of the lands were indivisible but these particularly attached to to the electoral dignity. From these divisions, and from other causes, wars between prince and prince, troubles and disorders, frequently arose, which were not put an end to without much difficulty. The younger branches, who were worst provided for, and the lords, frequently gave themselves up to depredations, which at present would meet with extreme punishment, but to which, in those times, a kind of chivalrous honour was attached. Nothing can be weaker than a body thus constituted. They met in diet, it is true, to deliberate on their common concerns; but Frederick, during more than half a century, which he reigned, had never appeared there, and Maximilian, his son, seldom came, except to ask for money, of which he was always in want. for the execution of his numerous projects. If, during the first years of Frederick's reign, the Turk, at that time the irreconcilable enemy of all Christianity, had not planted the cresent in Europe, and incessantly menaced the empire with invasion, it is not easy to judge how the feeble bond which united this body could have remained unbroken. The terror inspired by Mahomet II. and his ferocious troops, was the first common interest which obliged the princes of Germany to form a more solid connection with each other, round the imperial throne.

It was in these circumstances that Charles, already in the possession of the flourishing kingdom of Spain, of part of Italy, of the states of the houses of Burgundy and Austria, acceded to this throne. The boundless power of this new emperor soon occasioned an inquietude in most of the states for their future existence, which was menaced by the ambition of their young chief. The reformation offered them a rallying point, new powers, and the possibility of forming a respectable opposition; they embraced it, as much from political motives as from religious persuasion. Charles V. did not embrace it, and, on his part, saw only in it the fortunate event, which, furnishing him with the pretext and the right to combat the new opposition with all his power, offered the most desirable opportunity of accomplishing his designs without difficulty, and in a plausible manner. This is the main idea which forms the ground-work of the whole history of his reign. The Protestant princes and states entered into a solemn league, in a sort of peculiar diet, held at Smalcald, under the two most considerable princes of the league; Frederick the Wise, elector of Saxony, the protector of Luther, and his first disciple among the sovereigns; and Philip, Landgrave of Hesse, called the Generous. This league remained long in a menacing and independent attitude, in the presence of Charles. The continual attacks, as well of the French, the Venetians, the Milanese, and the popes, as of the Turks under Soliman II. and which gave the emperor sufficient employment in the south and east, prevented the rupture from taking place sooner. During this interval, the Protestants demanded concessions from the emperor, and Charles, who required their assistance, was compelled to yield to most of them.

* He even wrote to Melancthon to request him to come to Paris. Melancthon was unable to comply with this request, because the Elector of Saxony refused his permission.

† Did not Francis I. imbibe this opinion from ecclesiastical insinuations? This king, (says the president Henault, under the year 1534) complaining of the pope to his nuncio, wished to make him fear the example of Henry VIII. to which the nuncio replied: "Truly, sire, you will be the first sufferer; a new religion given to a nation requires afterwards only the change of the prince." Francis might have replied, that neither Henry VIII. nor Gastavus Vasa, nor any of the Saxon princes, were dethroned, after having embraced the reform.

At length the moment arrived (in 1546, the very year of Luther's death, who had constantly endeavoured to prevent every sanguinary catastrophe) in which, being freed from his other enemies, Charles V. was enabled to engage in a contest with the party of the Protestants. At first he was successful; the strength and the military talents of the princes of the league were unequal to their courage; and the brilliant victory of Muhlberg, in the second year of the war, in which the principal of them were made prisoners, seemed to have put an end to it. But scarcely had Charles began to enjoy his triumph when Maurice of Saxony snatched from him, by a blow as impossible to foresee as to guard against, the laurels he had so lately acquired, and nearly all those he had gained in his laborious career. The Saxon prince had very nearly made prisoner of the emperor himself, in Inspruck. The latter, by the peace signed at Passau, in 1552, strengthened more than ever the existence of the evangelical body, and saw the fine projects he had conceived for bringing Germany under his dominion, annihilated. The king of France, Henry II. who had assisted the Protestants in this war, publicly took the title of Protector of the Germanic liberty, and avenger of the captive princes. Assisted by these civil troubles in the empire, he also made himself master of the bishoprics of Metz, Toul and Verdun. Charles V. did not lose an instant in hastening to retake these cities. He miscarried before Metz, and this was one of his last reverses.

Germany now ceased to be what it had been before this crisis. Its ancient indolence was changed into an active vigilance. The princes of the league had tried their strength, and acquired confidence in themselves. The general confederation, which continued to subsist, was composed of two opposite parties, jealous of each other, both possessed of a constitutional existence, mutually watching each other, and continually appearing ready to come to blows. This marked opposition, this reciprocal irritability became a new principle of life to the whole body, and developed all its powers. Notwithstanding the peace, (too sudden to be well secured,) the empire resembled the ocean after a tempest, the waves of which are still terrible. The universal agitation made a new rupture apparent, and it would certainly be an inexplicable phenomenon in history that this was retarded until 1618, if the personal characters of the three emperors who succeeded Charles V. did not assist us in penetrating the causes of it.

At length, Ferdinand II. on ascending the imperial throne, found that devastating war already commenced, which continued during all his reign and great part of that of his successor. Austria took advantage of its open rupture with the Protestant party, its frequent successes, and the presence of its armies, to annihilate in the archduchy, Silesia and Moravia, not only the privileges previously granted to numerous Protestants, who had oftener than once given uneasiness to their suspicious sovereigns, but also those privileges of the states which ameliorated their constitutions. She did the same in Bohemia and Hungary, where she not only destroyed all religious liberty, but also took possession of the inheritance to the crown, which had been formerly elective. The Austrian monarchs are indebted to the reformation for the definitive establishment of their real power within their states; the hope which they lost of ruling other states was certainly not so valuable to them as the real advantage of being absolute and uncontrolled masters of their own, and of acquiring, as patrimonial inheritances, two kingdoms, so inexhaustible in resources and natural riches. The fate of Bohemia was decided in 1620, after the bloody battle of Prague. That of Hungary, it is true, was not definitively settled until nearly sixty years later, but it was not the less an immediate consequence of the religious war, and of the oppression of the Protestant party in this country. After the treaty of Westphalia, the Austrian power retained no other internal weakening principle except the division of its possessions in Suabia, Belgium, and Italy, which by that means became too difficult to defend, as was very evident in her subsequent wars. The last which she had with France deprived her of these fine but burthensome domains. She has acquired others in Germany and Poland, which are much more agreeable to her real interests. Austria cannot longer conceive projects inimical to the liberty of Europe, because rivals, of too great weight, have sprung up around her, and confine her on all sides; but she may always hold an honourable rank among the principal powers, if she makes a wise use of the lessons of external degradation, and internal consolidation, taught her by the reformation.

During this long and cruel civil discord in the nations of Germany, the ancient bond which subsisted among them was never broken. Some of them were desirous that the whole should be Catholic; the others would remain Protestants; but nearly all of them wished to remain united with each other and with their head. Had the empire been divided into two empires, these two weak confederations would have fallen a prey to the strongest, or to some stranger. On the contrary, experience has shown that the existence of an evangelical body, and its definitive organization, has become a salutary institution to the empire in general, and a strong security for its constitution; and, that both parties have an equal interest in guarding and supporting it. Even at the present day, when so many of its members have changed their form and their name, the life which supports the whole body will, in all probability, become the more active for it. Whatever may happen hereafter, all was disorder and disorganization in this extensive country before the reformation; since that, and through its influence, every state has become order and organization.

Protestant Germany subsisted at first by its federative force, with considerable equality between its principal members; and, as these states, with the exception of one, have not since been raised so as to produce any sensible influence on the political situation of the states of Europe, they may be passed over here in silence. That a succession of religious troubles has placed the house of Brunswick on the throne of Great Britain, is a circumstance of considerable interest in different points of view; but on the whole it rather concerns an individual house, than a state. The King of England being a member of the empire, has sometimes found greater facility in exciting the mass according to his interests; he has been enabled to draw some regiments from Hanover. But, if what the defence of this country, and the attachment of the kings of the house of Brunswick for their German states, has cost England, to be taken into the account; and if the sort of dependence on Prussia and France which this royal crown, by its amalgamation with the electorate, always must be in, and the state of humiliation to which it has sometimes been, consequently, reduced, be added to it, it will be acknowledged that the disadvantages are at least equal to the advantages. The true strength of England is in its riches, and its riches proceed from its fleets. Farther on we shall see what influence the reformation has had on the first developement of this marine. A more important circumstance to the manner in which Germany is settled, was the establishment of the Prussian monarchy, the foundation of which was laid by the reformation. At the beginning of the sixteenth century, Prussia was an ecclesiastical country, governed by the grand master of the Teutonic order. Albert of Brandenburg, who was grand master at that time, soon followed the example which had been set him by more than one ecclesiastical prince. He secularized Prussia in 1525, and made it an hereditary duchy for himself and descendants, under the seignorage of the kings of Poland. He married and had children, and the last heiress of this branch, named Anne, espoused the hereditary prince, who was afterwards Elector of Brandenburgh, by the name of John Sigismond. Prussia ceased to be a fief of Poland, in 1657, by the treaty of Wehlau, and definitively by that of Oliva, three years after. In 1701, it was erected into a kingdom, and has since raised itself to the rank of the first powers of Europe. It is very true that the future grandeur of the Prussian monarchs could not be foreseen at the time of the secularization of the duchy of Prussia; it is, however, equally true, that without this event, we should at present find an elector of Brandenburgh, but not a king of Prussia among the sovereigns of Europe.

This power, in its developement, retained that kind of disposition which we have, before, attributed generally to all the Protestant states; a very marked public spirit, a fervent patriotism, great reciprocal attachment between the prince and his subjects, a spirit of liberty and of true republicanism, which extends from the throne to the people. It may be added that a great part of the ancient possessions of the clergy is also united to the domains of the crown, and another part is employed in establishments useful to the country, we shall therefore find no difficulty in accounting for the internal strength manifested by Prussia in several trials, and which so effectually seconded the genius of the great Frederick, in the seven years' war. It cannot be questioned that the circumstance of being a Protestant added something to the successes of this prince, while it also diminished the number of his enemies among his co-estates in the empire. The number of those who secretly adhered to the reformation, in Silesia, Bohemia, and other Austrian countries, was great. When the tolerant banners of Prussia appeared, all these sects would be more favourable to them than to the Catholic colours of intolerant Austria.

Since, by a concurrence of many other causes, foreign to the object of this essay, Prussia has attained to the rank of a power of the first order, its sovereigns have replaced the electors of Saxony in the important station of head of the Protestant party in Germany. They have attained a double influence in Europe, that of counterbalancing Austria in the empire, and that of contributing powerfully externally to the support of an equilibrium in the general system of states.

It may be also observed, that the treaties of Augsburg and Munster, while they consolidated the body of the evangelical states in the empire, left, nevertheless, a certain priority and preponderance to the Catholics, as well in the electoral college as in the remainder of the joint concerns.* No Protestant prince has yet been decorated with the imperial crown. Since the religious interest has been, by degrees, replaced by a political interest, the evangelical body might be more aptly called the Prussian party, and the rest the Austrian party; although more than one Catholic prince has found it convenient to join with Prussia, and some Protestant states have also been seen attached to Austria. It is probable that the imperial dignity will continue, for a considerable length of time, and perhaps to its extinction, to be enjoyed by the head of the latter house.

The custom of some German princes of selling their troops to foreign powers, also originated in the time of the wars of the reformation, and of the long intervals of peace which followed them. These troops, raised on a temporary occasion, disciplined, accustomed to live in camps, to plunder, to excesses, became, during peace, exceedingly burthensome to their master and to the country. They were very happy to dispose of them to whoever would pay them, and they even turned this traffic to advantage. Philip II. attacked Holland with German soldiers, and it was with Germans that Holland defended itself. It is notorious that this custom has been since continued to the great disgrace of humanity.

Denmark.

Since the celebrated Margaret, called, before Catharine II. the Semiramis of the North, Denmark has been aggrandized by Norway; and the states of Sweden had also placed the sceptre of their country in her hands. Her successors endeavoured to make this election valid as an hereditary title; which occasioned vigorous wars between the Danish monarchs and the Swedish aristocrasy. The first lost the throne of Sweden by them, and benefited by not having further occasion to waste their strength externally. The clergy and principal nobility of their own states gave them sufficient employment at home. In 1527 they, with their people, adopted the reformation; but it was not completely consolidated, by the wife Christian III., until twelve years after. He was obliged to divide the spoils of the clergy with the great men of his kingdom, and to keep only the smallest share to himself. The income of the prelacies alone were adjudged to the crown, and these were also charged with the expenses of several establishments. Besides the regal dignity remained elective. It required the warlike reign of the enterprising Christian IV.—it required more especially the ascendancy which the order of the citizens began to acquire, to reduce the nobility, and lead things to that state in which Frederick III. found them in 1660, to enable him to render the kingdom hereditary and his authority uncontrolled. The only fundamental law which remained express and untouched was that which established Lutheranism as the predominant religion of the state.† During the thirty years' war the king of Denmark was, for an instant, the Agamemnon of the Protestant army; this was the first attempt made by this government to the southward, in the general affairs of Europe.

Sweden.

The reformation found also an elective crown, and a powerful aristocrasy in Sweden. But Vasa was a conqueror; he had lately raised himself to the throne by a revolution, and delivered his country from the Danish yoke. It was therefore in his power to make a better use of the reformation than his neighbour, Christian, had done. In 1527, he appropriated the greatest part of the possessions of the clergy to his own use, and only allowed small shares to the nobility. His wise and vigorous administration, directed these new riches to the maintenance of the royal authority, and he procured to himself a constitutional grant of the succession.

This power, which is naturally weaker than any other of the great European powers, soon raised itself, however, by the genius of its kings and its ministers, as well as by the benefits of the reformation, to a sort of supremacy in Europe. Its armies saved Protestantism, and, at almost every encounter, beat the imperial armies. She had the glory of presiding at Osnaburgh in the European congress of Westphalia, as France presided at that of Munster. A sum of money was given to her to withdraw her troops from Germany, where they became as burthensome to their friends as they had been to their enemies, and only a part of Pomerania, instead of the whole, which she demanded, with some other small districts in the north of the empire, were ceded to her. By this cession the kings of Sweden have become members of the Germanic body as the king of Denmark is for Holstein, and that of England for Hanover. Since that period exhausted Sweden has constantly declined. Twenty years after the peace of Westphalia, in 1668, notwithstanding the obligations of this country to France its ally, the interest of religion, or perhaps jealousy, induced it to unite with England and Holland, against that power, in the war of Flanders and Franche Comté. Christiana, whose only merit as a queen was that of having protected men of science, and in particular, having honoured our great Descartes, contributed very much to the decay of Sweden. Charles XII. completed its ruin. A gallant and weak queen, a despotic and conquering king, neutralized the advantages which the reformation had procured to this country; if the successors of Gustavus Adolphus, and Oxenstiern had always been worthy of them, the czars, in all probability, would not have built their imperial city on the Neva; they would not have gained the banks of the Baltic; and the aspect of the north, and consequently that of Europe, would, without doubt, have been different from what it is at present. But Sweden shone only for an instant; and, like one of those sudden meteors which just gave a transient splendour to its long nights, it soon disappeared from the political horizon.

Switzerland.

Switzerland had its reformer in the person of Zwingle, a monk, like Luther, and like him, irritated by the opprobrium of the hawkers of indulgences, and who appeared almost at the same instant. Republicans, ardent friends to liberty, it was expected the Swiss would have outstripped all others in the reform; seven cantons, however, remained Catholic; and, what is more remarkable, the cantons most decidedly republicans were of this number. This phenomenon would not be easily explained without a knowledge of the localities. It has already been observed above,* that Catholicism is not, nor can it be everywhere the same, modified as it is in different places by the peculiar spirit and character of each. The Catholicism of the small cantons of Schwitz, Uri, and Underwald, precisely because it was established among these mountaineers, republicans by nature, had taken the forms which suited their character, and was interwoven with their manners. Besides, the inhabitants of these mountains have a lively imagination, on which external objects produce a powerful influence, the indolence of the pastoral life makes religious spectacles and feasts necessary to them. A worship accompanied by many forms and ceremonies would, therefore, please them, in preference to one which is too simple and too sedate. It was here that the founders of the Helvetic liberties resided; and the remembrance of all the events and all the great men of that period, was intimately blended with the Catholic worship, and its ceremonies. It was not obelisks, it was chapels which, in this country, marked the renowned fields of battle, the acts of their ancestors. Who has travelled in Switzerland, and not seen the chapel of William Tell? It was an idolatry, a national fanaticism, which excited this mixture of the worship of liberty with that of religion, in these small cantons.

* Were it only by the clause which provides that if an ecclesiastical prince changes his religion, so far from being enabled to secularize his states, he is declared to have forfeited them.

† M. Spittler formerly professor at Gottingen, and minister of the Duke of Wirtemburgh, has given a very good history of this revolution; it is translated into French, under the inspection of the author, by M. Artaud; and will be published shortly.

* In the first part, at the commencement of the paragraph, Reformation.

Such is their Catholicism at the present day; they have no idea of any other. The abuses of the church were scarcely felt among them. The popes could not exact tribute from these poor mountaineers; and their priests, being the only men a little informed, in their hamlets and towns, had acquired, and still retain to the present day, a great ascendency over the deliberations of the assemblies, and of all their affairs. It may be added, that knowledge had made less progress among them, than among their rich neighbours in the plain; and that having formerly given them, as it were, their liberty, they were not disposed to allow them to prescribe a change in their religion. Other localities kept Lucerne, Fribourg, and Soleure in the Catholic faith. Sanguinary conflicts and a religious civil war, several times suspended, but prolonged at intervals, until the eighteenth century, ensued between the members of this modern Achaia; and a germ of division still remains undestroyed among them.

Spain, the pope, and Austria gave effectual support to the Catholic party. France and England alternately supported the Protestant cantons. Hence the sympathies and antipathies of the different members of the Helvetic confederation to one or other of these powers. The late events have also exhibited an example of the animosities of the small cantons against the French, the ancient protectors of the reformed cantons, and of the attachment of the Bernois to the same French.

Switzerland, employed and weakened by these civil discords, has, since the reformation, lost the little external influence which it had previously had in the affairs of Europe. But its Protestant cantons were in the number of those countries to which the revocation of the edict of Nantes procured the greatest advantages. The refugees flocked there in considerable numbers with their industry and their property.

The high pitch to which the sciences and good manners had reached in these cantons, favoured by a long peace, and that species of inviolability which this respectable confederation so long enjoyed, is well known.

Geneva.

While in this faint outline I have neglected to devote particular articles to considerable states such as Bavaria, for example, it will doubtless appear astonishing that I pause at a simple town, a city of a few thousand inhabitants. But this imperceptible point on the physical map of Europe is of very great importance on that of European morals. It was there that the two Frenchmen, Calvin and Théodore de Bèze, rejected by their country, established a new and powerful focus of religious reform. The first fruit of it was the liberty of Geneva, which expelled its prince bishop, and afterwards governed itself for almost three centuries. It found sufficient resources in the energy of its inhabitants, and sufficient strength in the benefits of the reformation, to support long wars and to defend itself by force against the princes of the house of Savoy, its dangerous neighbours, who had long endeavoured to reduce it under their dominion, and did not definitively acknowledge its independence till towards the middle of the last century. The influence of this small democracy sprung from the reformation; replete with knowledge, patriotism, and activity, its influence, I say, on some of the great states, particularly on France, England, and Russia, is incalculable.

Geneva was the cradle of the religion professed by Henry IV. and which the ambition of the house of Guise, the subtlety of a Medicis, the interest and the secret practices of Rome and Spain, prevented him from carrying with him to the throne of France.

It was to Geneva that all the proscribed English exiles, who were driven from their island by the intolerance of the first Mary, the wife of Philip II. came, to get intoxicated with republicanism and independence. From this focus issued the sects of Presbyterians and Independents who so long agitated Great Britain and conducted the unfortunate Charles I. to the scaffold. In the works of Dr. Swift, there is a sermon which he delivered on the anniversary of the death of this martyr king (for so the English have since named him,) in which he explains, like a man of good information, the progress of this order of events.

Finally, it is well known that a multitude of men of talents have issued from Geneva, who, as writers, as men in office, have, in the most decided manner, influenced the different states of Europe, their political and moral situations, their opinions and their knowledge. To mention Le Fort, the friend and counsellor of Peter I. is to bring to recollection all which one of its citizens has done for the civilization and prosperity of the most extensive empire in existence. Besides the great men which it has formed, Geneva, has, at all times, been visited by the numerous travellers of every country who have come to Italy and Switzerland. It has communicated more or less of its spirit to all those who were calculated to receive it; and from all these considerations, it may be truly said, that this small republic has had as great a share in the destiny, and in the moral and political amelioration of Europe, as many great monarchies.

This is an additional proof of the immense advantage of small states to humanity, and of the use, which, by means of them, is made of the central power of every district of the earth. These proofs are continually renewed in Germany, where we meet with free cities, and principalities, of a moderate extent, all of which have an active, peculiar, and independent existence. Every one is emulous that industry and the arts and sciences should flourish in his small capital. Universities and schools are multiplied, and instruction consequently becomes more general through the nation. If truth is persecuted by fanaticism in any place, it is only necessary to make one step, and it finds a secure asylum on passing the nearest frontier. In a word, every small state of this confederate system feels that it has some consequence in itself, and therefore really possesses that consequence. Each town of a moderate size is not paralyzed by the idea that it is nothing; that at a distance of one or two hundred leagues there is another larger city, which is everything, a gulf in which all its labours are to be absorbed: a city in which all the glory of the empire centres in a single point, out of which there is no prosperity, out of which there is only a political, moral, and literary insulation, through the whole extent of an immense territory.

If Athens, if Delphos, if Corinth, Pisa, Lacedemon, Mytilene, Smyrna, had not enjoyed this peculiar individuality, and if one queen-city had attracted to itself all the glory of Greece, would so many great men and great virtues have blazed forth in every part of it? If the arts, if the muses of Italy, in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, had not perceived its courts and its flourishing republics smiling on them everywhere and at hand: if genius had not been aroused by immediate fame and encouragement at Ferrara, Mantua, Florence, Venice, Guastalla, and Sienna, as well as at Rome and Naples: if, in all Italy, there had been but one centre, one point, one city, would it have become the most classical country of the arts in modern times?

Holland.

Another creation, of more immediate importance to the politics of Europe, and which arose out of the reformation, was the republic of the United Provinces. This new state was a part of the possessions of the house of Austria, and was retained by the Spanish branch, that is to say, by Philip II. after the death of Charles V. Here the same solid foundation of national spirit, liberty, and rectitude prevailed, as in Lower Saxony: it had the same manners, nearly the same language, and the same origin. Before their independence, the Low Countries made part of the empire, and of the circle of Burgundy. The reformation made rapid strides in it. Its mortal enemy, Philip II. endeavoured to stifle it in a country where it was cherished, and opposed force to opinion, without discretion. But opinion is a secret file which wears away the iron that is rubbed against it. The inquisition, that was intended to preserve Holland to Spain and the Catholic faith, only hastened its revolt against both of them. After fifteen years of troubles, resistance, and sufferings, the exasperated Batavians declared themselves free from the yoke of *Philip.

The idea or forming an independent republic does not seem to have occurred to them at first: they only wished to preserve their franchises and privileges. The confederate provinces offered the patronage of their country to several of the neighbouring princes, upon the condition of their ancient capitulations. The duke of Alençon, brother to Henry III. quitted this station from incapacity and want of conduct:

* Some of the wise counsellors of this prince wished him to employ milder and more salutary measures against the Batavians: he might, perhaps, have adopted them but for the opposite and violent advice of Pope Pius V. who also induced him to intrust the expedition to the execrable and ferocious Duke of Alva. It was Clement XI. who, in canonizing Pius V. applauded him for this great zeal in support of the faith. The bull of canonization is dated 22d May, 1712.

Queen Elizabeth refused it through a policy which penetrated beyond the apparent advantage of a day. At length, not knowing who to give themselves to, the Batavians resolved upon being their own masters. Each province formed itself into a republic, and entered into the terms of confederation with the others. The body which resulted from this, was a complicated and uncouth form; but the spirit was good, and its good effects prevailed notwithstanding the faulty machine in which it was enclosed. Men of talents, animated by this spirit, carried the republic to that height of greatness and prosperity to which it is known to have attained. Having to struggle against Spain, which at that time, was the first maritime power, and which brought its fleets to the attack, it was necessary that the new state should also be maritime, to make head against its enemy, and to obtain resources by commerce. The Dutch fleets soon ranked among the first in Europe; the genius of patriotism and liberty wrought the same miracles on the sea as on the soil of Belgium. Thus, it is to the reformation that Holland is, mediately, indebted for this source of power and prosperity. Let us return to what passed in its interior.

Religious enthusiasm had been the principle of the revolution. Can it therefore be thought strange, if, in a new and free state, it should continue to manifest itself, to exercise a powerful influence on the body of the state, and to give rise to a multitude of fanatic and formidable sects? It was not here as in the states of Germany, for example, where the prince had become a Protestant, as well as his subjects, and was enabled to maintain very nearly the old government with the new religion. Here, every one thought all was free, and the theologians acted very important parts. It was from this cause that the bigotry of Protestantism was carried to a greater excess in Holland than in any other country, and, that religious controversies always led to political convulsions, and revolutions in its government, the history of this republic offers many such examples. It is known how much the Prince stadtholders, in order to extend their own authority and lower that of the states, made use of the dissensions between the sect of Arminians and that of the Gomarists. The animosity of Maurice of Orange was carried to such a a pitch that he took advantage of his triumph to bring Barneveld, an old patriot, who had rendered the most signal services to his country, and who supported the party of the states, to the block. These troubles form the ground-work of the internal history of the republic, from the time it has had a settled existence. They originated in the religious opinions: though, it is true, they were afterwards kept alive both by the defects of the constitution itself, and by external causes, the developement of which does not belong to our subject.

England.

Among the passions of Henry VIII., king of England, must be reckoned that which he had for St. Thomas Aquinas. His veneration for this vigorous champion of the Roman orthodoxy was carried so far, that Luther having contradicted St. Thomas with acumen, Henry thought himself bound to enter the lists and defend his master. He therefore wrote a treatise, or assertion of the seven sacraments, against Luther, who admitted of no more than two. The latter treated his new adversary as his equal, and ridiculed him. The king doctor conceived a violent hatred against him. The Pope, who perhaps laughed as much at the book as Luther did, gave its author all the consolation he was able, and conferred on him the title of defender of the faith. Six years had not elapsed when Henry, unfaithful to the Pope, separated with his kingdom from the holy see, preserving however, his title of defender of the faith, which his successors still retain. This first step was the foundation of a series of revolutions and evils, which have scarcely ceased, at this time, to distract the three kingdoms: for the late revolts in Ireland were also a consequence of it. The reformation has not produced such extravagant and contradictory effects in any other country. The insulated situation of Great Britain, as well as the saturnine and invincible character of its inhabitants, contributed to them. The neighbouring nations were unable to give effective assistance to either party, and the internal activity could not act externally. When a conflagration takes place in a building so inaccessible, it must burn within it, and the flame only ceases when it cannot find aliment. Other causes have also contributed to these vigorous and long discords in the English church, and it is necessary to point them out.

In the first place, Henry did not intend to become a Protestant; he only wanted to espouse the beautiful Anne Boleyn. But to accomplish this the pope's consent to the divorce of Henry from his first wife, sister to the emperor Charles V. was necessary. The pope, who, in other circumstances, would doubtless have been more complaisant, decided in favour of him, who, of the two princes, appeared the most formidable, and refused his consent to the divorce. Henry, enraged that the pope should dare to thwart his love, declared himself head of the church of England, and prohibited all intercourse with Rome; he was excommunicated, by way of reprisal. But he hated Luther at least as much as the pope; and during his reign, it was as dangerous to pass for a Protestant as for a Catholic. He gave an episcopal constitution to the church, in which, with little more exception than the monks, whose possessions he seized, the ancient edifice of the hierarchy remained almost entire, and, in which he, very closely and very despotically acted the part of the sovereign pontiff. This was doing either too much or too little. The universal crisis did not admit of half measures. The German reform had found many partizans in England, and a considerable number of minds were devoted to it. The greater part of them were discontented to find their attempt frustrated, and made very little difference between the Catholics and the Episcopalians. The signal of rebellion against Rome was given; it was easy to foresee that it would not willingly stop half way. This was the first cause of the troubles. The determined Protestants, as well as the Catholics, became sworn enemies to the Episcopalians, and to the government which supported them.

Second cause. Far from a constant perseverance in this half reformation of Henry VIII., nothing was seen in the succeeding reigns but retractions and sudden and violent transitions from Protestantism to Papism and from Papism to Episcopacy. After Edward VI., whose reign was too short, had made a step towards the reformation, followed the reign of the Catholic and bigoted Mary, daughter of the princess who had been repudiated by Henry, brought up in Spain, under the eye of her mother, in hatred to Protestantism and Episcopacy. She had scarcely ascended the throne when she married her relation, the sanguinary Philip, afterwards king of Spain. All that had been done by Henry VIII. and Edward VI. was overturned; the Protestants and Episcopalians were displaced, expelled, persecuted and inhumanly massacred. Four bishops, among whom was the virtuous patriot Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, were burnt alive. Every place was filled with the most intolerant Catholics. The animosity of the different parties was carried to its utmost pitch. A reign of five years, from 1553 to 1558 was sufficient for Mary and her popish theologians to disperse the venom of civil wars, and the most implacable hatreds, over unhappy England. The Protestants, persecuted by her, fled in multitudes to Germany, Switzerland, and more particularly to Geneva, from whence they afterwards carried back the republican ideas of the Anabaptists and Calvanists which, combined with the acrimony of exile, rendered the explosion so fatal to their country.

If Henry VIII. had prudently adopted Luther's reform, and his successors had persisted in it, the island would probably have remained as tranquil as Sweden and Denmark did in the end. Elizabeth succeeded Mary, and re-established the reform, retaining the episcopacy. The new ecclesiastical system was published in London, by a national council, in 1563, and called the act of uniformity. It was intended to bring all parties to an union by its means; but the time had passed; the minds of men had become too ulcerated, their heads too eccentric. The separation of Nonconformists, Puritans, and Presbyterians, from the Episcopal Church, became more obvious and more injurious. To complete the confusion, the Irish had remained Catholics. It was here that Philip of Spain, enraged against Elizabeth, who had refused him her hand, and supported his rebellious subjects in the Low Countries, employed his intrigues, scattered gold, and endeavoured to stir up a revolt; he was seconded by Rome, France, and Mary, Queen of Scotland, who afterwards perished by the axe of the executioner, in the hands of her rival.

The long war, replete with animosity, which from that time raged furiously between England and Spain, rendered the first of these powers ambitious of ravishing all its advantages from her adversary, and of rivalling it in all points. The English marine takes date from this period of inimical emulation. Subsequent to the discovery of America, Spain rode triumphant on the seas, which she covered with her vessels. Elizabeth constructed fleets, formed sailors, and endeavoured to make head against Philip on this element. The latter, who believed himself to be king of England, because the pope had conferred its crown upon him, and Elizabeth, being excommunicated and a heretic, could no longer possess it, prepared a fleet, which still retains the nickname of invincible, but which was destroyed by the English and the winds, for the conquest of his kingdom. Thus, with an action of such splendour, began the marine of England; and it is with reason that its foundation, as well as that of the Dutch marine, is attributed to the events produced by the reformation, while the spoils of the clergy assisted both governments in this expensive undertaking.

To the immortal Elizabeth succeeded James I. king of Scotland, an enemy to the Presbyterians, who predominated in that kingdom, and revolted against him, for having attempted to put them on the footing of the Episcopal Church. His reign is a tissue of erroneous measures, which displeased all parties. He married his son to a Catholic princess of the house of France, after having offended the nation by a project of marriage between the same son and a Spanish princess. His faults prepared all the misfortunes of the reign of Charles I. When the latter came to the throne, every disposable part of the possessions of the clergy had been lavished in the preceding reigns, either on favourites or enemies of the throne, whose minds it had been employed in seducing and retaining; or applied to the expenses of the new marine, or the wars with Spain. The unfortunate Charles found himself without resources, and constrained incessantly to demand imposts from a lower house, which, having become almost wholly Presbyterian, insolently refused them, or shackled him with intolerable conditions, to obtain them. Hence his necessity for having recourse to every illegal method of establishing new levies. Favourable to the Catholics, like his father, and consequently, a greater friend to the Episcopalians than to the Presbyterians, he endeavoured to complete the work of James, by establishing Episcopacy in Scotland. By this step, he drove the inhabitants of that kingdom into open rebellion, and he made war upon his subjects of Scotland with an army of English, who were very nearly as little attached to him; leaving behind him, in London, a parliament as greatly to be dreaded by him as the Scotch convention. From this religious and political fermentation, arose a powerful sect of Independents, who made themselves masters of the commons, expelled the lords from the upper house, and began by compelling the unfortunate Charles, already at his last resource, to give up his faithful minister Strafford, to the executioner. The new parliament declared itself exempt from the royal prorogation; deposed and persecuted the Episcopalians, disposed of the places, civil, military, and ecclesiastical, to the most violent, to men without conduct, without shame, and, frequently, of the lowest class of the people; they secretly excited the rebels of Ireland, and, at the same time, refused the king every means of reducing them; and when, at length, exhausting his last resources, Charles assembled an army to give them battle, the Independents had the address to bring his army over to oppose the unfortunate king. Abandoned by it, he threw himself into the hands of the Scotch, who delivered him up to the English. The weak party of the royalists took up arms in vain. Cromwell subdued them, and reigned more despotically than any monarch would have dared to do; and, as the parliament, already mutilated by him, did not conduct itself to his liking, he dissolved, and dismissed them. The crowned head fell upon the scaffold. The implacable and inveterate hatred which had been restrained by the soldiers of the protector, while he lived, broke out during the anarchy which succeeded his reign. The most discordant political opinions were united with the most extravagant and religious opinions. Massacres, executions, and civil war, desolated the face of three kingdoms. From having abused every religious principle, and carried them to excess, they all fell indiscriminately into discredit; atheism, libertinism, and a contempt for every law, divine or human, succeeded them. In this state of things Charles II. ascended the throne; favoured Catholicism again in secret, and Episcopacy openly; married a Catholic princess, who drew a multitude of foreigners of this sect into the kingdom; and made war upon Protestant Holland, the ancient ally of England.

At each of these changes, so sudden and so numerous, and which were the principal source of all the misfortunes of England, those who adhered to the oppressed party, took refuge in vast numbers beyond the seas; the Protestants, as has been said, in Germany, Holland, Switzerland, and America; the Catholics, in France and Italy, where their fanaticism acquired new strength, and whither they were followed by the Episcopalians, who, in that situation, generally became Catholics. In fact, it was there that James II. who succeeded Charles II. became so. His impolitic attempts to establish Popery in England only served to carry the animosity and confusion to its height; he lost his crown, and died in exile. His daughter Mary, a true Protestant, and his son-in-law, William of Orange, were called by the nation to fill the throne. Their wisdom began to still this long tempest. It was a long time before the roaring of the waves ceased; but a solemn act of succession having excluded the Catholic princes, the Protestant house of Hanover came to the throne of England; and by a mild and uniform government, has gradually calmed the agitation of the ancient parties.

Now when this terrible crisis is appeased, what remains to the nation from it? The energy arising from long civil commotions; the melancholy produced by the recollection of them; the profound love of liberty, for which so much blood has been shed: the tendency to mediation left by religious exaltation; and the toleration of all opinions, which is the natural successor of the intoxication of fanaticism.

One great error in the English monarchs, was the belief that the episcopal system was a support to the throne; a feeble prop, which so easily carried with it, in its fall, the throne which depended upon it, and of which it could not in any case retard the ruin. In the dark period which preceded Luther, the support of the clergy was of importance to princes; but since his appearance, the church, protected in its external government by the civil power, should limit its activity to the simple encouragement of good morals in the state, through the influence of religion.

The reformation, which has been a benefit to other countries, was the most grievous of scourges to unfortunate Ireland. Treated as a conquered people, and for a long time at the discretion of the English, the Irish remained obstinately Catholic, precisely because their oppressors wanted them to be Protestant. Their chains became consequently heavier: their island was filled with rapacious English, who possessed themselves of almost all the estates. The despair of these irritated men, at length broke out with fury in 1641. The consequence was a massacre through the island, of upwards of one hundred thousand Protestants. Cromwell afterwards took vengeance on them, and gave nearly the whole of Ireland to his soldiers. William III. founded a legal and constitutional tyranny there. The Catholics were deprived of civil life, of property, of instruction itself; it was his pleasure to convert them into hordes of rude, barbarous beggars; and they have revenged themselves like barbarians whenever an opportunity has offered. Such resentments last, and are transmitted to remote generations. During the last war, the Irish gave many strong proofs that several reigns of toleance had not been able effectually to eradicate their strong animosity against the English.

United States of America.

It is sufficient to name this new state, which is wholly European upon the soil of America, to bring to mind that it was created by the partisans of reform and of liberty, flying from the oppression and intolerance of parties. If the English emigrants who had sought shelter on the continent of Europe, during the course of the troubles which have been spoken of, brought back with them the seeds of discord and of hatred, those who took refuge in the solitudes of Pennsylvania, acquired peace and toleration there. They founded Philadelphia, the city of brothers; certainly the most pleasing name that ever was borne by the residence of man. Escaped from the tempests to this distant coast, restored to nature and the primitive destination of the human race, these colonists, who had taken their knowledge with them, had leisure to reflect on the origin and rights of societies; on the respective duties of governments and nations. Having besides an entirely new political body to organize, the elements of legislation must necessarily engage their attention first. We have consequently received from thence some admirable precepts, and still more admirable examples. It is known that after having returned under the dominion of the mother country, this association of free and energetic men, of almost all countries, afterwards determined to resume the rights of governing themselves. Louis XVI. seconded them in this enterprise, and sent an army thither. The French who composed it came as friends among these republicans, were admitted into their confidence, and, for the first time, saw this spectacle to them so surprising, of simplicity of manners, of evangelical peace, among men who supported their rights. Reflection arose within them; they compared the principles and the government of their own country, with what they observed among the descendants of Penn, and it is notorious how eminently these Frenchmen, who were thus made soldiers of liberty by a monarch, showed themselves to be so in effect, during the first years of the revolution. Among the great number of proximate and remote causes which contributed to it, the American republic, and the reformation from which it sprang, must not be forgotten.

This state, still weak, at a distance from Europe, has not hitherto had much direct influence, on the political system. But who can calculate that which it may one day acquire on the colonial and commercial system so important to Europe? Who can foretell all that may result in the two worlds, from the seductive example of the independence conquered by the Americans? what new position would the world assume, if this example was followed? and without doubt it will be in the end. Thus two Saxon monks will have changed the face of the globe. The Dominican Tetzel, came impudently to preach indulgences at the gates of Wittemberg; the open and vehement Luther was indignant at it; he raised his voice against the indulgences, and all Europe was affected, put into a ferment, and inflamed. A new order of things was the result; powerful republics were founded. Their principles, still more powerful than their arms, were introduced into all nations. Hence arose great revolutions, and those which may yet arise are, doubtless, incalculable.

II. STATES, THE GOVERNMENTS OF WHICH DID NOT EMBRACE THE REFORM.

Spain.

THIS country, governed by one of the branches of the house of Austria, had a principal share in the party opposed to the reformation. The mortal wars which its kings carried on, first against Holland, then against England, and afterwards against both at the same time, was pernicious to it. Besides exhausting it of men and money, these two rival powers, being obliged to provide themselves with arms, similar to those made use of by Spain, raised a marine, which soon crushed hers. From that time a considerable portion of the sources of its prosperity were dried up. A rivalry once established in this manner between Spain and England, necessarily obliged Portugal, in the end, to throw itself into the arms of the latter power; the right of patronage thus acquired by England still exists, and procures it great commercial advantages.

The terrible struggle, which Spain supported externally, could not however, be continued without exactions and rigorous proceedings at home. The people, wearied and indignant, prepared to repel oppression. However ignorant the Spaniards might have been, the double example of the Bohemians, who had conquered their religious liberty, and of the Dutch, who had conquered their political liberty, from the despotic house of Austria, was so well known to them, and so seducing, as to induce them to follow it. Hence arose the revolts of Andalusia, of Catalonia, of Portugal, and of the Italian states. Portugal was strong enough under its new kings to maintain its independence. But what was the consequence to the other revolted provinces, to Catalonia in particular, which cost a war of nineteen years to reduce it? They lost all their rights and privileges by it, and were treated as conquered countries. The authority of the kings of Spain was in reality increased and strengthened at the termination of this crisis; the numerous armies which returned into the interior, at the peace, served to complete the subjugation of the nation. It must, however, be observed, that these internal revolts, and the war of Catalonia, compelled Spain to agree to very hard conditions as the price of peace. She became sooner disposed to acknowledge the republic of tho United Provinces, and was obliged to yield Rousillon, Perpignan, Conflans, and a considerable part of the Low Countries to France, and the important island of Jamaica to England.

In other respects, the religious reformation had little or no effect in Spain. Its geographical position, and, still more, its language being different from the other nations of Europe, were obstacles to it. At that period the inquisition, introduced into the kingdom by Ferdinand, was more strictly on its guard than ever; and there is no doubt but many of the cruelties then exercised by it, resulted from the terror inspired by the noise of the storm which grumbled at a distance. Nevertheless the general influence of the reformation and the progress of knowledge on the spirit of humanity, has already terminated in the extinction of the inquisition itself. Now, when perhaps there are more heretics and unbelievers in Spain than at any former period, there are also fewer religious executions. Great reforms seem to be in preparation there; and the kings of French origin who are placed on the throne, act differently towards the church than Philip II. did.

France.

While the reform spoke German, it made but few proselytes in France: when the French-Swiss of the canton of Berne, when Calvin, lent it their organs to enable it to explain itself in French, it penetrated into every part of the kingdom, and made itself known, particularly under the new form it had taken at Geneva. The nation was too enlightened, too vivacious for the new ideas to be retarded in their progress. From the steps of the throne to the most remote cottages, the doctrines of the reformers found numerous partisans, and the Roman communion would doubtless have been overturned in France, if the monarch had consented to it. All the weak minds, who compose the multitude, and the great majority of the people, would have been drawn into it. The Catholics who chose to continue so, would have retained the free exercise of their worship; the country would not have been torn by a long civil war; an edict of Nantes would not have been revoked; the immense force which, at that time, might have been freely displayed by France, would, without difficulty, and at its pleasure, have stopped the commotions of Germany and England; France would have remained tranquil within; and, without, would have been tho arbiter of Europe.

Francis I. remained a Catholic; something has been said of the reasons which determined him to act thus.[*] From that time he pretended to show his consequence, and to eradicate the roots of the heresy. He therefore, without pity, burned and massacred those of his subjects who openly embraced the reform. Externally, he supported it, and formed alliance with the princes of Germany. This double and inconsistent conduct of the French government deprived it of the best part of its strength, and obstructed its operations. Within, it was requisite to guard against the reformed; these refused their assistance, or served with regret, and preferred deserting, emigrating, and combating with their brethren of Germany, Switzerland, or Holland, to remaining exposed to punishment, while fighting on the side of their persecutors. Hence, it became impossible for France to acquire all the preponderance which would have been her portion in another state of things.

It has become a trite axiom, that the blood of martyrs extends a rising sect. Henry II. showed himself still more intolerant than his father, and the reformed entered into a closer connection with each other for their mutual support, and to prevent their total ruin. Thus they began to raise a formidable opposition in the kingdom, which raged during the sanguinary course of the three succeeding reigns. Tho throne ceased to be the tribunal of justice and of peace to tho people; the king to be a father to his subjects. France mangled its own bosom, and the aggression which was the child of authority, compelled the unfortunate objects of its oppression to become rebels. The horrible scenes of Saint Bartholomew will for ever be an afflicting and irrevocable proof of the perfidy and implacable hatred which actuated tho court in its conduct towards the Protestants. Thus the latter acquired the form of a political party; princes, nobles were at their head; they had armies, allies, posts in the kingdom. The history of the intestine wars, which, on this occasion, desolated France from 1562 to 1598, when the edict of Nantes put an end to them, is too well known for it to be necessary to give even a sketch of them here.

But animosities and commotions, of such violence, do not take place without leaving deep traces in the constitution of the government, as well as in the character of the nation; hence they determine, for a length of time, the mode of existence of the latter, and its political situation. Let us endeavour to show the principal result of the religious troubles in France, at the end of the sixteenth century, both with respect to the government, and to the political character of the nation.

The most fortunate event that can happen to a monarch whose authority in his states is limited by the power of his nobles, or of any civil corporation whatever, is that which produces a marked opposition, an open rebellion, which he may combat and reduce by force of arms. At this moment of general dread and submission, everything is allowed to him; no one dares to urge rights or privileges, and the prince has an open field to render his power more absolute in future. History furnishes frequent examples of similar issues to revolts and commotions in states. Without doubt this is not always the case, and the prince, if, on the contrary, he is obliged to compound, loses a part of his authority, or is wholly deprived of it. We have seen the house of Austria in these two different situations, at the same time, in the thirty years' war; having the worst with the German princes whom it hoped to reduce to vassallage, and the upper hand in its states, particularly those of Hungary and Bohemia, where it established an unlimited and hereditary monarchy. But that which succeeded so badly with the Emperors in respect of the German Protestant princes had the most happy issue with the kings of France against the reformed party. The result of it was a great consolidation and extension of the regal power. At the moment when it became unlimited, and when the strength of government was the most energetic, if France had had a Louis XI. or a Philip II. of Spain, on the throne, with what despotism might not our annals have been stained? But at that period Providence placed a Henry IV. on it, who, having so many outrages to avenge, so many crimes to punish, thought only of burying all animosity in oblivion, of healing all wounds. Then, which is very rare in the government of nations, absolute power was employed only in promoting the prosperity of the state, and the felicity of every individual. The Catholic religion remained dominant: but the edict of Nantes effaced intolerance, and soothed the irritation of the conquered party, to whom liberty of conscience, and a political existence were secured.

[*] At the end of that article of this section, intituled, First Point of View. Internal situation of States.

These wise dispositions were satisfactory to good sense and equity; they were not enough for fanaticism; it made several attempts on the life of the saviour of France, and, at length, succeeded in assassinating him. From this day of mourning (May 14th 1610) the Protestant party, alarmed, with justice at the intrigues of the new court, and at the offensive steps taken against it, revolted again, took up arms, and prepared for the defence of its rights. The impartiality of history cannot blame this conduct; but neither can it blame that of Richelieu, in not suffering an armed faction, which formed a state within a state, which called in foreigners, frequently thwarted the best projects of the administration, and incessantly threatened the existence of the government. In the existing situation of things, he was obliged to oppose them; his success is known, as well as the new increase which the royal authority obtained from his victories. The legal despotism of the three subsequent reigns, which terminated in the terrible catastrophe of the last revolution, may be attributed to the definitive reduction of the religious opposition under Louis XIII.

But though the government succeeded in rendering its authority absolute, the nation, nevertheless, retained a ferment, a principle of irritation, resistance, and contradiction, which was manifested here and there against the arrangements which emanated from the throne. From the edict of Nantes to the period which preceded its revocation, when the open violation of it began to be manifested, the parliaments had been partly composed of Huguenots. During this period, it was natural that these bodies should show themselves refractory, and be animated with a certain spirit of republicanism and opposition to the court. When the Huguenots were expelled, this spirit did not go with them; the parliaments were proud of their influence, and of the essay which they had sometimes made of their strength. This was not the only cause of the ulterior conduct of the parliaments; but it contributed greatly to it. It was therefore in them that the spirit of independence remaining in the nation took refuge, and there it was found in 1788, when the exhausted finances, an effeminate court, the principles of republican liberty propagated by some writers from the books of the English and other Protestants, or brought from Pennsylvania by the French army; in short, when a thousand circumstances gave it the impulse it then took, and which was so rapidly communinated to the whole nation. It is known what influence was produced on the general revolt by the old resentments of the Huguenot party, which were far from being extinguished, and which had often been too wantonly envenomed before the reign of Louis XVI.

In fact, Richelieu only wished to subdue the dissidents, not to annihilate them. The peace of Rochelle, in 1629, had left them some privileges, with the free exercise of their religion. From a contempt of the royal word, all these promises were soon violated. Secret and open persecutions increased from day to day, until the formal revocation of the edict of Nantes gave them free vent; a deplorable epocha, which reduced a multitude of families to beggary, gave rise to the emigration of the best and the most industrious citizens, whose descendants are still to be met with in every Protestant state in Europe, where they have carried prosperity to the prejudice of their own unjust country. Such of these unfortunate people as remained in France, lost all civil existence, were pursued without remission, without pity, and like wild beasts; their blood frequently streamed under the steel of the executioner, or of the soldiery. Such treatment made a deep impression on men's hearts, and indignation was propagated from father to son.* This last explosion of popish intolerance at length ceased. The unfortunate Louis XVI. who had not been rendered inhuman by a great share of Catholicism, laboured to heal all these wounds,† when the storm arose, of which he was the most illustrious victim. Since religion has become tolerant and the friend of liberty, in France, the dissidents of this country have rebuilt their peaceful temples, and enjoy the right of professing the gospel in their own way. By this wise measure, if it is well adhered to, the new government will for ever eradicate the tares of religion, the most fatal sources of discord, from the nation.

Italy.

We have already noticed the reasons which rendered a religious reform impracticable in Italy. We may also add the vicinity of the holy see; the interest of all the small Italian states to be on good terms with it; and, more especially, the dread of the imperial arms, which would, instantly, and without a possibility of resistance, have sacked the first state which should have dared to show itself favourable to Luther. Besides, the elegant Italian considered these people of the north with whom the reformation was effected, as little better than barbarians. The most enlightened of them applauded it in secret; more than one prince rejoiced to see the Pope humbled; but none of them durst risk appearing openly. Those who took a liking to the reform, went into Switzerland, or into other countries, where they might adopt it at ease, like the two Socini, natives of Sienna. Italy, which had already lost so great a part of its commercial importance, by the discovery of America, and of the Cape of Good Hope, wholly lost that by the reformation which the capital of the church gave it. The first of these events had deprived it of its commerce in spices, and the other productions of the east; the second took from it, in part, that of indulgences and of benefices, and dried up several of the sources of its riches. The arts of painting and of music, attached to this enchanting soil, continued to flourish there; but in true civilization, and the superior cultivation of the understanding, its people remained generally behind the other European nations. The events which have since agitated Italy, and even those which have changed its aspect, depend very little, if at all, upon the influence of the reformation.

Poland.

The vicinity of Bohemia and Germany, and the Latin generally spoken in Poland, gave the reformation an easy access into that country. There it made rapid and daring strides during the last half of the sixteenth century. The lax police of the small towns, and of the flat country, where every magnate, every individual lord, claimed a sort of sovereignty, made this country the refuge of the most audacious sectaries, who were not suffered even in the Protestant states. They came hither in crowds from Moravia, Silesia, Bohemia, Sweden, Germany, and even from Switzerland. The two Socini, uncle and nephew, but particularly the latter, made a great number of proselytes here, and founded the sect which bears their name; a sect which has spread very much in Poland, the principal tenet of which is to honour J. C. as a sage sent by God, but not as one of the persons of the Divinity itself. All these different sects, which, in Poland, experienced neither assent nor opposition from the central government, could not, at first, on account of this toleration, acquire the life, the importance, and the developement which they acquired elsewhere: they remained individual opinions among the nobles, and did not produce any beneficial fermentation among a people composed of ignorant serfs. In principle, everything was limited to the disputes of theologians with each other, and to the name of dissidents, given generally to all who were not Catholics. But when Charles XII. undertook the conquest of Poland, and made a few partisans there, although perhaps the smallest number of these were dissidents, still, the king of Sweden being a Lutheran, the suspicions of the Catholics turned to that sect, their hatred was kindled, and the dissidents from thence forward became a political party, obliged to take arms in its own defence, and for the support of its rights. Dissident and partisan of Sweden became synonymous. This event soon produced discord in a country the constitution of which exposed it too much to the animosity of factions, and in which it was not forgotten that Gustavus Adolphus had been the hero of the reform. When Charles XII., the promoter of these new divisions, was conquered and weakened, the Catholics became persecutors, and the dissidents were oppressed. The diet of 1717 also began to deprive them of their civil rights. Hence the acrimony of the two parties could not be assuaged, even when the idea of a Swedish faction had ceased. To crush the dissidents, became a maxim of the government and of the Catholic party. The Jesuits were principally employed for this purpose, and acquitted themselves with a method and a connected system which does honour to their sagacity. Thus at a period when the religious troubles of all Europe had ceased they began in wretched Poland. Its neighbours had long been accustomed to interfere in its domestic concerns. The advantages which her policy might derive from these divisions among the Poles did not escape the penetrating eye of the great Catharine, when she came to the throne of Russia. In 1761 and 1766, she declared herself protectress of the dissidents. In 1768, a Russian minister and Russian soldiers gave laws to the diet, and arrested several of its principal members. The Catholics, in despair, formed a confederation at Bar. They applied to the Turks and French for assistance. Only the first appeared to wage an unfortunate war against Russia. The French contented themselves with sending some officers to the confederates, who prosecuted the civil war they had commenced with fury. At length Russia, which had brought Prussia and Austria into its views, proceeded to a first partition of Poland, which was followed by a second, and shortly, as is known, by a third, which definitively erased this country from the list of European states. The sanguinary expedition which led to this last catastrophe recalls to mind the time when the right of war consisted in the annihilation and general massacre of the conquered; it is a worthy termination to the history of a society wherein civil wars, intestine convulsions, and the delirium of political and religious factions, were the ordinary scenes which each generation saw renewed.

* Should it not be permitted here to consider the punishment of Calas as one of those events, which, from the notoriety given to it by Voltaire, and from the animated writings he published on the occasion, contributed the most to sour all minds against the fanatacism of Catholic priests, and against the authority which supported them?

† It will be recollected that the king did not pay any attention to the intolerant Memoire de l'Assemblee generale du clerge, in 1780, against the reformed.

Russia.

The lion's share which Russia obtained from Poland is the most important political event by which the influence of the reformation and of the religious troubles in Europe was felt in this country. We must, however, take into the account some of the ideas of administration, and government which Peter I. acquired in Holland and England; more particularly, it must not be forgotten that his genius was roused and his mind enlightened by a child of the reform, the Genevese Le Fort, who may, in fact, be considered as the real legislator of Russia. Besides, at the time of the reformation, this empire being within the pale of the Greek church, took no part in the dissentions of the western church. But Peter I. having seen what was passing among the Protestant princes, at his return, effected a reform in the Russian church, of which he declared himself the supreme head, withdrawing his obedience from the patriarch of Constantinople, as the kings of England had separated from Rome. Perhaps it may also be necessary to consider the influence which the protestant and liberal education of the young princess of Zerbst, at the court of Brunswick, may have had on the ever memorable reign of this princess, under the name of Catharine II. The toleration of the czars drew colonies of sectaries into many parts of the vast empire of Russia, as well from our southern countries, as from Poland, Germany, and Holland. The Anabaptists, and the Moravian brethren, have several establishments there. There are also propagated the sects of Ascetic Christians, who lead a sort of conventual life, under the name of Theodosians, Phillipons, and Raskolnicks, and who have all the enthusiasm and fervour of the ancient Cenobites. Some Dutchmen had also established several flourishing colonies on the banks of the Wolga, in the early part of the reign of Catharine II. The brigand Pugatschef soon afterwards exterminated them.

SECOND POINT OF VIEW.

External and Respective Situation of the States of Europe with each other.—System of Equilibrium.

Before the fifth century of our era, the greatest part of Europe was Roman, and consequently subjected to a certain uniformity of action. What was not Roman endeavoured to maintain its independence against the common enemy of all nations, and to this was confined all the political system of that age. When the various nations of the north and north-east invaded the south and south-west, a chaos which lasted several centuries confounded the whole of Europe. The wandering hordes of new conquerors founded empires of a day, which were quickly destroyed by new hordes who drove the first farther on. By degrees, however, these irregular oscillations slackened; dominations were settled; and groups of small states were established on the soil of the ancient divisions of Europe. In Germany, Gaul, Italy, Iberia and England, these species of confederations were formed, the limits and constitution of which varied often, and, in which the right of the strongest was almost the only public right. This new state was but one step towards another, better regulated. The leaders of these anarchial aggregates, in which every possessor of a fief set up for a sovereign, at length strengthened their paramount authority, reduced a number of small princes to the condition of subjects, and thus founded durable powers, monarchies, and empires. But during the infancy of this new order, the confusion and anarchy were still great. The Gothic kings of Spain, contended with the Moorish kings, who had come from Africa; the kings of France fought against the kings of England, who had invaded a part of their provinces, against the dukes of Brittany, Burgundy, Lorraine, and others; Italy was the prey of eternal invasions; of conquests followed by defeats: of a flux and reflux of armies which succeeded each other. Hungary was contended for by the Mussulmen and the Imperialists; Germany saw civil wars incessantly arising, without object and without end, between its different princes. There were, therefore, as many political systems in Europe, as groups of states within the limits of each country; and in each of these systems ignorance and disorder generally reigned. The interest of the moment, or the local interest, determined everything; each one thought only of his own danger, or his own design; their ill-arranged alliances were of short duration; the attention of their statesmen seldom passed the boundaries of one country; Hungary was nothing to England, Sweden was nothing to Spain; the political bodies had not acquired that universal contact which now makes a confederation of states in Europe, already embracing almost all the old and the new world. It is true, momentary alliances were formerly entered into; but they were mostly without consistence, without any fixed and durable plan. To be convinced of this, we need only attend to the history of the greater part of these alliances; that for example, of the absurd and ridiculous league of Cambray, of which our guileless Louis XII. was the dupe. It must however be acknowledged that the multiplicity of negotiations, of transient leagues of this period, exposed the necessity, which began to be generally felt, of a union, a reciprocal support, a stability of principles. The partial systems had nearly found their centres of gravity; that of the total system was to be sought.

It has been already said that the crusades had, for the first time, accustomed the western nations to a general union, a sort of European fraternity. Catholicism produced this good effect for a continuance. The pontifical monarchy taught princes and nations to consider themselves as compatriots, being all equally subjects of Rome. This centre of unity was, for some centuries, a real benefit to the human race. But it derived its power from opinion, and from the acquiescence of princes. But from the time when abuses of too great magnitude had disgusted opinion; when princes had humbled popes; when a long schism had offered to undirected Christianity the spectacle of several popes at once, who claimed the same power, and, of councils, which in their turn, aspired to be superior to all these pontiffs, this centre of unity lost its attractive force, and the general system, which was insensibly detaching itself from it, was menanced with falling again into a chaos. Masses, however, had been formed, sufficiently powerful to become centres of action in a new order. Austria, which then predominated, France, England, and Spain had acquired great internal consistence; these powerful bodies were in presence of each other, and it required only one decisive occurrence to bring them into contact, to render them rivals or friends; in a word, to connect them closely. This event was the reformation, and the wars to which it gave rise.*

The new interests to both princes and nation, produced in men's minds by this religious reformation, became a general concern of Christianity in the aggregate, and no longer depended on the localities of any country in particular, but exceeding them all in importance. States which had scarcely existed to each other, then began to feel a sympathy which led to a union. France formed an alliance with Sweden; England with Holland; Bavaria with Spain. Their views, being enlarged, enlarged also their foresight, and gave birth to precautions. Their interest having become common, required common measures. The designs of the house of Austria were discovered and openly resisted. To find a counterpoise which could balance this ambitious power, and prevent it from rising at pleasure, became an affair of the utmost importance to the newly coalesced Europe. Hence the fruitful idea of an equilibrium between the European powers; an idea which was the soul of the negotiations in Westphalia, and has become a principal consideration in all the public affairs of Europe, since the treaty which was the result of it.

Austria and the Catholic states were then placed in one scale, and, in the other, all the powers which had fought for the reform, including also France. The principle of the European equilibrium was therefore, in reality, only the opposition of the Catholic party and the reformed party. New circumstances soon supervened, which gave it a totally different aspect; but, in general, it may be considered as the division of the political bodies of Europe into two groups, nearly equal in strength, and in each of which sometimes one and sometimes another of the powers bears the principal sway.

Before the states of Europe entered into an aggregate system of connection, Italy and Germany had, for a long time, formed individual systems, or confederations, in which the common policy of each of the states endeavoured to maintain a certain equilibrium, and to restrain one party by another. It is possible that this partial equilibrium may have been the type from which the idea of a general equilibrium was formed: but how much more extensive and accurate were the views which flowed from this! Politics, which, in Italy especially, had hitherto been a tissue of low craft, petty perfidies, intrigues, cruelties, and meannesses, became more expanded and more liberal; its principles were more evident, and better known: the greater part of the powerful governments who took part in negotiations by their ministers, mutually enlightened each other. Among these governments, some were animated by frankness and good faith: the mean Italian spirit was gradually banished from cabinets. There is no doubt but a little knavery still enters into politics, and that deceit is practised here and there; but reciprocal deceit is neither so easy, nor even so necessary as formerly. Since the long and universal war in which every power was involved by the reformation, it has been found that true politics consisted in real strength; and that this had its origin in the prosperity of the state, in commerce, a good public spirit, and the attachment of the citizens to the government. The strength and resources of each state were known to all the others. Statistics renders this knowledge more and more exact, and mutual imposition is now scarcely practicable. Every one feels that it is necessary to protect his ally against inimical enterprises; that the weak must be protected against the powerful, who would become too much so by aggrandizement. An exclusive egotism has therefore ceased to be the dominant spirit of European politics: the state which aims at raising itself is watched and repressed; that which is on the point of falling is supported: the disproportionate elevation of any power only tightens the bonds which unite the others. Even the smallest states have acquired a real importance in this system. Precaution and good will, externally; within, the developement of the total strength by a good administration: such is, in general, the new tendency which politics have taken since the great conflict produced by the reformation.

First period of the equilibrium of Europe, from 1520 to 1556.

Charles V. and Francis I. were the two principal actors in the events of this period. The colossal increase of the Austrian power was the first cause which showed other states the necessity of a closer alliance among them. From thenceforward the situation of France was fixed, and, from the nature of things, its monarch became the most formidable rival to Charles. But it was not easy to bring about an alliance of interested states, and to make this confederation act with the requisite effect and energy. The reformation came and supplied the means; and, by its assistance, the European opposition was organized with facility. Henry VIII., who might have held an honourable rank in it, drew back; he dreaded appearing subordinate to Francis I., and at length was too much engaged with his mistresses and theology. In revenge, France introduced the Ottoman power into the new system. France, Turkey, and the Protestant princes of the north, were the first united mass destined to be a counterpoise to German Austria, Spain, and Burgundy. These two masses, formed themselves, one around the Protestant party, and the other around the Catholic party, in Germany. It was generally felt that the equilibrium in the empire would decide that of the rest of Europe; and, that if Charles V. triumphed over the Protestant princes, his power would become irresistible. Henry II., who succeeded Francis I., formed a close alliance with Maurice of Saxony. At length, in 1556, the formidable Charles V. disappeared from the theatre of events, and shut himself up in a cloister; his German states were separated from the Spanish monarchy and Burgundy, which were the lot of his son Philip. A change became perceptible in the European system.

Second period, from 1556 to 1603.

Philip II. of Spain, and Elizabeth of England, became the two ostensible personages; the one at the head of the Catholic, the other at the head of the Protestant party. The peaceful Rodolph II. suffered Austria and the rest of Germany to take breath. The scene of events was transported to a new theatre. Great Britain was Protestant, and the Low Countries revolted against Philip. Spain, on the one hand, fighting for Popery; England and the United Provinces, on the other, fighting for the reform, fill the history of this period. The new republic, scarcely born, attains to the rank of the first powers. The overstrained spring of oppression had provoked the reaction of the spring of liberty in it; the efforts made to subdue it had no other effect than accelerating the developement of all its strength. If France had not then languished under weak princes, who seemed to be devoid of energy, except in feeding factions, yielding to fanaticism, and persecuting their Protestant subjects; if it had not been reduced to support the miserable, contradictory, and difficult character of a protector of the reform, without, and its enemy within, no doubt it might easily have supported the Batavian league with a powerful hand, and attached it to itself for ever, to the prejudice of England. The latter has since made good use of this attachment of Holland, which France neglected. It would be superfluous to detail here all we have lost by it during two centuries, and all which our rivals have gained; every body knows it too well.

* A writer of great talents says, "The interests which had hitherto been national, ceased to be so, in proportion as a religious interest united men of different countries, and subjects of different governments, who had formerly been strangers to each other. The difference in language, manners, and character had raised a wall of separation between the nations of Europe which nothing had been able to shake. It was destroyed by the reformation of the church. A sentiment of greater power over the heart of man than even the love of his country, had rendered him capable of seeing and feeling beyond the limits of his country. The French Calvinist felt a greater relation with the English, German, Dutch, or Genevese Calvinist, than with his Catholic countrymen. The triumph of the Batavian armies was more grateful to him than the triumph of the armies of his sovereign, who fought for the papacy. Thus the men who were formerly troops employed by princes in their personal affairs, become gradually the judges of their own destinies, and were actuated by views arising from their dearest affections. The assistance which would not have been granted without repugnance to a simple neighbour, was lavished with zeal on an associate in the same creed. The Palatine quitted his own country to defend, against the enemy of his religion, the Frenchman who had adopted it. The Frenchman quitted a country where his conscience was not at liberty, and he was subjected to a thousand vexations, to shed his blood for the salvation of Holland. On the banks of the Loire and the Seine, Swiss and Germans were seen fighting against Swiss and Germans, for the order of succession to the throne of France. The Dane quitted his marshes, the Swede his icy regions, to come and break the chains prepared for Germany. By these new bonds all were taught to extend their good-will beyond the narrow limits of their country, and to mix with the great human family; and, ceasing to be attached to the glebe of a certain district of the earth, they become Europeans, citizens of the world." Schiller's history of the thirty years war, vol. i.

In the preceding period, land armies decided the fate of the war: in this, the geographical position of the two countries required fleets: and the pheonomenon or maritime powers contending on the seas, was seen for the first time in modern Europe. Since this time, the superiority of naval armies has become of still more decisive consequence than that of land armies. The merchants of Holland have possessed themselves of a considerable part of the navigation of the two worlds, and show what a commercial state may become by the sole aid of its vessels. The religious spirit had given rise to the new republic; but it also gave rise to the spirit of commerce, which, by degrees, made the first lose its influence, and, at length, wholly disappear; and took its place in politics. Thus everything is connected in the destiny of states, and yields to a mutual developement.

In the struggle which employed all this period, the opposition of the two religious parties was more marked than before, since one was wholly Catholic, and the other Protestant without mixture. Now, as the Catholic party fought for the royal authority against rebellious subjects, and the Protestants fought in support of these same rebels, and for the foundation of a republic, it has been since received as an avowed and fundamental maxim of state, that Catholicism was the best support of absolute power, while Protestantism favoured rebellion and a republican spirit. Even at the present day, this maxim is not relinquished by many statesmen. It may have its true side; but we have already shown in what manner.

The powerful Elizabeth died after Philip; the United Provinces subsisted by themselves; a new period was preparing in the European equilibrium.

Third Period, from 1603 to 1648.

The preceding period had only been an interlude to the long commotions in Germany; an interlude which supplied the stage with the liberty of Holland, and the civil wars of France. After six years of war, and three of trouble and uncertainty, the league of Smalcald had obtained from Charles V., tired and enfeebled, the peace of Augsburgh, which was dated in 1553, but was not entirely consolidated by the emperor until 1555, a few months before he abdicated the throne. In 1618, the war between the emperor and the Protestant princes broke out again with more violence than ever, and lasted for thirty successive years, until the treaty of Westphalia put an end to it in 1648.

Spain had again become inert. England was agitated by terrible convulsions, which have been already noticed in the article appropriated to that power. Henry IV. had ascended the throne of France; but the early years of the reign of this great prince were consumed in the re-establishment of what had been overturned in the interior of the kingdom, by so many shocks. If Providence had thought it right to leave him longer to his people, whose idol he was, from what evils might his genius have relieved Europe! The war of thirty years would either have been prevented by him, or it would have been sooner terminated. He had already restored France to her rank, and her importance. Thus he had again brought it into its natural place, that is to say, with respect to Austria, which he had resolved to curb. He was become the protector of the Protestant party in Germany, and had resolved to maintain the peace and equilibrium of the European republic. Who can ascertain how much the will of such a hero, seconded by such a minister as Sully, might have influenced the world? The project for peace is known; this in the head of the Abbe St. Pierre could only be a dream; but in that of a powerful monarch there were, at least, some means of realizing it. Henry was snatched from the world in the midst of his brilliant career. France, after his time, fell again into a paroxysm of weakness and anarchy, under a minor king. She formed an alliance with Spain which had done her so much injury, and became the sport of all the petty intrigues of the Italian court of Mary de Medicis. It was not until 1624 that the skilful hand of Richelieu was effectually applied for its welfare. Thus it was disabled from having any weight at the commencement of this period.

In 1630, Sweden appeared on the theatre of war in Germany; and France was not long in joining her. The armies of the two countries rivalled each other in courage, as did their leaders, in talents. It must not, however, be concealed, that the part of the Swedes, who fought boldly in the cause of their religion, was better supported, and more uniformly heroic; and the intrinsic weakness of Sweden rendered these efforts more worthy of admiration. Austria, Spain, the Pope, Bavaria, and some of the small Catholic states, on the one side; France, Sweden, and the Protestant states of Germany, on the other, formed the two principal groups of the European equilibrium, towards the close of this period. They remained the same at the celebrated negotiations for peace. Austria there saw its fate determined. France and Sweden became the guarantees of a treaty which regulated the future order of the empire. Both of them acquired portions of that Germany which they had come to defend: the first, the three Bishoprics, and Alsace; the second, the bishoprics of Bremen and Verdun, a part of Pomerania, and some ports and islands on the Baltic.

Sweden soon declined; France rose; and new variations supervened in the equilibrium of Europe. But it is not necessary to follow them. From this time the influence of the reformation, at least the immediate influence, cease to be manifested in it. Religious interest is no longer the dominant principle of activity in cabinets. The ambition of Louis XIV., the Spanish succession, the colonies, the establishment of Prussia, the intervention of Great Britain in the affairs of the continent, and other events also occurred to fill the scene. Nevertheless, the support of the equilibrium continues to be the fundamental law of the politics of Europe; and, now, when new events have, for a short time, disordered this balance, we see the heads of nations eagerly seeking to re-establish it, not, it is true, with the same materials, but still on the same basis as before. Individuals change in the political order, as in the other parts of nature, but the laws of the great whole remain constantly the same.

Summary Recapitulation of the results of the Reformation with respect to Politics.

Europe, plunged for several centuries in a stupor and apathy, interrupted only by wars, or rather by incursions and robberies, without any beneficial object to humanity, received at once a new life and new activity. An universal and deep interest agitated the nations; their powers were developed, their minds expanded by new political ideas. Former revolutions had only exercised men's arms; this employed their heads. The people who, before, had been only estimated as flocks passively subject to the caprice of their leaders, now began to act for themselves, and to feel their importance and utility. Those who embraced the reform, made common cause with their princes for liberty, and hence arose a closer bond, a community of interest and of action, between the sovereign and his subjects. Both were for ever delivered from the excessive and burthensome power of the clergy, as well as from the struggle, so distressing to all Europe, and which had endured so long between the popes and the emperors, to know which of them should retain the supreme power. Social order was regulated and brought near to perfection. The Austrian power was confined within proper limits; that of France was raised and made head against it; the necessity of durable alliances began to be felt; the political bodies of Europe formed a connected system of equilibrium, a regularly organized aggregate, of which even the idea was not formerly entertained. States, such as Sweden and Turkey, which had scarcely had an existence for the others, gained a rank and an importance in this system. Some, such as Holland, originated from this great shock, and acquired much preponderance from their origin. The foundations of the Prussian monarchy and the American republic were laid. A general spirit arose in politics, and embraced all Europe. The art of negotiation was improved and became more liberal and more certain; the progress of affairs, clearer and more simple. In this state of intercourse and contact, commotions and wars became more general, but they were also sooner terminated, and their rigour was lightened by a more humane law of nations.

If France had been Protestant, she would have fought more zealously for the cause of Protestantism, and the struggle might, perhaps, have been shorter. But an equivalent advantage to humanity might nevertheless result from her being Catholic: that is, men became gradually habituated to toleration and to the fraternity of sects, more especially when they saw a very powerful minister habited in the Roman purple, Cardinal Richelieu, make common cause; and enter into strict alliance with Protestant Sweden, and all the league of heretic princes of Saxony.

In one part of Europe the church ceased to form an extraneous state within the state; from which it was easy to foretell that this change would one day be effected through the whole of it, and that its head would be reduced to the simple spiritual primacy. At length the Catholic clergy reformed their conduct on the example of the Protestants, and gained in manners, knowledge, and esteem, as much as they lost in power and riches.

Almost all the European governments, however, increased in their power, and internal strength; the Protestant ones, because they were united with the mass of the people, and had appropriated to themselves the wealth, prerogatives, and jurisdiction of the church; the Catholics, because they had placed themselves on a formidable war establishment, had overthrown the Protestants in their own states, and thus subjugated one part of their people by another, the citizens by the soldiers.

After the discovery of America and the Cape of Good Hope, the commerce of the two worlds was concentrated in the hands of Spain and Portugal. But these two countries, like almost all others, before the sixteenth century, had only a throne and no people; all the national activity resided in the government. The ignorance of princes was employed in conducting a commerce as greedy as it was ill understood, the profits of which were absorbed by the luxury or unskilfulness of the court. How much longer might a true commercial spirit, navigation, the exploring of seas, have languished, had not two states, actuated by the reformation (states in which the whole nation exerted all its powers, lavished its resources, and seconded the action of the government,) found themselves led, and, as it were, forced to seize the trident? Without the religious commotion produced by Luther, the order of events would have been different; Holland, a poor portion of the Austrian states, would have remained without a marine and without commerce; England would not have had that volcanic force, or that direction which turned its against Spain. On the contrary, the maritime and commercial systems of Europe have, by means of these two powers, attained to a developement and a range, proportionate to the internal force which animates them. Their fleets, their skilful mariners have traversed all seas, and encircled the globe in their course; this example has been followed by France, the constant emulator of everything great and useful. Thus the fermentation excited in Europe by religious opinions, has created in it a new order of things more beneficial to humanity, and has even affected the two worlds.

SECOND HEAD.

ON THE PROGRESS OF KNOWLEDGE.

"It is about two hundred years since a man of genius, having discovered and collected incontestable proofs of the motion of the earth, was condemned, as an heretic, to perpetual imprisonment, by the tribunal of the inquisition. Now, a complete treatise on the celestial mechanism is freely published. Its illustrious author sees the sciences honoured in his person, by the most dignified men of the state. What a progress in so short a time, and what a career has been gone over since Galileo!"

This was the language of Citizen Biot, lately, in announcing the third volume of the immortal work of the senator Laplace. This ingenious observation of a distinguished votary of the sciences, who, in writing it perhaps had no thought of Luther's reformation, contains, nevertheless, in an implicit manner, this certain result; that is to say, that the ancient system of Roman Catholicism was diametrically opposite to the progress of knowledge; and that an event which has contributed to free the human mind from such an adversary, ought to be considered as one of the most fortunate epochs in the intellectual culture of modern nations. The opposite system of liberality, of examination, of free criticism, established by the reformation, has become the Ægis under which the Galileos, of subsequent ages, the Keplers, the Newtons, the Leibnitzes, the Hevels, and finally the Laplaces, have been enabled securely to develope their exalted conceptions.

But in this really immense career, passed through by the human mind, during three centuries, how can we distinguish the progress which the reformation alone has enabled it to make? So many causes have contributed to the intellectual culture of this period! The reformation, as has been already observed, was itself only a first effect of the restoration of knowledge. This effect, however, must have become a cause in its turn; it must have influenced subsequent events. But in what degree, and in what manner? Has the reformation accelerated, or has it retarded the progress of the human mind? Has it been favourable or injurious to it? Writers of eminence have supported each opinion. Must one of the two be adopted without reserve? Is it more expedient to take a middle course? The author of this essay will freely avow his opinion, and endeavour to justify it.

A daughter of renovating knowledge, the reformation could doubtless be no other than favourable to its progress. But this child of light was conceived in an age still gloomy, in a world still in a chaos, and in which a multitude of opposite principles fermented. Abandoned to all the passions which then prevailed; frequently disfigured in its exterior forms by the ignorance and by the superstition of those who contributed to its establishment; the reformation which originally tended only to good, has been the source of many evils. The good which it produced is a result of the spirit which constitutes its essence; the evils it has occasioned depend in a great degree on the incidents with which it was accompanied, on the resistance opposed to it, and on the foreign motives joined to it. It is therefore necessary to consider two things here, which cannot be blended without injustice; the one is the moral impulse given, primitively, by the reformation; the other is the commotion which resulted from it, when to this primitive impulse, so many other things were added, which modified it in different ways and changed its nature; in a word, in the reformation, the spirit and the event, the intention and the effect must be considered.

SECT. I.

Results of the Moral Impulse given by the Reformation.

From what has been said in several passages of this work, on the nature of the reformation, the direction which its moral impulse must have had, and the objects to which it extended, may be easily presumed. The intention of the reformers was, in principle, to free themselves from the despotism and infallibility of the popes; to depend only on the sacred writings for the grounds of their belief; and, in short, to overthrow the scholastic divinity which has become the soul of the Roman theology, and the firm support of the hierarchy. Hence it follows, that in its essence, the reformation must have had an influence on the liberty of thought, so precious to man, and the basis of his civil liberty; on the manner of contemplating religion, establishing the proofs of it, and of interpreting the Scriptures; in the third place, on philosophy, and on the ramifications of the tree of science, arising from any of these three principal points. Order and perspicuity require that each of these articles should be separately treated of.

With respect to Liberty of Thought.

I should think myself deficient in respect to my judges, and to the enlightened part of the public, were I to go into a long enumeration of the advantages which the human mind derives from the unlimited faculty of exercising its powers with freedom. Let us only reflect on the immense train of censures, prohibitions and inquisitors employed by the Romish church to keep every eye closed, at a period in which every new truth became a heresy, that is to say, a crime deserving the severest punishment, and against which all the rigour of the secular arm was demanded; and we shall shudder at the danger incurred by humanity before the sixteenth century. If, through a most happy and most unexpected concurrence of favourable circumstances, thought had not received, one after another, new supports and new food for its activity, what would the feeble spark of light which began to shine have become, with the system of oppression and obscurantism adopted by the court of Rome! If the Greeks of Constantinople had not emigrated towards the west; if Copernicus in the heavens, and Columbus upon the earth, had not enlarged the limits of knowledge; if the art of printing and the reformation of the church had not issued from the bosom of industrious Germany; if the colossal power which fettered consciences, and oppressed minds, had not experienced rapid and perceptible attacks, how many ages, perhaps, might the culture of the human race and the amelioration of the social state have been retarded! Let it be asked in the south of Germany, of the people of the two Sicilies, of Spain, of Ireland. After having freely examined the state of knowledge in these countries, let an impartial observer satisfy himself to what degree it has attained in Switzerland, the two Saxonies, Holland and England; the contrast will not escape him. It is not asserted that in the Catholic countries named above, men of superior talents, and eminent in their age, have not been met with; but they are rare, and it is the masses of the nations which are to be compared. Without doubt, considering the close connection in which the nations of our little Europe live together, it is impossible that the knowledge of some should be prevented from penetrating a little among the rest. The wall of separation cannot be sufficiently strengthened, nor so strictly guarded as that the individuals on each side cannot have communication. But certainly on the part of the Catholics, the precautions for repelling the liberal ideas of Protestantism from the limits of their territories, like a dangerous epidemy, have not been neglected. It was at Rome that the first censures of books were invented, and the example was religiously followed by the governments devoted to Rome. Leo X., this vaunted protector of the arts, in 1515, promulgated some severe regulations against the printing and publishing of books translated from the Greek, Hebrew, or Arabic. Almost at the same instant, in which five years after, he fulminated that famous bull against the reform, beginning thus; Exurge, Deus, judica causam tuam, in which Luther and all his adherents are assailed with the most terrible anathemas; in which it is indiscriminately prohibited to read all their books, on whatsoever subject they may treat; at the same instant, I say, this pontiff did not blush to publish, in the name of Jesus Christ, a bull in favour of the profane poems of Ariosto, menacing with excommunication all who should blame them or impede their circulation. What could be expected from such a spirit, from such an abuse of things which they wished to be respected as holy, and received as the oracles of heaven itself? France, the most enlightened of all the Catholic countries, and wherein papacy had never prevailed indefinitely, notwithstanding its attempts to get footing there and to introduce the inquisition; France, where a half reform existed under the title of the Gallican liberties, was not entirely free from that stifling system.[*] In Spain, Italy, and Austria, prohibitions and censures were carried much farther, and even yet impose heavy shackles on the liberty of writing and thinking. Several of the governments of southern Germany, from time to time, renew these salutary regulations against reading books written by heretics or by wits. The public libraries lock up the works of Rousseau, Voltaire, Helvetius, Diderot, etc. and it is expressly ordered "that they be not communicated, except to those who will undertake to refute them;" these are the words of a very recent edict. - A professor of a Bavarian university was deprived of his employment, some years before the French revolution, for having required that a copy of Dictionnaire critique de Bayle should be placed in the common library. These facts, and an infinity of others which are daily making their appearance, characterize the spirit of Catholicism, with respect to the propagation of knowledge and the freedom of instruction. This maxim of the centuries of the middle age still lives in it, and is kept up as much as it is possible to do so in these times; "to keep men's minds in perfect stupidity on certain subjects; to keep as many empty spaces in them as possible, in order to be able to fill them up afterwards at pleasure, and that superstition may be more conveniently instilled into them." Has it happened that any pope has retracted the bull In Cœna Domini, by which all those are excommunicated who read books composed by heretics? Fra Paolo, mentioning the first index of prohibited books which was published at Rome, in 1559, says, among other things, "that in it, under pretext of religion, the pope had condemned to excommunication the authors of writings solely because the authority of princes and magistrates was supported in them against the usurpations of the ecclesiastics. Besides this, the Roman inquisitors prohibited en masse all the books printed by sixty-two printers, without regard to their contents; adding also a general prohibition against reading any book coming from the press of a printer who should, once in his life, have printed any writing coming from the pen of a heretic. So that, continues the historian, nothing was left to read. A more excellent secret for stupifying and corrupting mankind by religion, will never be discovered. (Histoire du Concile de Trente, Lib. VI.)

The reformation broke all these chains imposed upon the human mind, and overthrew all the barriers which prevented the free communication of thoughts. Nothing remains prohibited by it but such productions as public morality or modesty would blush at.

To have recalled the remembrance of these chains and these barriers, to have examined the long barbarism which they would have supported upon earth; is not this to have shown sufficiently how much the reformation has contributed to the progress and the universality of knowledge? In fact, as soon as the career was open by it, men dared publicly to discuss the most valuable interests of humanity, and to speak, as men, of everything human.

The Roman church said; "Submit yourselves to authority, without examination." The Protestant church says, "Examine, and submit yourselves only to conviction." The one commanded a blind belief; the other teaches with the apostle[*] "to reject the bad, and to adopt only that which is good."

"Protestantism," says an esteemed writer,[†] "is the repulsive power with which reason is endowed, throwing from her, and repelling everything which would usurp her place." I shall abstain from saying more, and from indulging in idle declamations on this subject. It is sufficient to reflect a single instant on the immense opposition of these two principles, adopted respectively, by the two parties, as the basis of moral culture: on the one side, believe! on the other examine! Most assuredly on the supreme authority of these two contrary principles everything must wear a very different aspect, on the two sides. The principle of examination provokes that knowledge of which it is the friend, as that of blind submission is the votary of ignorance. And by what means shall we calculate how far the infinite influence of a fundamental principle which is admitted for the basis of religious instruction, and, consequently, also, for the moral instruction of a nation, may extend? The man who is free in his inmost soul, looks freely and boldly around him; he becomes enterprising, active, capable of all that is great and useful. He that is a slave in his conscience, a slave in the centre of his being, is so, without perceiving it, in every part of his conduct, debased as he is by the stupefaction and apathy which enervates his faculties.

With respect to the Study of Religion—ancient Languages, Exegesis, Archæologio, History.

Conformably to the terms of the question proposed by the National Institute, the study of religion can only be considered here, in as far as the mode of this study has had an immediate influence on literature and the sciences. It will be unnecessary, therefore, to attend to the doctrine of the different reformed churches, or to their method of religious instruction, which belongs to the science called catechetic, or to the science of sacred oratory, called homiletic, etc. . . . which, in other respects, and under other circumstances, might, perhaps, furnish matter for a very extensive and very interesting work.

In the time when the Roman church reigned alone in the west, the absence of all contradiction led to that of all inquiry, and of all study of religious antiquities. Besides, the church, as we have already seen, opposed an active resistance to all investigations into these matters. It prohibited with all its power the teaching of the oriental languages, and the reading of the books of the Old and New Testaments. Its system was founded on passages and terms in these books, which it interpreted according to its views; and on traditions, passages from the holy fathers, decisions of councils, pontifical bulls, decretals, charters, and other historical monuments, true or counterfeit. To attack this system with effect, and in all parts, as well as to establish their own on sure foundations, the Protestant theologians were compelled to penetrate into all the depths of criticism, as well in regard to the idioms in which the originals of the sacred books were written, as to the different branches of sacred history and ecclesiastical history. It was of the utmost importance to them to show with precision that this passage was mutilated, or not well interpreted; that that expression had, at the time in which it was written, a totally different meaning from that which was now attributed to it, and so of the rest. Hence, to them the study of orientalism, of the sacred antiquities, (which are intimately connected with the profane antiquities of the east) and, finally, that of languages, which are the necessary key to them, became indispensable. They were obliged to investigate and attain an exact knowledge of the places, manners, events, ideas, the whole intellectual culture, the political and private state of the different nations during the periods when this prophet or that evangelist had written. We have seen already that the principal leaders of the reformation were very strongly attached to studies of this nature, which required the assiduity and phlegm of the north. Is it necessary here to remind my judges of the immense services rendered by the reformists of different communions, from Luther, Melancthon, Camerarius, Zwingle, Calvin, the Buxtorfs, ect. to Michaelis, Eichhorn, Schultens, Lowth, Kennicott, and others, to oriental literature and antiquities? The study of Greek, so important on account of the New Testament, the fathers, and the version of the septuagint, was pursued with at least equal ardour. An acquaintance with the ancient master-pieces written in this language, gave it a new attraction. Shall I name here all the celebrated Hellenists which Protestant Europe has produced? Shall I display a list of their labours? This would require a work of pure nomenclature, more voluminous than all this dissertation. Who that has trod on classic ground is unacquainted with Ernesti, Heyne, Heeren, Schütz, Wolf, Hemsterbuys, Bentley, Voss, and Spanheim?[*] Who does not know that in the Protestant countries, the knowledge of Greek is, perhaps, more common than that of Latin, in most Catholic countries? In England, Holland, and Germany, every man who has received an education, is as well acquainted with the language of Homer as with that of Virgil. With respect to the ecclesiastics, this knowledge is indispensable to them, and it is not uncommon to find them versed in the culture of the oriental languages and antiquities. Thus the impulse was given by the necessity which the Protestants felt, at the first, of acting offensively against the church of Rome. They were the aggressors, and their existence depended upon conquering the Catholic theologians. Thus their attention and their efforts were turned towards historical criticism, and philology. Public education was consequently organized: and this study became as much more esteemed and more generally in vogue, as the advances of the learned men of the nation became more eminent.[†]

---

[*] The history of all the books which have been juridically condemned would be highly interesting were it philosophically written. We should find many stigmatized for having dared to say that every honest man ought to glory in thinking. Let us take one instance among a thousand. Towards the close of the seventeenth century the missionary Lecomte published his Neveaux Memoires sur l'etat present de la Chine, in which he had the candour to say, that, "the Chinese had adored the true God for two thousand years; that, among the nations, they were the first who had sacrificed to their Creator, and taught a true morality." We cannot, at this time, conceive what a clamour this simple assertion of an historian then excited. The abbe Boileau, brother to the celebrated satirist, thundered in the Sorbonne, and denounced the good missionary as a blasphemer. In 1700, the Sorbonne condemned the book, which the parliament had also the weakness to order to be torn and burnt by the hands of the hangman.

[†] The Rev. M. Greiling, in a very good German work, entitled Hieropolis, on the reciprocal relations of the church and state.

The study of languages, and of the sacred and ecclesiastical antiquities, could not, however, belong exclusively to the Protestants. The Catholics were obliged to take measures to defend themselves, and to prove, in opposition to their learned adversaries, that the passages and expressions, charged by them to be falsely interpreted, were, on the contrary, explained with justice and truth. Besides, the impulse once given in the republic of European literature, no one could remain behind, and submit to the disgrace of appearing less informed than the adverse party.[‡] A great number of Catholics distinguished themselves as much in criticism, and philosophy, as the Protestants. But it must, nevertheless, be acknowledged that this study was never so much encouraged and so universal in the nations attached to Rome, as in those who had separated from it.[*] Here they gave themselves up to these sciences with the ardour of desire and enthusiasm; they were revered as the protectors of the public welfare, as the sources of religious and political independence: there they were only handled like dangerous weapons, from which the first attack had been received; and they were only cultivated by compulsion, and through a necessity of defending themselves upon equal terms.

It was thus that Protestantism, by its new method of studying religion, of examining it, and establishing its evidences, gave birth in Europe, and more especially in its own bosom, to a more profound culture of sacred, profane, and ecclesiastical antiquity. Even in our own days we see striking proofs of it in the erudition of the learned men of the north, who, more remote than the other Europeans from the countries in which the beauties of antiquity have flourished, seem nevertheless to secure to themselves the domination over them, in their scientific excursions. The Italians tread upon Herculaneum, and disinter its wonders; they multiply museums and collections; it is for Winklemann they amass these materials: by their assistance, he rediscovers the thread of the art; he writes the annals of it; he becomes its legislator.

From this acute study of the oriental and Greek archæologia by the Protestant theologians, applied to the interpretation of the sacred books, a perfection and richness, which it was very far from having before, has resulted to the science called Exegesis, or a critical examination of the text of the scriptures, which forms an important part of their studies. Exegesis has several branches. That which relates particularly to languages and antiquities, to a knowledge of times, places, and authors, is called hermeneutic. The English in particular, the Swiss, the Dutch, and the Germans have carried this science very far. There the various fragments, books, poems, or treatises which compose the Bible (in as far as they are considered as works written in a certain age and in a certain nation) are interpreted, commented on, and restored to their true meaning. There the Pentateuch is explained with the same care and the same penetration as the poems of Hesiod or Homer, in profane archæologia. The scholia written on the book of Job; on those of Isaiah and Jeremiah; on the Psalms; on Solomon's Song, &c. throw an entire new light on these precious remains of oriental antiquity, on their authors, and on the spirit of the age in which they were written. The mythology of the nation and of the neighbouring people is developed and unfolded in them. The hermeneutic labours on the books of the New Testament are not less important. The gospels, the acts and the epistles of the Apostles, the apocalypse itself, submitted to criticism like historical passages, give rise to inquiries and dissertations which cannot be read without the most lively interest. In thus tracing the sacred historians and poets through the Egyptian, Arabian, Syriac, Chaldean, Samaritan, Persian, Greek and Roman antiquity; in analyzing their language, their manners, their dispositions, the culture and ideas of their cotemporaries, they have cultivated an extensive region of the domain of antiquity, and have thrown a light upon a part of the archives of the human race, which is greatly essential to us.[†]

All the Protestant universities have professors, by whom exegesis, the hermeneutic, and other sciences which depend upon it, are in general taught with credit. Such a course, the object of which is the interpretation of the Proverbs, or of the epistle to the Galatians, is very frequently a complete picture of the political, literary, and religious history of the period in which these writings were composed; a picture in which the erudition, critical knowledge, and philosophy which have contributed to its composition, often command admiration. The Protestant states, as well as individuals, neglect nothing to carry this science of the interpretation of the sacred books to the highest possible degree of perfection. The libraries of the old monasteries of the east and west were for a long time visited without intermission by indefatigable English, German, and Danish philologists. Manuscripts and monuments of every kind were sought there, deciphered and compared; obscure passages were elucidated; knowledge flashed from these old dusty depositories: it was for the intelligent and experienced eye of the Protestant that the indolent Cenobite had preserved these treasures. What rich and invaluable discoveries have the adversaries of Rome made in these receptacles of knowledge which the Catholic monks are doubtless entitled to the honours of having kept shut up during so many ages, but which the greater part of them were unable to make any use of, and the most learned of them too frequently disfigured in their writings. It would be inconsistent with the plan of this slight essay to enter into the endless details which a thorough investigation of this subject would require, or to collect all the justificative documents which would be necessary to it. Since the zealous Pocock, how many others have been sent for the same purpose, by the Protestant princes, and even by simple societies, to traverse all the Levant, Asia, Palestine, the vicinity of Thebes, and Ethiopia? I shall only mention the expedition in which Niebuhr, a Dane, already known by his travels in Arabia and Egypt, was concerned, and which had no other object. All who were acquainted with Niebuhr's relation, know also the interesting series of questions prepared for him by the celebrated Michaelis of Gottingen before his departure, and which such a man as him alone could conceive.

[*] The greatest number of men of erudition in France, in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, were the reformists, Robert and Henry Etienne, Jos. Scaliger, Casanbon, Saumaise, Bochart, Tanegui-Lefebvre, J. Morin, (who afterwards abjured, and joined the Congregation of the Oratory,) Bayle, etc. etc.

[†] The great attention given in Protestant countries to the study of the ancient languages, is without doubt one reason of the facility with which they also learn the modern and living languages. In general, a Protestant, of the informed class, commonly understands two or three languages besides his own.

[‡] The Jews were also aroused by the general activity, and during this period published several grammars and lexicons of the Hebrew tongue. They remained, in general, more learned and more enlightened in the Protestant countries, than elsewhere. Spinoza lived in Holland, as did Moses Mendelshon at Berlin, where they still reckon several learned men and philosophers of the first order among the Jews.

[*] It is very evident that this has no reference to the works published by the propagandists or foreign missions, nor to the works of some other Catholics, the objects of which are only the languages and state of the modern east, or of India, China, &c. The particular subject in question is biblical orientalism.

[†] See on this subject a Discourse delivered on the opening of the Protestant academy of Strasburgh, on the 15th Brumaire, in the year XII. by M. Haffner, professor of theology, the title of which is: Des secours que l'etude des langues, de l'histoire, de la philosophie, et de la literature offre a la theologie. This excellent piece has been too little read; the journals have taken too little notice of it; in a word it may be said of it, as Condorcet also said of a very good discourse on the reformists which appeared in his time; "It would make a great noise if the people of Paris employed themselves seriously with anything but pleasure, intrigues, and money." (Tom. X. of his Œuvres, p. 289.)

Before terminating this article relative to the sublime and profound science of exegesis among the Protestants, I cannot avoid noticing, cursorily, how greatly the whole system of the study of Protestant theology differs from that of Catholic theology. They are two antipodean worlds to each other, having nothing in common, except the name. But, unhappily, this is sufficient to deceive all who judge by the name.[*] The Catholic theology rests on the inflexible authority of the decisions of the church, and, consequently, prohibits to the student every free use of his reason. It has retained the jargon and the barbarous accompaniments of the scholastic divinity; in it may be discovered the works of darkness of the monks of the tenth century; in short, the greatest happiness that can be experienced by him who has had the misfortune to learn it, is to forget it as soon as possible. The Protestant theology, on the contrary, rests on a system of examination, on the unlimited use of reason. The most liberal exegesis opens to it the knowledge of sacred antiquity; and criticism, that of the history of the church; a simplified and pure doctrine is, to it, only the body, the positive form necessary to religion; it is supported by philosophy in its examination of the law of nature, of morality, and of the relation of man to the divinity. Whoever is anxious to be well informed in history, in classical literature, in philosophy, can use no better method than a course of Protestant theology. Ecclesiastics, so instructed, quit the universities to fulfil the functions of pastors, of ministers, in the small towns through the country. There they frequently establish excellent schools, and disseminate around them that knowledge with which their masters enriched them. The class of our village curates and vicars has generally been very respectable, and very exemplary, at all times; it must, however, be acknowledged, and all who have had an opportunity of making the observation will acknowledge it, without difficulty that this class is not less exemplary among the Protestants, and that it receives much more and much better instruction.[†]

Another advantage which the new mode of religious studies introduced by Protestantism has procured to the sciences, is its having contributed so powerfully to take ecclesiastical history, and also a great part of civil history, out of the hands of the monks, the usual chroniclers of the centuries preceding the sixteenth. These recluses, very ill-informed respecting the transactions of the world, seldom impartial, gave merit to princes only in proportion as they had endowed their convents, or rendered services to the church. They mixed a multitude of fables, superstitions, and maledictions against heretics, with these deformed annals. Where was then the muse of history with such ministers? In a few instances they have done some service; but how much more would human reason, which they held in bondage for ages, have done for itself, if it had been suffered to act without constraint? At length Reineccius, Melancthon, Sleiden, Buchanan, Grotius,[*] De Thou, Puffendorf restored history to its true form; it has since their time been united to criticism and philosophy, from which it ought never to be separated. Bayle, and many others of the Protestant historians, wrote with a freedom, a critical knowledge, and a spirit, which many of the Catholics afterwards imitated.

The history of the church, as well that of its doctrine, as that of the exterior events which connected this church, as a society, with the other political bodies, acquired a consistence, a truth, an impartiality, and an accuracy, which have made it one of the most important branches of human knowledge. The essays of the two Basnages, of Lenfant, of Beausobre, Le Bret, and others, are known in France; there are also known the works, already become ancient, of the Centuriators of Magdeburgh, the fathers of true ecclesiastical history, those of Seckendorf, and Mosheim, in Latin; but those of Walsh and Cramer in German, are less known. These have had worthy successors in the later historians of their country, the only one in which this history, so full of noble lessons and ideas, has been ably treated by men of profound information, such as M. M. Semler, Plank, Schræck, Spittler, Henke, Munter, and Thym; and with respect to the history of the gospel, in itself and in its critical history, by M. Paulus, the Michaëlis of the New Testament. In conclusion, we may add that literary history, that species of history which is employed to show the picture of the progress or the variations of the human mind in the sciences and the arts, is also indebted to this same impulse for a new life. The first example of such a picture was given at Kiel by the illustrious Morhoff, in his book entitled, Polyhistor.

[*] Some years ago I read in a French journal called le Propagateur, a sharp reprimand to these inconsiderate people who praised the German literature. Among others, under the article of theology, the journalist observed, ironically, that at the last fair of Leipsic, above a hundred works on this subject had appeared. "Thanks to heaven," added he, "we no longer have such folly among us." Those who know the subjects of Protestant theology, those also who have a little knowledge of the literary history of the two last centuries in France, under Nicole, Arnauld, Bossuet, Fenelon, Fleury, &c. can set a just value upon this ignorance in the journalist.

[†] In some Protestant countries, the ministers who are to be stationed in the country, are required to go through a course of agriculture and rural economy, as well as to have some knowledge of medicine and pharmacy. At Geneva, the young ecclesiastics are examined on their progress in grammatical knowledge, the ancient languages, &c. before they begin their theological studies; and after these, which last four years, they are subjected to another examination in the same, to ascertain whether they have lost anything in that species of instruction. This good custom has been preserved at Geneva, ever since the re-establishment of learning. The same regulation is also in force in all the academies of Protestant Switzerland.

[*] It must be confessed that the only modern historians whom we dare to compare with the ancients, such as Burnet, Clarendon, Robertson, Hume, Gibbon, J. Muller, Schiller, etc. are all Protestants. The abbe de Mably, in his Maniere d'ecrire l'histoire, directly places Grotius far above Tacitus; and in many places he gives the Protestant historians the preference over those of the Catholic persuasion. The reason of this preference is clearly expressed in these words of Mably; "in fact, it is not worth while to write history to make it only a poison, like Strada, who, sacrificing the dignity of the Low Countries to that of the court of Spain, invites its subjects to servitude, and thus prepares the progress of despotism. If this historian is to be credited, Philip II. might trample under his feet all the laws, all the treaties, all the agreements with his subjects, because he held his crown from God; and this dangerous casuist condemns the Low Countries to suffer patiently the ruin of their privileges and the most cruel oppression, that they may not render themselves culpable of a sacrilegious disobedience. It is to this ignorance of natural rights, or to that baseness with which the greater part of modern historians betray their consciences by flattery, that the disgusting insipidity of their works is owing. Why is Grotius so superior to them? It is because, having meditated deeply on the rights and the duties of society, I find in him the elevation and the energy of the ancients. I dwell with avidity on his history of the war of the Low Countries; and Strada, who has perhaps more skill in narrating, falls continually from my hands. Buchanan is another example of that power of study which I speak of. After having read his learned production bearing the title of De jure regni apud Scotos, we are not surprised that this writer should have composed a history which breathes an air of dignity, generosity, and elevation." (Page 18 et seq. of the Paris edition, 1783, in 12mo.) Here is the great secret disclosed; the one have liberality and philosophy in their manner of thinking and writing; the others have not.

With Respect to Philosophy—to the Moral and Political Sciences.

A revolution began by a reform in religious opinions, could not fail to awaken the philosophical spirit in man, which is so intimately connected with mystical speculations, with the ideas of a divinity, of a future life for him in another world, and of his moral duties in this. It has been already sufficiently shown above, what an imperfect philosophy reigned in the schools before the reformation, and what an extravagant and puerile dialectic was amalgamated with the system of the Roman theology, which maintained itself by its aid. To support this system was, in fact, for many centuries, the only end of all philosophy; the theologians, who were generally monks, were the only philosophers. Their subtle, and sometimes risible arguments, tended only to the support of orthodoxy, against innovators and heretics; it never entered their heads to teach a useful morality to human society; they only employed themselves in establishing the rights of the pope and the clergy, but never those of the people, nor of individuals. To reason conformably to the views of the Roman church, at that period, it is evident that it must only be done in a certain manner, and on certain subjects. To reason in a new manner, and to extend the reasoning of subjects considered, till then, sacred and inviolable, was to loosen the bases of the edifice. A firm, independent philosophy, which aspired at becoming universal, was, in this state of things, a monstrosity, consequently nothing of this description existed before the reformation. A strange mixture of disguised propositions of peripatetism, which was applied in the strangest manner to matters of faith and controversy, formed all the ground-work of the doctrine of the schools.

Subsequent to the renovation of letters, some men of talents, with the famous Erasmus at their head, had opposed this monkish barbarism. But, remaining in the bosom of a church to which scholastic divinity had become an indispensable auxiliary, how could they labour effectually to destroy this support. Such an undertaking could only be accomplished by reformers bold enough to quit this church, and to establish one separate from it on the pure principles of the gospel and of reason. It was in this manner that the reformation dethroned the scholastic divinity.

Protestants and Catholics, having entered into a competition in the study of Greek to acquire a knowledge of the original writings in this language, read also the works of Aristotle, which they procured from among the dust of the libraries. With what surprise did they find that their contents were totally different from what had been, for centuries taught in the name of this great man! They discovered that the grotesque pagoda, so revered in the schools under the imposing name of Aristotle, did not in any manner resemble the philosophy of the Stagyrite. Melancthon laboured to obtain evidence of this new conviction. He laid down the true doctrine of Aristotle, in favour of which he declared, and he allowed it to be valid in everything which came within the jurisdiction of human reason, but at the same time, contended most strenuously, that it ought to be excluded from the domain of theology. They did not confine themselves to reading the original books of Aristotle: the discoveries they had made in them inspired the learned men of this century with the desire of extending their investigations to all that remained of the monuments of the ancient philosophy. The writings of the Pythagoreans, those of the two schools of Plato, the old and the new academies, those of the stoic and epicurean schools, were read, interpreted, and their different doctrines publicly taught. Then began a philosophical period, during which the interest in truths of a superior order, in the discussion of the most sublime rules of logic, metaphysics, and morality, acquired an activity which had been lost to it for many centuries. The perusal of the precious remains of antiquity, from its connection with the speculative sciences, became again to the moderns, what it had been in the age of Petrarch, from its connection with poetry.

It would be necessary to follow all the deviations of the philosophical spirit during this period; to show all the various forms which it assumed, either in the systems alternately borrowed and modified from the ancients, or in those created by modern genius; it would be necessary to state what these deviations had been in so many comprehensive minds as those of Agrippa, Bacon, Cherbury, Descartes, Spinosa, Gassendi, Pascal, Mallebranche, Locke, Leibnitz, Wolf, Bayle, Berkeley, &c. &c. to give a complete idea of this period;* but so extensive a picture cannot enter into the narrow limits of this work. It is sufficient to our purpose to have shown the share which the reformation had in this great agitation of the human mind.†

It must, however, be observed that this agitation could only receive a free and full expansion in Protestant countries: it was foreign and contradictory to the system established in the Catholic states. In the latter, philosophy could only be considered as a sort of disturber of the public peace, or rather of the public apathy, which, in the eyes of a considerable number of people, amounts to the same thing. In Austria, Italy, and Spain, this philosophical flash was soon extinguished, and the usual torpidity resumed the upper hand. Even in France, a country, which as we have several times shown, is by no means to be put on a level with the other Catholic countries, the philosophical spirit was at an end soon after Descartes, who, as is known, found the greatest number of partisans and opponents in Holland. The interest in truths, or in the philosophical systems, on the contrary, far from losing any part of its activity, seemed to be constantly increasing among the English, the Dutch, the Swiss, and the Germans of the north. London, Halle, and Geneva, became the schools from whence the French derived their erudition: Locke and Hume, Wolfe and Bonnet became our masters; the modest plurality of the small number of the national thinkers, attached themselves sometimes to one, sometimes to another of these great men, and more particularly to the first. Their works, the produce of a Protestant soil, became our classical and fundamental works in philosophy.

When, however, for some lustres, the philosophical spirit seemed deadened in England and Holland, it revived in Germany more powerfully than ever, and with a depth and energy which it had not had since the best times of Greece. It is indebted to the immortal Kant for this new flight. Kant has laid down principles, and arrived at immutable results, which will remain for ever, as the cardinal points of the mind, as brilliant light-houses in the darkness of metaphysical researches. The schools, the offspring of his, are powerful adherents of his doctrine when they follow and examine it; they often lose themselves when they deviate from it. However this may be, it is demonstrated to every one who observes the progress of the intellectual culture of nations with attention, that the doctrine of the philosopher of Kœnigsburgh could not, on the one hand, excite so profound an enthusiasm, and on the other, so vigorous an opposition, such powers of reasoning, except in a country where the grand questions on the relations of human reason to nature, and to universal reason, were habitual to its inhabitants, that is to say, in a country where they think with freedom on the objects of a purified religion, and where the most exalted ideas of the high destination of man, are universally diffused. Nothing is more pure, more religious, more strict, more stoical, than the moral doctrine of the most celebrated schools of Germany, whether that of Kant, or that of Jacobi. The superficial lessons, the errors of Helvetius and his associates, were never able to take root in this soil. For the influence of the reformation on the study of morality has been as decisive, as on that of the other branches of philosophy. This science, which is the same to the conduct of man, as metaphysics is to his knowledge, had, after the last of the Roman moralists, fallen into an almost total oblivion. It is known that the fathers of the church, who exerted every resource of their minds in the controversies on tenets, did very little or even nothing, for the moral sciences. The scholastics did still less; and under their long domination, true morality disappeared entirely, and gave place to a casuistic degenerate morality. in which the duties of man towards God and towards his fellows, were almost wholly reduced to his duties to the church: here a multiplicity of practical superstitions and subtleties corresponded but too well to the superstition and subtleties of the theology of these dark ages. When the gospel had regained its rank, and displaced casuistry. the pure and divine morality announced in it, also resumed its place in the pulpits and the writings of the spiritual pastors. Besides, the reading of the ancient philosophers in the original works, must have familiarized men to their different moral principles. They compared these principles with each other, and with that of christianity. Hence the study of morality acquired a high degree of interest, to which it would never have attained, if casuistry had remained dominant, and the pulpits of the churches, and the schools, had remained in the power of the monks. Now it has become, to the ministers of the Protestant worship, the most essential, and almost the only ground of their precepts to the people, the inexhaustible text of their discourses. It makes one of the most important objects of the public instruction in the universities. It is well known what a number of excellent writings on this subject have been produced by the different Protestant churches, particularly in the last century; what a spirit of purity, of humanity, and of religion, they display; at the same time equally remote from the ascetic fanaticism of the ages of ignorance, as from the stern and cyrenaic egotism of the ages which are called more enlightened.*

* It is to be observed, that, at that time, philosophy had its martyrs. Bruno was burnt alive at Rome, in 1600; Vanini at Toulouse, in 1619; and Kuhlman at Moscow, in 1686; the two former, Italians by birth, as atheists.

† It would be too easy to make this essay, which can be no more than a simple sketch, a voluminous history, filled with details and compilations. In this article, for example, which relates to the influence of the reformation on philosophical studies, it would only be necessary to copy everything interesting on this subject, inserted by Brucker in the fourth volume of his history of philosophy, lib. II. cap. I. De causis mutatæ, tempore emendata Religionis, Philosophiœ; and afterwards to lay under contribution the learned works of Rexinger and Edzard, (Dissert. quantum reformatio Lutheri logica profuerit;) of Lehmann, (De utilitatæ quam morali disciplinæ reformatio Lutheri attulit;) of Seeleo, (De incrementis quæ studium politicum e reformatione Lutheri cepit,) and a multiplicity of writings of this kind.

With respect to that morality of states, which, rising superior to individual relations, fixes the respective rights of societies and of their members, those of princes and of citizens, as also those of nations with each other; which gives the theory of the laws, that of the right of nature, and that of positive right, in a civil state! the progress which the reformation has enabled it to make has been already mentioned, in different passages of this work.† The great questions, which for the first time, in modern times, were at length discussed, and appeared before the European public, turned their minds to this subject, of such universal interest. Luther wrote his Treatise of the civil magistrate; his Appeal to the German nobility, &c. Melancthon, Zwingle, John Stourm, and other reformers, discussed similar subjects, and brought them within the reach of the less informed.‡ Buchanan published his famous and bold libel, de jure regni, in Scotland: while on the continent, Hubert Languet wrote his Vindiciœ contra tyrannos, and Etienne de la Boëtie, his Discours sur la servitude volontaire. Milton, who laboured to defend the long parliament of England, and to justify the punishment of Charles I. to the human race, composed several political books, which breathed the most ardent republicanism, and among others his Defence of the people of England, against Saumaise. Some of these productions, full of the vehemence and anger of the parties which then clashed with such fury, too frequently overshot their object; but they, at least, served to point it out, to inspire the wish of attaining it, and effectually to attract attention. These shortly gave way to the superior productions of wise and penetrating minds, which re-created the science of the right of nature and of people. Bacon foresaw the necessity; he projected the basis of it, as well as almost all the parts of the philosophical edifice. It was reserved for the immortal Grotius to carry light into the midst of darkness, to class and arrange the principles, and to offer to Europe the first book in which the rights and duties of men in society were laid down with energy, precision and wisdom. Why did Jean Jacques, so great, so much a friend to truth, without a shadow of reason, in his Contrat Social, calumniate Grotius in so strange a manner? Had he not read the Law of Peace and War; or, had he forgotten what he had read?

After Grotius, shall I speak of his rival Selden, of his commentator Bæcler, of Puffendorf, who published a Law of Nature, superior, perhaps to the Law of Peace;* of Barbeyrac, the able translator and Aristarchus of these two works? Hobbes, however, in England, supporting another system, was not less useful to the science, both by the truths which he published, and by the refutations which he provoked against him. Algernon Sydney followed the opposite principles to those of Hobbes, in his Treatise on Government, and died a martyr to his attachment to the cause of the people. It is necessary to cease these citations, notwithstanding the importance of similar works; and although I might still bring forward such names as Conring, Forstner, Locke, Leibnitz, Wolf, Thomasius, Jurieu, Burlamaqui, Vatel, Bolingbroke, and so many others more modern, in the north of Europe and in America, this may suffice to show how greatly the moral impulse given by the reformation has influenced the progress made in the science of legislation, formerly plunged in a Scholastic barbarism, equal to that which prevailed in theology. But though we may, with justice, attribute this influence on the minds of Europeans to the reformation, we must guard against the belief that it was an exclusive cause, confining its effects to those countries alone in which the reformation has become dominant. Italy has had its Machiavel, Spain its Mariana, France its Bodin, (suspected, it is true, of being secretly the partisan of the reform.) The ardour of these studies was also increased by the polemical disputes which took place between the different parties. We have in the eighteenth century, seen writers on public law eclipse those of the sixteenth and seventeenth; but they are only able to surpass them from benefiting by their labours. Would Montesquieu have become so much the pride of our political literature, if he had not had so many laborious predecessors to smooth his path?

From all these facts it is not difficult to deduce this evident truth; that the reformation, which from its birth was so intimately in contact with politics, and with every object of public utility, must have directed the minds of men to the sciences connected with the economy and the administration of states.

Men, on the contrary, who, in their own country, lived under the continual influence of a foreign authority; who saw around them a powerful secular and regular clergy, in the possession of the finest domains; in addition to this, raising tithes, the most unincumbered produce of the labours of the cultivator; these men became incapable of any generous effect: the interest they took in the culture of the soil was without energy. Besides, the members of this clergy were the pastors, the founders, the depositaries of all the knowledge, the masters of all souls. Employed in the exterior practice of devotion, and in supporting the rights of the church, these were also nearly the only objects on which they instructed the people. From this resulted a profound ignorance and indolence respecting the most precious interests of men in society. Agriculture, economy, and its various branches were in a deplorable state of degradation. Such is nearly the present condition in the fine provinces of Naples and Rome, in Spain and in Portugal; poverty, indolence, immorality, all sorts of vices are engendered among people of such dispositions;† the state remains weak and badly governed. What activity, on the contrary, what improvements in agriculture, in rural economy, in the government, strike the attention of an observer in the midst of the cold and infertile fields of Scotland, in England, and in Holland! There, the hand of man creates everything, because it labours for itself; there it is all powerful, because it is free, and a suitable instruction guides it. The contrast of these indubitable effects of the two religions is more particularly perceptible in Germany and Switzerland, where the different territories which are intermixed, cause the traveller to pass continually from a Catholic to a Protestant country. Does he meet with a miserable mud cottage, covered with thatch, the fields badly kept, wretched rude peasants, and many beggars; he will be in little danger of erring, if he conjecture that he is in a Catholic country. If, on the contrary, neat, pleasant houses* are seen, offering the spectacle of affluence and industry, the fields well enclosed, a culture well understood, it is very probable that he is among Protestants, Anabaptists, or Mennonites. Thus nature seems to change her aspect, as he who gives her laws enjoys his liberty more or less, and exercises all his powers in a greater or less degree: while, at the same time, nature appears to have delighted in endeavouring to bestow all her gifts upon the Catholic nations, which inhabit the finest countries of Europe. This singularity is very evident in the limited territory of Helvetia. Let the fertile plains of Soleure be compared with the much less favoured soil of Argovia; the rocky sterile land, unprotected from the northern blasts, of the Pays de Vaud, with the magnificent Italian Switzerland, or the well sheltered Valais;† the territory of Neufchatel, with the fruitful fields of the country lately subjected to the Abbe of Saint-Gall; and, finally, even in the states of this monk-prince, let that portion which follows the Roman worship be compared with that, much smaller, which, under the protection of Zurich and Berne, has been able to adhere to the reform; and it will everywhere appear that the activity and knowledge of man is superior to even the liberalities of prodigal nature, while all her benefits are as though they were lost, to idleness and want of care. Agriculture is carried to such a height of perfection in the canton of Berne, that many of the methods of the Bernois farmers are adopted in England, and the economical society established by them are the authors of the true irrigation, the importance of which is very well known to every agriculturalist.‡

* M. Stœudlin, professor of theology at Gottingen, has given a very good history of the attempts which have been made by philosophers, to treat morality scientifically. The elevation of religious morality to the rank of a science, is owing to Calixtus, a Protestant theologian, who collected into one body the scattered precepts of the gospel and of reason, and arranged them systematically.

† It was particularly noticed, in the article on the Internal Situation of the Protestant States in general.

‡ It is scarcely necessary to observe, that the canon law was subjected to a total reform in the Protestant countries. It was there rigorously separated from the civil law, on which it had hitherto been continually encroaching, and it was made subordinate to the local law of each particular state. While the Protestants simplified their ecclesiastical law, and reduced it to a very small number of indispensable regulations, the popes augmented still further the immense code of the apostolic law, incorporating with it all the decrees of the council of Trent, the Institutes which they had caused to be composed by Lancelot of Perouse, their bulls, decisions, &c. Nevertheless the Catholic civilians, endeavoured to give their code a better form, and more connection and consequence.

* The book of Puffendorf, like that of Grotius, was put into the Index, and prohibited in certain Catholic countries, at Rome, in Austria, Spain, &c.

† It is a certain fact that more crimes are committed in Catholic than in Protestant countries. The author might instance many facts which he had collected on this subject. He will be satisfied with foreign authorities. Cit. Rebmann, president of the special tribunal of Mayence, in his Coup-d'œil sur l'etat des quatres departements du Rhin, says that the number of malefactors in the Catholic and Protestant cantons, is in the proportion of four, if not six to one. At Augsburgh, the territory of which offers a mixture of the two religions, of 946 malefactors, convicted in the course of ten years, there were only 184 Protestants, that is to say, less than one in five. The celebrated philanthropist Howard observed that the prisons of Italy were incessantly crowded: at Venice, he has seen three or four hundred prisoners in the principal prison; at Naples, 980 in the

The activity impressed on the public spirit of each state by the reformation, was therefore naturally directed to the objects of public interest of the state. The science of cameralistics taught the administration of the national revenues; agriculture and commerce had their libraries, and were raised above a daily routine, by the inquiries of genius, and the assistance derived from the other sciences, such as geography and navigation, which, in their turn, also received improvement. The knowledge of the mechanical arts, and of all the objects of human industry, under the name of technology, resumed a rank among the sciences which it had lost since Pliny; finally it must not be forgotten that, on the Protestant soil, was born and brought to perfection, statistics, a science which forms an account of the resources of every country, and of which, statesmen, even of Catholic countries, begin to perceive all the importance. The study of all these objects has long been a part of the public instruction among the Protestants; and their universities, at which all the subjects who fill posts in the state, of greater or less importance, are formed, are provided with professors of the political and cameralistic sciences, of public and rural economy, commerce, technology, and statistics. It is known how many good works, on these subjects, were produced by the Germans, English, Scotch, Dutch, and Swiss, before they were generally cultivated in the remainder of Europe. It was among the Dutch that Colbert acquired the greatest part of his knowledge; Peter I. learnt much of the art of governing in their school; no one is ignorant that it was from the example of the great Frederick that Joseph II. and his brother Leopold conceived the plans of regeneration, which one formed for his Austrian states, and the other for Tuscany.*

Almost all the system of knowledge to be acquired having changed its aspect, it was very necessary that a considerable change should also be effected in the system of public instruction. Luther was the first who felt the necessity of a reform in this department, and who laboured effectually to produce it.† Melancthon, and the other principal reformers being also, like Luther, professors of universities, turned their attention to these establishments, and to the secondary schools. They purged them, as far as circumstances would admit, from the vices of that monarchal and scholastic period. That which they could not themselves effect, was brought about, by degrees, and very naturally, in the end, by the proper spirit which they had introduced. It is remarkable that, during the three last centuries, besides a great number of gymnasia, lycea, and other schools, Germany has been enriched with upwards of twenty universities, three-fourths of which are Protestant.‡ England has founded three, and Holland five.§ On the Catholic side, six have been founded in Italy, eight in Spain, and three in France. The Protestants have not only the advantage of the plurality, which might be equivocal; but no reasonable person will doubt that they have also the advantage in respect of the instruction which is given at these universities. It will not, I am of opinion, be thought a very inconsistent paradox, to say that there is more real knowledge in one single university, as that of Gottingen, or Halle, or Jena, than in the eight Spanish universities of San Jago de Compostella, Alcala, Orihuela, etc. In these, they teach what must, with or without the consent of reason, be believed: in the others they teach how a reasonable belief may be acquired, on any subject whatever. Here, the Decretals are given for infallible oracles; there, no other oracle is acknowledged but reason, and the best supported facts. From all these considerations, it is natural that pedantry, the offspring of scholastics, must be infinitely more uncommon in succursal prison alone, called Vicaria; while he affirms that the prisons of Berne are almost always empty; that in those of Lausanne he did not find any prisoner; and only three individuals in a state of arrest at Schaffhausen. Here are facts; I do not draw any conclusion.

* Who has travelled and not been struck with the slovenliness which reigns, almost universally, in the Catholic countries, and which contrasts so strongly with the extreme neatness of the Protestant countries of the north, of Holland, and of England? Whence arise the apathy on the one side, and the activity on the other? Whence the spirit of order and industry to the one, to the others, carelessness and indolence? The reason is very evident.

† Haller found all the plants of Europe, from those of the southernmost countries to those of Lapland, in the Valais.

‡ If we pass from the culture of lands to that of minds, Switzerland will offer the same contrasts. How many celebrated men of letters have sprung from Geneva, whom literature and the sciences called with pride among us! Berne, Lausanne, Basle, Zurich, Schaffhausen, have their literary annals filled with celebrated names. The antiquarian Morel; Haller, the creator of physiology, and also a great poet; Crouzas; the Buxtorfs; the Werenfels; Bernouilli; Euler; Iselin, the first who conceived the idea of writing a philosophical history of the human race; the Wettsteins, (and all the booksellers and printers of Basle who, from the dawning of the sixteenth century, have undertaken enterprises so immense and so fruitful in results,) Gessner, the naturalist and restorer of the natural sciences: Gessner, the bucolick poet: some other German poets, such as Bodmer, etc. who have contributed so much to the restoration of elegant literature in Germany, who have restored it to national independence and originality: in short, a multiplicity of authors whom it would be superfluous to name. Catholic Switzerland, on the contrary, has not a single man of eminence, of any description, to mention.

* This is the place to observe that the more liberty of thinking and public spirit are diffused through a nation, the more also the communications become free and active between all the parts which compose the public, and between all the classes of the nation. The journals, newspapers, and periodical writings in the Protestant countries exhibit those general dispositions in the highest degree, which are common both to the authors and readers of these productions. There they are the objects of an attention much more universal and more serious, than they are in Spain or Italy, and than they were in France until 1789. For which reason I do not fear being contradicted by facts, when I state that the journals, whether political or literary, of England, Holland and Saxon Germany, have a consistence and organization, of which, perhaps, a very just idea is not generally formed in other countries.

† Seelen has written a very good treatise entitled, Lutherus de scholis optime meritus, 1716.

‡ If the Protestants have founded and endowed a great number of schools, it is because their existence depends upon being the best informed; it is because the reformation is essentially learned; it has received its impulse from science, and can only be supported by science. Knowledge is an affair of state in the reformed nations.

§ I also omit noticing those which have been erected in Switzerland, Sweden and Denmark, the Protestant university of Dorpa in Livonia, etc.

the Protestant schools than in the others. Some external forms, differing from those in use with us, have given rise to a generally received, though very ill founded prejudice, that a German professor is a pedant: but manners different from ours; Latin or Greek quotations in a book where they may be very necessary, and other similar things, do not constitute pedantry; neither do the long robe and furred cap. The true essence of a pedant is to be an enemy to reason, and to liberal inquiry in the sciences; to have a slavish belief in the authority of some other person, and, in his turn, to put in a despotic claim to make his own arbitrarily valid. If such is, in fact, a pedant, it will be acknowledged that the learned Protestants can have little title to the appellation; they, whose principal maxim is inquiry, the free use of his own reason to every reasonable being, and a liberation from all authority. This disposition tends rather to literary humanity, and should be considered as the direct antipode of pedantry. The science of instruction and that of education therefore must have gained from the new spirit which regulated learning. The pedegogic[*] science was brought to perfection. Bacon, who is always referred to when a better discipline for the intellectual man is in discussion; Comènius, the celebrated author of the Janua linguarum; Stourm, Locke, and several others, laid the foundations of a better system of education. It is from their examples that the Fenelons, Lachalotais, Schlæzers and Pestalozzi have spoken; it is their language which the citizen of Geneva has overcharged in his sublime hyperboles. In short, it is to all these great men, it is to the memorable event which unfettered their tongues, that the present and future generations are indebted for the mildest, and, at the same time, the most efficacious methods of their culture and their instruction.

It has been shown, in the preceding article, how much history had gained since the reformation, by the freedom of criticism, and by the depth of research. It remains to be added that, since that period, it has been treated in a more philosophical manner. Great lessons and great precepts have been drawn from it. The mind, become more scrutinizing, has endeavoured to bring together the unformed aggregate of scattered facts; it has seized a guiding clew in the labyrinth of ages; in it, it has discovered the progress of humanity; and hence arose the philosophy of history. The Scotch and the English productions, of this description, are known particularly in France, as those of France are to all Europe. Those of the Germans are less so, although they have a very considerable number of works worthy of being known, and included in the general classification of the history of improvement, which holds a medium between political and literary history, participating of both. Opinions are, however, divided in these meditations on the destiny of the human race. Some only see in it the tempestuous fluctuations of a boundless ocean; a blind and endless series of crimes, absurdities, and barbarisms; some fortunate moments succeeded by terrible relapses; chance dictating its pauses, necessity executing them, and crushing with its iron hand the successive generations which it plunges into the gulf of oblivion. Others, of a more consolatory opinion, see, in the progressive course of the human race, a conducting Providence, an approach towards a better state, towards a civil and moral perfection. There are many Protestants who abide by the latter opinion, and endeavour to demonstrate its certainty. Those who think that a more reasonable and a more happy state has, through the influence of the reformation, been the consequence of a commotion so terrible, so universal, and so long, in Europe, must be permitted to give credit to this sublime conception of the perfectibility of our species. Perhaps those who are of a contrary opinion owe it to being placed in contrary circumstances, or else to some individual disposition, which does not allow them to suppose any possible perfection in their fellow-creatures.

With respect to the Mathematical and Physical Sciences.

At the first glance it appears that the reformation, the immediate impulse of which would be very perceptible in the study of the historical and philosophical sciences, could not, on the contrary, exercise any direct influence on that of the methodical and natural sciences. But if it be considered that a redoubled activity, an investigating disposition, implanted in the human mind by some great event, cannot remain inactive on anything within its scope, conviction will soon follow that the study of these sciences must also have been advantageously affected by the moral impulse given by the reformation. To this presumption, indicated by the nature of things, may also be joined this historical and local consideration, that, at the moment when Luther effected the reformation of the theological system at Wittemburg, at sixty miles from it, in another city of the north, Copernicus prepared that of the astronomical system. These two revolutions, being effected by two contemporaries, it is not easy to discover, with precision, how much the one promoted the other, what have been the results of their combination, nor what are the effects which belong strictly to each of them. For this it would have been necessary to have penetrated into the recesses of all thoughts, and to have followed the most hidden steps of the progress of the human mind, of which, at present few traces and memorials remain. We may, however, observe, as we did at the commencement of this second part, that sheltered by the Ægis of the reform, the Galileans were, at the least, freed from the dread of chains, and from the disgrace of recantations. It was under the protection of this Ægis that Kepler completed the work of Copernicus, and gave geometrical certainty to the new system, which, probably in the eyes of its author, rested on a conviction purely logical. It is also remarkable, whatever may have been the cause, that the two inventors of the differential calculation Leibnitz and Newton lived, the one in Protestant Germany, and the other in England. The Catholic countries, as well as the Protestant, have since had an equal number of great mathematicians and great philosophers. It is, however, just to suppose that the superior guidance of study and the greater freedom of investigation, are among the causes which have contributed most powerfully to make these beautiful branches of the tree of human knowledge flourish.[*] But above all, it is certain that the philosophical spirit, fomented, as has been shown, by the reformation, exercised its influence in a very marked manner on the study of mathematics and physics. It was not enough to extend and perfectionate these sciences in themselves, it was also wished to unveil the sublime theory, to scrutinize their foundations, and fix their bases; scientific men of the Protestant persuasion attached themselves more to these species of investigation than those of Catholic countries, who do not seem to have set so high a value on them.[†]

The philosophy of nature, a science distinct from that called general physics, also acquired a consistence and developements which make it one of the most sublime branches of knowledge of which the genius of man can boast. It is to Kant also that it is indebted for its renovation and its principal bases. The intrepid Schelling has enriched it with the most sublime ideas. The system of Brown, which is only an organized philosophy of nature originated in Scotland; has been cultivated and developed in Germany; and is despised in France, where it is hitherto only imperfectly known.

With respect to the military science, which is usually treated as an appendix to the mathematical sciences, the north of Germany seems, in modern times, to have been destined to furnish it with its principal additions. The infant state of tactics before the thirty years' war is known, Gustavus Adolphus was its reformer, and under him, this art acquired a new aspect in the fields of Saxony and Bohemia. On this same soil, Frederick II. King of Prussia, nearly a century later, also contending against the same house of Austria, which had been humbled by the Swedish hero, completed the work of Gustavus Adolphus, and brought modern tactics to a degree of perfection, at which it will no doubt remain for the future, as far as regards its essential elements.

With respect to the Belles Lettres, and to Modern languages.

Since the reformation redoubled the ardour for a knowledge of the ancient languages, the study of which it rendered more necessary and more general, as well among the Catholics as among the Protestants, it cannot be denied that it contributed greatly to the culture of the belles lettres, and to the restoration of a good taste. In proportion as the classic works of antiquity, those eternal models of the beautiful; genuine and sublime as nature, were more dispersed and read, men's minds were gradually elevated to their pitch, and shook off the barbarism of the Gothic ages.* This revolution had been commenced in Italy by the Greek refugees, who had fixed themselves there in particular. The reformation assisted in propagating its benefits to the European nations farthest distant from this focus.

[*] I beg pardon for this word; it means simply the science of education in some countries of Europe, where useful and respectable things are not given up to the sarcasms of frivolity.

[*] See the dissertation of Wucherer on this subject; De incrementis physices a reformationis tempore.

[†] It was Kant who first established the principles of a theory of mathematical certainty, and the evidence which is admitted in metaphysics, on occasion of the question proposed on this subject, in 1771, by the academy of Berlin.

Nevertheless, a language in which they might give vent to their ideas, a flexible and living organ, by which they might express their living conceptions, was necessary to those, in whom the spark of ancient genius had kindled an enthusiasm. The modern idioms were in the uncultivated, rude state in which long want of use had plunged them. In the south alone, the Italian, and, perhaps, the Provençal, its ally, had assumed a purer form. In the rest of Europe they wrote in Latin; Latin was the language of the schools and the books; and what Latin! a jargon bearing all the blemishes of eleven centuries of corruption and bad taste. Although the reading of Cicero, and the other masters of good Latin might have ameliorated and purified this jargon, whether good or bad, as in fact it did, this Latin was only the language of a very small number of individuals, and remained a dead letter to the people. Now the higher sciences may, without inconvenience, be well expressed in the language of the adepts; the learned might treat on subjects in Latin, which only the learned were to read; in this manner mathematics, physics, philosophy, might be tolerably cultivated. But how could they have a literature, without a vulgar tongue, without a people, or, as it may be said, without a public? Every one has a right to decide on productions of taste and sentiment: the auditory of a wit or a poet cannot be restrained to Latin scholars; he requires all classes, all ages, all sexes; he must speak the language of courts and of taverns, of closets and camps, of citizens and peasants; his business is with all minds, all hearts, and more particularly those most ingenuous, most open to all impressions, with those who know least of Latin. While Vaniere can scarcely number a hundred readers, Delille will find thousands. In order, therefore, that each nation might have a literature, it was necessary to write in its language; it was necessary that all classes should be accustomed to read; a great event, a powerful interest, a subject which should become the favourite topic of every one, which should agitate all minds, which should find access every where, was wanted; then alone would authors be found willing to write for the people, and a people who would read their writings with eagerness. The reformation was such an event, and became the active source of a general and inexhaustible interest to all classes.

The reformation, conceived by men of learning, and brought forth within the narrow boundary of a Latin speaking public, could never have been consummated, if it had remained within these limits. It was requisite that it should quit them, that it should become the cause of the multitude, that it should gain millions of heads, to arm millions of hands in its favour. An appeal to the people was the first step of the reformist, and this must necessarily be made in their language. When once the people were, in this manner, called upon and made judges, the opponents of the reform were also compelled to appear and plead at this tribunal, and were not sparing in their efforts to retain or bring back the multitude to their side. This controversy, which had left the schools, and become the great business of the whole of Europe, was the first active principle by which modern languages were really fertilized. Before they were only jargons, as rude as the vulgar who made use of them. A few amorous sonnets were not enough to give them that richness and flexibility which they required, to become capable of treating on all descriptions of subjects. The universal animosity between the Papists and the Reformists; the long troubles of Germany and Swizerland; those of the league in France; those of the Low Countries; those of Scotland and England, became so many furnaces in which the different languages of these countries were elaborated and purified. In his Histoire de l' Esprit Humain,† the Marquis D'Argens, after having described the state of letters previous to the sixteenth century, says, "In these times of ignorance Luther appeared, like one of those cheering lights, which after a long tempest, announces to mariners an approaching calm. This great man did as much good to science, as he did injury to the court of Rome. He showed the absurdity of the errors which long respect and ancient custom had rendered sacred; he not only ridiculed the opinions of the theologians, but their language and their manner of writing. He was seconded in his undertakings by Calvin, and it is to these disputes on religion that we are indebted for the restoration of the fine and good style. The theologians of the different parties eagerly strove with each other to write correctly, and to prejudice their readers by the purity of their style."

The German nation acknowledges Luther for the reformer of its literature and its idiom. One of his first cares was to publish a faithful translation of the Bible in the vulgar tongue, executed by him and some of his co-operators, from the original. It may be conceived with what avidity this immense work was received, and what a general sensation it excited. It is still taken as authority, and is the principal classic foundation of what is called high German. In this idiom he wrote the greater part of his treatises, letters, discourses, and poems, the collection of which forms twenty-two quarto volumes. One of his first writings was that entitled, Of the Christian Liberty, at the head of which he placed an epistle dedicatory, as decent as open and liberal, to Pope Leo X. "No writer for many ages (says M. Georges Muller, of Schaffhausen, in his Lettres sur les Sciences,) had seen his writings bought up with such avidity, and so universally read from the throne to the cottage. They were all reprinted several times, pirated, hawked over all the empire. The popularity, the natural ease, the energy of expression which prevailed in them, a doctrine which cheered and elevated the soul, gained him the most upright and judicious of all classes. A multiplicity of pamphlets, loose sheets, songs, which have reached us from that period, testify the universal ecstasy which this vivifying light inspired." Wickliff had previously translated the New Testament into English; as soon as the reformation had rendered the reading of the sacred books of the first necessity to the people of England, Tindal, Roye* and others published a version of them. The same thing occurred in France, where the reformation multiplied the French Bibles, and placed them in the hands of every one.† When the Catholic theologians saw these great mysteries of religion become the prey of the ignorant, they resolved to countermine them, and to publish also their translations, their commentaries, their explanations of the sacred books. We shall content ourselves with observing, generally, that the European languages were perfectionated by these religious and political controversies, by these translations and explanations, which is sufficient to the object in discussion.‡

It would, doubtless, be hazarding too much, to say more of the influence exerted on the belles lettres, by the reformation.§ So many different causes have contributed to their culture, and to the different modifications they have experienced, in the various European nations, that whoever enters this labyrinth will be in danger of missing his track, of blending objects, and of giving ingenious conjectures instead of certain results. The Protestant nations, which may be called the Germanic race, have such a similarity of features among them in their manners, language, and climate, that we must be careful of taking a conformity in the characters or genius of their literary productions, for the immediate effects of the great revolution which was common to them. The spirit of each people, so powerfully modified by such a number of events, and of generations, has its own tendencies, its natural dispositions, which cannot be attributed to one insulated circumstance. Without doubt, the unanimity with which the Protestant nations of the present day adopted the reform as soon as it presented itself, was only a result of this mutual conformity of their spirit. Their progress in this respect (the matter being adopted in general) has always tended to simplify religion, to render it more strict and more intellectual, remaining inviolably attached to deism, and to that morality which is the basis of it. The manners of the Protestant are are also incontestibly better and more grave, than those of the Catholic nations. Is it because these nations are Protestant, that they have acquired this character; or, is it because they have this character that they became Protestant? I must leave the decision of this question to others. I am only desirous of showing the influence of this character on the culture of the belles lettres. The French and Italian literature is rich in a multitude of works, in which love is treated with the most exquisite delicacy and grace; such a number of these agreeable productions would be sought for in vain, among the English or Germans; I might even dare to assert, that the few they have are merely imitative, and that they are not indigenous plants in their soil. Among them, love would not dare to appear escorted by the desires, and associated with voluptuousness. Their Boccaces, Grecourts and Lafontaines, have not yet been born. Should they appear they would be coldly received; and it was not by the softened imitations of this description, which Wieland hazarded, that he conciliated the most of the esteem of his countrymen. In a word, their songs, their romances, the ideal world of their poets, are totally different from what is seen among their neighbours. I dare not give this as a consequence of the reformation, but rather as a coincidence. It is, however, very deserving of notice, that the two most sublime epic poems, in which the God of Christians, and the inhabitants of heaven are the actors, and in which these actors speak a language worthy of them; the two most wonderful pictures of celestial innocence and virtue, that of the fall of the first human beings, and that of their redemption, are Protestant productions. If the too short golden age of Italian poetry had not produced the Jerusalem of Tasso, Paradise Lost and the Messiah would have been the only two epic poems of which modern literature could have boasted.

* This is probably intended for Rogers, who in conjunction with Coverdale, revised Tindal's translation, and added the prefaces and notes from Luther's Bible. This translation was dedicated to Henry VIII. in the feigned name of Thomas Matthews, and is known by the name of Matthews's Bible. T.

† It is true that in his Histoire Critique du Vieux Testament, p. 332, Father Simon asserts that the first French Bible was that of Anvers, of 1530, revised by the theologians of Louvain, and that thus "it was the Catholics who were the first authors of the French Bibles read at present." But Father Simon did not know that that Bible was the work of Jacques Lefebvre of Estaples, commonly called Father Stapulensis, the confidant of the queen of Navarre, suspected with good reason of being a partisan of Luther, declared to be a heretic by the Sorbonne, and deprived of his doctorate. This translation of the Bible was also used as the basis of that of Geneva.

‡ We must not omit here the real services rendered by Bayle to the French language, which he contributed greatly to the production of a taste for, which he made capable of being modelled to every subject, and even of treating on matters which before had only been treated of in Latin.

§ Nevertheless it may also be added, that the inhabitants of the towns and the country, who hear divine service regularly in their own tongue, who sing psalms, canticles, and rich pieces of poetry in it, written, as they are in Germany, by the best national poets, acquire by that means a crowd of ideas, a taste and a notion of the beautiful, which can never be attained by those who assist at a service performed in bad Latin, which they do not understand.

Finally, the investigating and reasoning spirit, to which the reformation opened a free career, as has been shown above, was also introduced into the domain of the imagination, and took such a post in it as it was capable of, that is to say, it took refuge in the theoretic department of the belles lettres, in the systems connected with sentiment, taste, the beautiful and sublime, &c.

It is known, that in proportion, the Protestant literati have done more on these subjects, and perhaps, have penetrated more deeply into them than the others. It is among them that the rational part of literary criticism has assumed the form of a science, under the name of Esthetics. This name was given to it by Baumgarten, a German, from a Greek word signifying sentiment. Lessing, as well as Sulzur and his followers, have published some valuable pieces of this description. Kant has founded a new esthetic school, in his Criticism on the Judgment. He has had numerous and ingenious disciples; the most remarkable among them, both in theory and in practice, is the illustrious Schiller.

With respect to the Fine Arts.

It is when a pompous worship requires magnificent temples, imposing ceremonies, and a striking appearance; it is when religion exhibits the sensible images of the objects of public veneration, when it rests on a sacred mythology; when the earth and the heavens are peopled with supernatural beings, to whom the imagination can lend a form; it is then, I say, that the arts, encouraged, ennobled, reach the summit of their splendour and their perfection. The architect, called to honours and wealth, conceives the plan of these basilisks, these cathedrals, the appearance of which inspires a religious awe; of which the rich walls are decorated with the master-pieces of art. This temple, these altars are adorned with marble and the precious metals, out of which sculpture has formed angels, the blessed, and images of illustrious men. The choirs, the galleries, the chapels, the sacristies, are decorated with pictures hung in all parts. Here, Jesus dies on the cross; there he appears on Tabor, in all the resplendence of divine majesty. Art, so much the friend of the imagination, which can find gratification only in the heavens, goes there in search of its most sublime creations; a St. John, a Cecilia, and more particularly, a Mary, that patroness of all tender and ardent minds, that virgin model of all mothers, the mediatrix of mercy between man and his God, the august and touching Elysian being, of which no other religion offers a resemblance or a model. During the solemnities, the choicest stuffs, precious stones, and embroidery cover the altars, the vessels, the priests and even the partitions of the holy place. By the most exquisite songs, by the harmony of orchestras, music completes the charm. These encouragements, of such powerful efficacy, are renewed in a hundred different places; the metropolises, the parishes, the numerous convents, the simple oratories, vie in splendour, and captivate all the powers of the religious and devout soul. Thus the taste for the arts, assisted by such a powerful lever, becomes general; artists are multiplied, and rival each other in their efforts. Through this influence, the celebrated schools of Italy and Flanders flourished, and those most beautiful productions of them which remain to us, testify the richness of the encouragement lavished on them by the Catholic worship.

From the natural course of things, it cannot be doubted that the reformation was unfavourable to the fine arts, and laid a considerable restraint upon the exercise of them. It broke the bond which united them to religion, which rendered them sacred, and secured them a share in the veneration of the people. The liturgy of the Lutherans, and still more that of the Calvinists, is simple and strict. A stone, a cloth, form the altar; a pulpit and benches are all the decoration necessary to the temple. Here nothing is thought of but the gospel, and some divine songs on morality and the Christian duties, sung by the congregation. All is devoid of ornament, pomp and elegance. The priest is clothed in a modest black garment; no veneration of a saint or an angel, and still less of their images, is recommended to pious souls. It might be said that this worship is melancholy and dry, in comparison with that of the Catholics, if, however, an assembly of persons collected to worship in common, can really correspond with the idea of melancholy. Nevertheless it is certain, that this worship which can elevate the soul, tends to disenchant the imagination; it renders superb churches, and statues, and paintings superfluous; it depopulates the arts, and deprives them of one of their most powerful resources.

Besides this general disposition peculiar to a worship which keeps so rigidly close to the pure spirit of the primitive church, and which does not admit of any coquetry with the senses, the particular disposition of the nations which have embraced the reform must be considered. The greater part of them inhabit the severest climate of Europe. They are colder, more phlegmatic, more thoughtful than those of the south; they have not nature before their eyes in so beautiful a form; they do not respire that voluptuous, soft, intoxicating air of the Italian atmosphere. Independent of the reformation, therefore, they are not so well placed, so well constituted for the practice of the arts, as the Italians for example. Without doubt they have had, and still have, esteemed artists, but not such as to excel those of Italy, or even to counterbalance them. Their real merit in the arts, and which arises from their reflecting, scrutinizing spirit, is that of treating the theory with more penetration; of observing and investigating the principles which, unknown to them, direct the great artists; of tracing the course of the imagination, and the understanding in their productions; of discovering the connections between the ideal nature of the arts, and real nature; in a word, of developing the principles and philosophy of the arts. The Italian feels and produces; Hemsterhuys, Kant, Burke, Goethe, think, analyze the production, and the faculty of producing. The one has the instinct of art; the other, the intelligence. The one creates; the other judges of the creation, and calculates its laws. These two functions equally presuppose genius. The first displays it externally, in visible forms; the second, in the depths of the understanding. This may be named the legislative power; that, the executive power of the fine arts.

RESULTS OF THE EVENTS WHICH HAVE ACCOMPANIED AND FOLLOWED THE REFORMATION.

Troubles and Wars in the Political World.—Controversies in the Theological World.

If the reformation had only affected doctrine, and Luther had only attacked transubstantiation, or pardons, such an obscure quarrel would have remained in the schools, and scarcely have obtained the honours of a bull of condemnation. The holy father, would, unconcernedly, have treated the new heretic like a thousand others who have passed by without creating an epocha. The nations and the princes would have been wholly ignorant of a quarrel which was not theirs. But Luther not only attacked the spirit, or the doctrine of popery; he from the first, struck at the most sensible part of the temporals of the church, and began the heresy with the apostolical finances. From thenceforward no one could remain indifferent; those who raised the tribute made a great outcry; those who were freed from the payment of it, declared strenuously for the innovators. The most powerful of the Christian princes, however, those who have threatened the independence of all the others, thought proper to support the rights of Rome. The others, who, in this conjuncture saw the double opportunity of freeing themselves at the same time, from the papal despotism, and from the yoke of Austria, resolved to arm in defence of the reform, and suffered themselves to be carried down the torrent with their people. Hence also resulted this double misfortune, that the wars which arose, took a religious and a fanatic character; consequently, more animated, more dreadful, and more sanguinary than that of other wars; and that the controversies of the theologians acquired a political importance, a universality which rendered their effects more fatal, more durable, and more extensive than those of all the numerous controversies which had, at any former time, agitated the Christian church.

These were the sources of the evils, of the horrible catastrophes, which accompanied and followed the reformation; such were the causes of a century and a half of a mortal crisis, of sanguinary wars, of revolts, and of troubles in Europe. A spark which Luther had struck to light a torch, fell among heaps of powder, in a country wholly mined. The explosion shook all the west, and seemed likely to bring back the night of barbarism which had been begun to be dissipated; but fortunately the torch had been lighted; and when the clouds of vapour emitted from the volcano began to disperse, its beneficent light shone like a star which had been darkened by a tempest, but, on the return of serenity, serves to restore the pilot to his course.

It may, therefore, be truly said, with some of the opponents of the reformation, that, at the moment, it forced the reign of knowledge and the culture of the sciences to retrograde. Let us figure to ourselves the unheard-of devastations to which unfortunate Germany became a prey; the war of the peasants in Suabia; that of the Anabaptists of Munster; that of the league of Smalcald against Charles V. Finally, that dreadful one which lasted until the treaty of Westphalia, and also after this treaty, until its complete execution. The empire was changed by it into a vast cemetery, in which two generations were swallowed up, where cities were only smoking ruins, and heaps of ashes: the schools deserted and without masters; agriculture destroyed; manufactures burnt. To this may be added, that, on this desolated land, men's minds were soured, disunited, exasperated by their long divisions; Catholics, Lutherans, Calvinists, Anabaptists, Moravians, all accused and attributed to each other the lamentable wounds of their common country, of that country which was not only torn by its own children, but so long exposed to the troops of Spain and Italy, to the fanatics of Bohemia, to hordes of Turks, to the French, Swedish and Danish armies, who vied with each other in bringing into it the carnage and desolations of war, such as was carried on in the seventeenth century, and which had the characters of a civil and religious war. A country requires a very long space of time to recover from such a commotion and so deep a ruin. Consequently we see the German nation, after having, at first, made very great strides in the sciences, during the peace which was maintained while Luther lived, fall, for a part of the seventeenth century, into a sort of stupor, into an almost total want of culture. In this period, its literature remained behind that of the Italians, the French, and the English; and from thence may be dated the unfavourable prejudice against German talents, which is not yet wholly extinguished in the latter nations. Since this period the aspect of things has been greatly changed; but prejudices last longer than things; and the love of our own country, strengthened by a habit disposed to believe, and an indolence which checks examination, will, perhaps render this opinion very difficult to destroy.

It was not on its native soil alone, where its cause was contested with such inveteracy, that the reformation occasioned these destructive convulsions. France could not escape them; but the troubles of this county were neither so long nor so mischievous as those of Germany. The latter country was in the most deplorable state, when France had healed all her wounds, under Sully, Richelieu, and Mazarine, and had attained the summit of her literary and political glory. The Low Countries were the theatre of the convulsive struggle of Spain against the new Dutch republic. The evils resulting from it to this part of Europe, nearly equalled those of the rest of the empire. Finally, England became the prey of intestine commotions, which have been detailed above, in the article appropriated to that power. It is enough to be obliged to acknowledge that, since the irruption of the northern tribes into the Roman empire, no event had provoked such long and such universal ravages in Europe, as the war kindled in the furnace of the reformation. In this point of view, it is too true that it retarded the progress of the general culture; but when the conflagration was at an end, all the solid benefits derived from it appeared, in the better direction, the new activity, the liberty, it had given to the human mind, in the immense obstacles it had removed from its path, and which so invincibly shackled its progress.

I ask, besides, was it the reformation which called the princes and the nations to the combat? In its principle, the reformation was only the act by which reason declared itself emancipated, and freed from the yoke of arbitrary authority; an emancipation which was the natural and unavoidable consequence of the renovation of knowledge. Its object was to restore the gospel to Christians in its purity, to renounce the exorbitant claims of the popes. The adversaries of this reform were so enraged, so iniquitous, as to wish to stifle it in the blood of its sectaries. They alone are guilty of all the evils which followed. The terrible efforts made to annihilate the reform prove, to every reflecting mind, its great necessity.

A more direct reproach, and apparently a more just one, which may be brought against the reformation, is that of having rekindled, with inconceivable fury, the theological disputes, which interested all minds, were introduced into all places, and consumed so much knowledge, talents, assiduity and erudition, as were lavished in feeding their fire. The attention of the learned world was directed for upwards of a century to these calamitous quarrels of dogmas and forms, which became a new and powerful obstacle to the progress of the sciences. They strengthened the disposition for reveries and the extravagant mysticism of some ardent imaginations. Polemical disputations naturally arose, from the first, between the theologians of Rome and those of the reform; they were violent on both sides, and accompanied by contumely and insults.* The acrimony, too natural to such discussions and such circumstances, was propagated from year to year, and from controversy to controversy, and contributed greatly to giving the literary disputes of the times that followed, that strain of animosity which is more observable in this than in any other age.

* Luther is greatly reproached, and by Voltaire among others, for some invectives and contemptuous terms which he used against the Pope. Voltaire has employed much more indecent language himself, and with less reason, against his opponents. At the beginning, Luther showed himself very submissive and very respectful to the head of the church. He expressed himself at first, and also frequently afterwards, with great moderation and decency. But let us reflect on the horrible abuse with which he was loaded; let us read the libels of Hochstraten, Eckius, Tetzel, &c. and we shall see whether Luther ought to be condemned for the anger and indignation he occasionally manifested. If he had not been ardent and irritable, how could he have become the leader of so great a revolution? If his enemies had had him in their power, they would have burned him as they did John Huss. For his part, he was satisfied with turning them into ridicule, but he did not burn any one. Against adversaries who employ tortures and fire, is it an offence so heinous to employ sarcasms even though they should be in a bad taste? There was very little good taste in the sixteenth century. Besides, leisure and tranquillity are necessary to taste; and could leisure be allied with the clashing of all interests, and all passions? The language of Luther, sometimes violent, was never cruel and ferocious, like that of some of the popes. Clement VI. in the bull of anathema which he issued against the emperor Louis of Bavaria, expresses himself thus; "May God strike him with imbecility and madness; may heaven overwhelm

It was not between the Catholics and the innovators alone that the combat raged; but very ardent contests soon arose in the bosom of the reform itself, and between its partisans. I cannot here relate the history of all the sects and all the opinions which the unlimited liberty established by the reform gave rise to, in such numbers. These sects, all enemies of Rome, did not treat each other better than they treated the Papists. Besides the fanatic brotherhoods of Anabaptists Mennonites, Adamites, Muntzerians, Puritans, &c.; besides the violent contests on the doctrine of the sacraments, which Luther, Melancthon, and others had to support against Carlstadt, Œcolampadius, &c. there arose important schisms in the Evangelical Church, which were also allied to politics and were not without influence on the fate of the people. The Swiss reform declared itself against the Saxon reform, and the English church was established independent of both. The struggle between Lutheranism and Calvinism was violent and long.* So many vain disputes could not take place but at the expense of beneficial studies and useful knowledge, the culture of which was neglected on account of them.

This does not contradict what I have said above of the happy results of the moral impulse given by the reformation. I have given these results such as they really were in the end, and without confining myself to the order of time. It is thus that what may appear contradictory in that which I have formerly said, in favour, and that which I now say to the disadvantage of the reform, is to be understood and interpreted.

We may observe, however, that these religious disputes, which related only to the different opinions on theology and matters of faith, have contributed to keep up that living spirit of religion, and that attachment to Christianity in the Protestant countries, which is much less visible in Catholic countries. After all, it is better to dispute on religion than to agree quietly not to have any; to contend on the manner of adoring God, than not to believe in him at all, and to remain indifferent and lukewarm on what relates to our connection with the Divinity. It is also better, without doubt, to adore God sincerely, and to leave each individual at liberty to perform this high action in his own manner. This is precisely what, some sooner, and others later, the different reformed nations have come to. They began with wrangling and controversy; they finished with philosophy and toleration; and the spirit of religion remained with them.†

We may also observe, that this theological inquietude, which has produced so many useless and even injurious controversies among the Reformists, was not in any respect essential to the reformation, but belonged to the age, and to Christianity in general. The first Reformers were Catholic theologians, trained in the bosom of the Roman Church, and had communicated a captious irritability to their new doctrine. It was not because they were Lutherans or Calvinists that these new doctors were full of subtleties, were vain and petulent; it was because they had been Catholics, and were compelled to defend themselves without remission against the Catholic doctors. This spirit of disputation was, as we may suppose, transmitted to their immediate successors; but it was at length subdued and overpowered by the true spirit of the reform, which is the same as that of the Gospel, and by that of knowledge and philosophy, so powerfully seconded by the reform, which are not different from those of humanity and toleration.

Abelard and St. Bernard were not Reformists; neither were the two parties of the Franciscans, in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. To what a deluge of controversies and scholastic barbarisms did these two give rise! Since the time of the apostles, the Christian church has been constantly afflicted with this mania of sects, and debates on doctrine. From Simon the magician, Cerinthus and Ebbion to Jansenins, Quesnel, and the last days of the Sarbonne, nothing has been seen but disputes, the acrimony of parties, hatreds, condemnations. How could a sudden revolution be effected in this church, without bearing the same characters? How could such a volcano break out without discharging torrents of lava? Poor human reason had been so long captive in the schools of theology, that, at first, it was unable to make the most proper use of its liberty. A prisoner whose chains are struck off, the door of whose dungeon is thrown open, quits it with unsteady steps; his benumbed feet are unable to support him; the blaze of day, destined to enlighten him, makes him blind; he wanders about at hazard, strikes against every obstacle, falls and destroys himself.—Would it have been better, for this reason, to have left the man in his dungeon? The opponents of the reform say yes.

Secret Societies—Free-Masons—Rosicrucians—Mystics—Illuminati.

When a certain number of individuals, forming a feeble minority of a nation, feel themselves the depositories of opinions which they believe to be of importance, and which they dare not make public, because they think them dangerous to the multitude, or because they would expose themselves to persecutions by professing them openly, or from any other cause: then arises to these individuals the necessity of secret unions, in which they may profess their doctrine with freedom; an intimate fraternity between all the members of the association, oaths not to betray it, tests, signs to know each other in the midst of strangers, are necessary to them. Hence the mysteries of Egypt, of Greece, those of Pythagoras, &c.

There is no doubt that many of these mysterious fraternities have existed in Europe since the fall of the Roman empire, and that some of them may have passed through the middle age to reach us. But without attending to all the recitals, true or fabulous, which several of them give of their origin, and which frequently have no other foundation but a romantic tradition, deceitful symbols, and suppositious monuments, we shall only stop to observe that the nature of things never made these societies so necessary and so mysterious as they were rendered by the abuses of the hierarchial despotism, the inquisition, and the vexations of every kind exercised by the agents of Rome in the period which preceded the reformation. There was a considerable number of all classes whose eyes were opened to these abuses, and who perceived their enormity; but they carefully concealed in their souls, a secret, which, had it been divulged, would have condemned them to the flames. It was only when they met a tried friend apart, that they could communicate their sentiments; then their oppressed breasts were unburthened, they consoled each other, in a low voice, on the load with which him with its thunders; may the anger of God, with that of St. Peter and St. Paul, fall upon him in this world and in the next; may the whole universe revolt against him; may the earth swallow him up alive; may his name perish from the earliest generation; and may his memory disappear, may all the elements be adverse to him; may his children, delivered into the hands of his enemies, be crushed before the eyes of their father, &c." (Rainaldi, Ann. Eccles.) Such language did not prevent Petrarch, playing on the name of this pope, from saying that he was clemency itself; while Garasse and all his worthy successors delight in repeating that Luther was a clownish monk, a hot-headed heresiarch, and other pitiful things. Strange blindness of ignorance and fanaticism!

* If I have not taken greater notice of the schism between the Lutherans and Calvinists, it is because I had not to give an account of the influence of the reform on the religious doctrine and belief. There have been few results of this schism of any importance to the states, because the Calvinists have obtained the same rights as the Lutherans in the empire. It has only produced some misunderstandings and internal dissentions in the evangelical party, to which it has, for that reason, been hurtful. The electoral houses of Saxony and the Palatinate, among others, have had severe contests on this subject: but I cannot speak of them; my only object has been to give results of importance to the rest of Europe, these domestic bickerings of the reform are not of that description.

† The religious discussions had also some other good effects, from the favourable disposition to philosophical and speculative subjects which they kept up in men's minds. Would our great Descartes have founded a school; would his doctrine have occasioned the sensation it did, or, would it have produced the good it did produce, if he had not found both opponents and disciples, equally ardent, in Holland? Holland was the true focus of Cartesianism. It was there also that all those sheltered theologians, Saurin, Jarieu, Basnage, (as well as Beausobre, Lenfant and others at Berlin,) discussed and wrote, and whose books warmed the zeal of our Arnauld, Bossuet, and Nicole, in their answers, from which, as well as from the replics of their adversaries, we might select more than one master-piece, in works remarkable for the eloquence arising from a warmth of soul, for the beauty of style, and the erudition which is displayed in them.

they were borne down, and consulted on the means of uniting, and supporting themselves, and of forming a small circle within which the tyrants of the mind could not reach them. It is more than probable that such societies existed at the time of the reformation. The Wickliffites in England and Scotland, the Hussites in Bohemia, Silesia and Moravia, as well as the remains of the Albigenses in France, must, doubtless, have felt the want of a mutual communication, and also of a careful concealment; two conditions which are principally instrumental in the formation of these societies. How much more pressing and general must these circumstances have become, when the reformation broke out openly in Saxony, and everywhere redoubled the activity and watchfulness of the spies and inquisitors of Rome? There was not any Catholic country in which the principles of Luther had not gained a great number of partisans. The situation of these secret adherents of the reform was exceedingly perilous. A simple suspicion would have undone them, would have given them over to punishment. The extreme constraint they were under could only cease and receive some alleviation in the hidden conventicles of the most profound mystery. If the order of free-masons did not then take its rise, (that is to say, towards the close of the sixteenth, or beginning of the seventeenth century,) at least it received both new modifications and a new extension at that period. They have not yet found titles which are completely sheltered from criticism, or in which a formal mention of them is made, prior to the year 1610. The temple of Jerusalem, the strict filiation of the templars, belong probably to the mythology of this order, rather than to its history. There are ancient laws in existence which exclude the Catholics, and confine the order to the Protestants alone. The principles of equality and fraternity between the members, are very conformable to that seen at that time in several open and avowed sects. The geographical position of Bohemia and Saxony, from whence issued the light of reform, with respect to Scotland, England, and France, seems to explain the denomination of the East commonly used in their lodges. In the state of confusion and advancement of all nations, a conformity of opinion was of more importance to them than a conformity of country. A Lutheran of Bavaria was more attached to a Lutheran of Saxony, than to a Bavarian Catholic. The Swiss Calvinist, become the enemy of the Swiss Catholic, considered the French and Dutch Calvinist, as his true countrymen. The Scotch Puritan fraternized with the Englishmen of his sect, in despite of the national antipathy. Nevertheless the civil wars, these of nation against nation, long and sanguinary, which followed, particularly in England and Scotland often brought these brothers, the secret allies, to blows, and exposed them to the mutual danger of taking each other's lives. Each followed at random the colours under which his fortune had thrown him. How many soldiers, zealous Protestants at the bottom of their hearts, served in the imperial armies of Ferdinand, and in those of Philip II.! How many Calvinists in the army of the league, and Presbyterians in the ranks of the episcopals! A mysterious sign was, therefore, required, by which brother might be revealed to brother in the midst of the confusion and carnage. It is known that the Free-Masons have one destined to accomplish this object; and this alone seems evidently to prove that this order belongs to the sanguinary period of the wars of the seventeenth century, during which there are numerous examples of individuals being saved amidst the greatest perils, by their enemies themselves, who, by this sign, recognized them for fellows and brothers.

The state of disorder and fermentation in which the human mind was, in general, at the moment of Luther's appearance; the efforts which it made in various directions to arrive at the light, and escape from the darkness of the middle age, gave rise to several coincident events in the reign of science, which were mingled in a thousand different ways, both with the ideas of the religious sects of this period, and with the mysterious doctrine of the secret societies. A fanciful assemblage of aphorisms, called of Hermes, Pythagoras, and Plato, adapted to the Hebrew text of the books of the old Testament, and of those of some Rabbis, had renewed the Judaical reveries, known by the name of Cabbala. The sectaries of this obscure doctrine, called also by them the Hermetic, the Pythagorean, etc. philosophy, expected to find in them the sources of knowledge, of universal wisdom. Reuchlin, Zorzi and Agrippa gave it its consistence in the sixteenth century. Cardan and others added judicial astrology to it. The celebrated Swiss, Theophrastus Bombast de Hohenheim, better known by the name of Paracelsus, united his knowledge to the cabbala, and aimed at penetrating all the secrets of God, or of nature, which to him was the same thing. To find the primitive element, the great menstruum; to fix the light, and subject it to his operations; in a word, to find the philosopher's stone, to cure all diseases and to make gold, by its means, was the end, the great work of the new science, which its numerous partisans sometimes called theosophy, the philosophy of fire, etc. He who, after Paracelsus, gained it the most popularity, was the celebrated Englishman, Robert Fludd. In the laboratories of this sect were propagated the Oriental ideas of magic, of apparitions, of genii; ideas which prevailed about this time, and have not yet entirely ceased. The common doctrine of the groundwork of all these cabbalists, astrologers, and alchemists, was the pantheism of the school of Alexandria; and, consequently, through all its variations, a sort of Platonism, which, as such, would oppose, with all its powers, the famous Aristotleism, defended by the scholastics, and the principal support of the Roman theology.* The Protestant sects, the enemies of Rome, received therefore, and gave credit to all these novelties, introduced, principally, in the secret associations of which we have spoken, and which sometimes were open to these magicians, blowers of gold, etc.

The religious ideas of every description, from the most extravagant cabbala, to the most rational Protestantism; the moral ideas of equality, of fraternity, and of beneficence among all men; those of judicial astrology, of theosophy and alchemy, with all their shades and consequences; such were the elements, so various and so heterogeneous, of which the mysterious basis of the secrets of all these new associations was composed. According as an individual or a lodge adopted more particularly one or other of these views, its doctrine tended more to religious mysticism, or to political mysticism, or to astrology, or to alchemy, etc. Gradually, however, the elements purely moral were separated entirely from the mysteries of alchemy, and of the philosopher's stone. They took refuge in the society so well known by the name of Free-Masonry, which, whether its origin ascends higher than the reformation or not, received a new growth and a new vigour from it. For a long time, since the religious troubles have been calmed in Europe, and all the Christian sects are allowed in it, this estimable society has only retained some of the mysterious forms of its infancy, a secret which only seems to be preserved to render the association more connected or more enticing, and a great respect for the sacred books, which was the characteristic feature of Protestantism. The remainder became the portion of the Rosicrucians, who notwithstanding the imposing history of their pretended founder, Rosencreutz, and of his interment; notwithstanding the rose surmounted with a cross borne by Luther on his seal, according to all appearance, owes its origin to a Wittembergian theologian, Valentine Andreœ, who established it there with a good design, but afterwards withdrew from it.†

Sometimes the religious ideas of the theosophists remained united with their metaphysical pantheism, with their mythology of supernatural beings, with their chemistry, with their manner of seeing nature. From this the most eccentric and sometimes the most whimsical doctrine was produced in some heads which gave way to this medley. The most famous of these mystical theosophists was a shoemaker of Goerlitz in Lusatia, Jacob Bœhm, whose writings, being read with avidity, created him a multitude of sectaries over all the north of Europe; there are also among them, some very illustrious for their knowledge; I shall only instance the two Van Helments, father and son, of Brussels, and Peter Poiret, of Metz. At a period very near our own, we also reckon Swedenbourg, and all the sect of Martinists, among whom Paracelsus and Bœhm are likewise held in great esteem. It is certain that this Bœhm, and some other mystics, have been men of extraordinary genius; and that some of their ideas merit as honourable a rank in the sublime philosophy, as certain discoveries of Paracelsus deserve in chemistry. If, as Seneca says, there is no great genius without some mixture of folly, perhaps, also, there is no great folly without some mixture of genius.

* It cannot be denied that these theosophists, as well as the reformist theologians, prepared the way for Descartes, in the mortal war which he waged against the remains of the scholastic philosophy. It is impossible to understand the writings of this philosopher, or those of his disciples or adversaries, such as, Vœitus, Gassendi, Poiret, etc. and, generally of all the philosophical works of this period, without a perfect acquaintance with the key of the labours of the reformers, and of those of the sectaries of Paracelsus.

† A work will shortly be published in Germany by the learned M. Buhle, professor of philosophy in the university of Gottingen, which will make what is advanced here on the origin of Masonry evident, and will exhibit all the proofs. M. Buhle has already read a Latin dissertation on the same subject to the Royal Society of Sciences at Gottingen, at the end of 1802, and an extract from this piece appeared in the literary papers of the same city, in January, 1803, Nos. 7 and 8.

However this may be, these secret societies were not without some influence on the moral culture, and also on the events which have occurred in Europe since the reformation. It was, therefore, to our purpose to notice the influence which this had on their existence. On these have been grafted and modelled some more recent associations, of which the best known is the order of the Illuminati, a general denomination which have served as a mask and a pretext to much knavery. The purpose of the real Illuminati, as I believe, was no other than to propogate knowledge and to realize liberal ideas of the rights of nature, by founding a society of energetic and well meaning men, who might labour with all their united strength against a certain system of obscurantism which tended towards a return to barbarism, and which was efficaciously supported by some courts. The Illuminati, during the short period of their existence, neglected no means to make their intentions triumph, and to subject all the great men of the earth to them. In this view they may be considered as the Jesuits of philosophy, and the apostles of a political sect whose belief is founded on this agreeable dream, that virtue and talents should have precedency and authority among men.

Jesuits, Jansenists, etc.

The sixteenth century saw Luther and Loyola arise almost at the same instant, the one in the north, and the other in the south of Europe: the latter, sprung from Spain, seems to be a natural product of the soil and of the spirit of Saxony. A century earlier, Loyola would probably only have founded an order like many others, a fraternity of worshippers of the Virgin, for whom he had a great veneration. The religious innovations which, at this time, menaced the existence of the Roman church, gave the enthusiasm of the devout and warlike Ignatius, another direction; he conceived the idea of a sort of spiritual crusade against heresy. After some doubts his plan was vigorously adopted at Rome, and they thought seriously of this new society as of a formidable phalanx, which might be opposed to the most violent champions of the reform. It is, therefore, as has been already observed, to the reaction provoked by the latter, that the species of existence which the company of Jesus had, must be attributed. It will, perhaps, be agreeable to see the identical words of Damianus, one of the first historians of the society, who expresses himself thus, in his Synopsis Historiæ Soc. Jes. primo fæculo, printed in 1610.*

"In the same year, 1521, Luther, moved by a consummate malice, declared war openly against the church: wounded in the fortress of Pampeluna, having become better, and, as it were, stronger, from his wound, Ignatius raised the standard in defence of religion.

"Luther attacks the see of St. Peter, with insults and blasphemies: Ignatius, as if to undertake his cause, is miraculously cured by St. Peter.

"Luther, subdued by rage, ambition, and lust. quits a religious life: Ignatius, eagerly obeying the call of God, changes from a profane to a religious life.

"Sacrilegious Luther contracts an incestuous marriage with a holy virgin of God: Ignatius binds himself by a vow of perpetual continency.

"Luther contemns all the authority of his superiors: the first precepts of Ignatius, full of Christian humility, are to submit and obey.

"Luther declaims like a fury against the Holy See: Ignatius everywhere supports it.

"Luther draws as many from it as he can: Ignatius conciliates and brings back as many to it as he can.

"All Luther's studies and enterprises are directed against it: Ignatius, by a special vow, consecrates his labours, with those of his associates, to it.

"Luther detracts from the veneration and worship of the sacred rites of the church: Ignatius maintains all veneration for them.

"The sacrifice of the mass, the eucharist, the mother of God, the tutelary saints, the indulgences of the pontiffs, and the things attacked by Luther with such fury, were objects which the industry of Ignatius and his companions was eagerly and continually employed in seeking new modes of celebrating.

"To this Luther, the disgrace of Germany, the hog of Epicurus, the destroyer of Europe, the accursed portent of the universe, the abomination of God and men, etc.... God, in his eternal wisdom, opposed Ignatius."

In fact, the new order performed the functions, prescribed for it from its cradle, with fidelity. A great number of Catholic associations and fraternities, to which the general unquiet gave rise about that epocha, appeared, and were eclipsed without glory, like those meteors which blaze for an instant in the atmosphere, and leave no trace behind them. The society of Jesus rose above the horizon like a formidable comet which spreads terror through the nations. Scarcely established, it rendered important services to the Holy See during the sitting of the Council of Trent, and powerfully influenced the decrees of that assembly. The ancient orders, and, in particular, the mendicants, were very envious of these new comers, who began with such lustre, and drew all consideration and all favours to themselves. This emulation redoubled the activity of those who were not Jesuits, and particularly of the Dominicans, who exercised the arm of the inquisition, entrusted to their direction, in a more dreadful manner than ever. Nevertheless, the Jesuits eclipsed all their rivals, and acquired the unlimited favour of the pontiffs, and an immense power over all the Catholic world. The missions were, to them and the popes, what colonies are to civil governments, a source of riches and power. At length this militia of the Holy See gradually became formidable to their masters. They were suspected of harbouring a secret design to appropriate to themselves the universal monarchy they were intended to reconquer for the popes. From this arose discussions, in which the society, oftener than once, showed themselves intractable, and made it appear that it knew the value of its services. But let us return to the immediate object of this article, to the influence of the Jesuits on the progress of knowledge.

It has been already said that they were intrusted with the greater part of the public instruction, in the Catholic states. Europe had already tasted of the tree of knowledge; its light had spread into all parts, and had made a rapid progress; it had become impossible to oppose it openly. The safest expedient now was, not to combat the science, but to get possession of it, to prevent it from being injurious; not being able to stop the torrent, it was necessary to dig a channel for it where it might fertilize the soil of the church instead of destroying it. To well informed adversaries, therefore, they determined to oppose men as well informed; the crafty companions of Ignatius were appointed to satisfy the universal desire to acquire knowledge manifested by the age. It was here that the inconceivable talent of the new preceptors of humanity was displayed. Their leading maxim was to cultivate, and bring to the highest possible degree of perfection, every species of knowledge from which no immediate danger could arise to the system of the hierarchical power, and by that means to acquire the estimation and celebrity of being the most able and most learned men of the Christian world. Assisted by this supremacy over opinion, it became easy for them either to paralyze the branches of knowledge which might bear fruit dangerous to the papacy, or to bend, direct, and graft these branches at pleasure. Thus, in inspiring a taste for the liberal sciences, the Greek and Roman classics, profane history, mathematics, they could conveniently stifle that of inquiring into matters of religion and state, the philosophical and investigating spirit. The philosophy taught in their schools was calculated to make this science repulsive and disgusting. It was no other than the scholastic, revised and corrected by them and applied to circumstances, particularly to the polemical controversy with the Reformists, whose arguments, as may readily be supposed, were brought forward in them so as to be destroyed by the artillery of the school. With respect to religion, the study of it was confined to the books of theology composed purposely by members of the society, to Jesuit casuists and moralists. The study of the original books of religion was withdrawn; or if the gospels and other pieces appeared sometimes in their works of devotion (and this was very necessary, since the translations, made by the reformed, were public,) it was with interpretations and even alterations conformable to the principal object of the society. Their grand rallying word was the utility of the sciences, and the lustre of the belles lettres. As to everything relating to a moral amelioration or the ennobling of mankind, as well as everything connected with the philosophical and theological sciences, the Jesuits strove eagerly, and, in fact succeeded, in making them be totally forgotten; in rendering theology and philosophy barbarous and full of difficulties, and even ridiculous, in the eyes of the bulk of mankind. Who can determine how much this Jesuitic mode of instruction, which became the reigning mode in the Catholic countries, and which differs so widely from the mode of instruction of the Protestants; how much, I say, this procedure, obstinately followed during several successive generations, might have influenced the species of culture and particular turn of mind among the Catholics, so different, in general, from what is seen among the Protestants?

(Synopsis, etc.—Lib. 1. Diss. VI. p. 18.)

It, however, results from all this (and I believe this consideration is the key to the contradictory judgments formed on the method of the Jesuits, in the culture of the sciences), that this society has rendered immense services to certain parts of literature, on which it has thrown light; but that, on the other hand, it has purposely kept certain other important parts in obscurity; or, it has so scattered the avenues with difficulties, that men were not tempted to engage in them; so that, taken in general, the instruction given in their schools, very brilliant on the one side, remained very dark on the other, was a partial and incomplete instruction, and put the mind in a wrong track; for, as on the one side, all was clear and bright, and, on the other, all was dark and mysterious, the eye naturally turned to that side which alone was luminous, and disdained to rest on the other, of which they were even habituated not to suspect the existence.

To model science according to the interests of the pontifical power, and even to render it ignorant where it was requisite it should be ignorant; to produce certain objects in open day, and to keep others in a profound night; to fertilize the reign of the memory and wit, by rendering that of the mind and the reason barren; to form enlightened, but submissive spirits, ignorant only of that which might lessen their submission, like those valuable slaves of the great men of antiquity, who were grammarians, poets, rhetoricians, skilful dancers, and musicians, knowing everything, but to be free; I do not dread being contradicted by any impartial man, in asserting that such were the tactics of instruction adopted by the Jesuits. They were profound and supremely calculated for their object. They could form illustrious and polished writers, learned men, orators, good Roman Catholics, nay, Jesuits, but not men, in the extensive acceptation of the term; whoever became a man under their regulations, became so, independent of these regulations, and, I shall add, almost in despite of them.*

Besides, if this system of papal infallibility and blind submission to the apostolic see, was incompatible with reason and the progress of knowledge, (which no moderate Catholic makes any difficulty of acknowledging at the present day,) ought we not to consider the existence of a learned society, the sole object of whose labours is to make reason itself and acquired knowledge subservient to the consolidation of a system inimical to reason and knowledge, as the most pernicious thing which can happen? If an ignorant Franciscan proclaimed ultramontane propositions from his pulpit, the danger was not great, and they might be refuted without difficulty; but when the learned and ingenious Jesuits of the college of Clermont proclaimed publicly in Paris, "that the pope was as infallible as Jesus Christ himself;" when they displayed all their knowledge and their talents to inculcate this principle, and to make it an article of faith,* it must be acknowledged, that then the danger became imminent, and that opinion was in danger of being irrevocably sophisticated. As nothing can be more fatal to the liberty of a people than a despotism which can render itself amiable and plausible, neither is anything more capable of vitiating the minds of men radically, than the knowledge of the art of rendering falshood, truth; and irrationality, reasonable.

It may be conceived how much the universal employment and the pretensions of the Jesuits must have excited envy and ill will in all classes. They wished to be the preachers, the theologians, the supporters of the holy see; and they came in collision with the Dominicans, and almost all the other religious orders; they aspired to the direction of consciences, particularly those of princes, and of all those who had any influence on the politics of courts; and they inflamed the hatred of courtiers and ministers; they sought to be masters of all the institutions for education and public instruction; and they irritated against them the ancient universities, the masters and professors of all the schools which they did not succeed in bringing under their domination. Neither is it to be doubted that the powerful rivalry of the Jesuits, the erection of their new schools, their methods, their writings, and still more their silent machinations, were the secret poison which from that time, affected the universities of France, which caused them to languish, decay, and finally fall into a nullity which places them far below those of Protestant countries.

The most formidable enemies which the Jesuits made, and those most capable of opposing them, were the Jansenists. They thought they saw in the pains taken by the latter to spread the principles of St. Augustin on grace, and to render them acceptable, a secret design of ruining their society, whose doctrine did not agree with that of this father of the church. Whatever might have been the secret design of these partisans of Jansenius with respect to the Jesuits, it is not the less true that all this disputation on grace is immediately connected with the religious quarrels produced by the reformation. This terrible shock, which had separated a great part of the western Christians from the Roman church, had shook this church itself to its foundations, and had long left there the leaven and the germs of fermentation. The spirit of inquiry, of chicane, and of controversy, were also awakened in it. The greater number of Catholics would have been pleased with certain reforms in the essence itself of the church, with amendments and regulations in the doctrine and discipline which did not take place, or were not conceived as they wished; there were many discontented Catholics; a great many of the abuses attacked by the Protestants appeared very culpable to these Catholics; and several points of doctrine disputed by the first had given rise to consideration in these last. The Council of Trent had not nearly satisfied any but the ultramontanes. In it, whatever related to the rights of the pope and the hierarchy were carefully determined; but the essential points of doctrine still remained in a painful uncertainty; as, for example, what should be believed on grace, which held so important a place in the doctrine of the Lutherans, and that of the Calvinists. Baius, a theologian and professor at Louvain, who had assisted at the council, raised a discussion on this subject, and occasioned it to be much talked of in his time. After him, Jansenius, professor in the same university of Louvian, followed the same deviations, wrote his book entitled Augustinus, was the friend of the Abbe of St. Cyran, and of some other leaders of this party, which from him, took the name of Jansenist. The number of illustrious defenders of this party is known, and also that Port Royal became its chief place. The war of opinion which broke out between the Jansenists and Jesuits was the most violent that ever agitated the Roman church internally. The Jansenists, who, at the bottom had so many opinions in common with Luther and the other reformers, who with all their heart resisted the pretensions of Rome, and those of the satellite Jesuits of Rome, dreaded above all things the reproach of heresy, which was directed against them. They made it a sort of point of honour to write vigorously against the reformed, to give a signal proof that they were as good Catholics as their adversaries. At the same time they wrote at least as vigorously against the Jesuits, and acquitted themselves of this essential task, con amore, with still greater eloquence than the other. Thus as the Jesuits had entered the lists of science and wit with the Protestants; their adversaries, the Jansenists, were, for the same reason, eager to show themselves superior to the Jesuits in every department in which these shone; they composed grammars, books of education and piety, treatises of logic, morality, history and erudition.[*]

* This is one of the secrets of the society, for it had secrets; it had its tests, its degrees, its apprentices, and its masters; if it had an open and legal existence, it was because its principles were agreeable to the authority which protected them. From its nature it was in opposition to the society of Free-Masons, to that of the Illuminati, &c. which it strove against with all its power. Formerly, while the Jesuits triumphed with a high hand, the Free-Masons concealed themselves, and assembled by stealth. Now the times are greatly changed; the Free-Masons have scarcely any secrets but what an enlightened public participate with them; their society appears freely and openly; that of the Jesuits, on the contrary, conceals its feeble remains from publicity through almost the whole of Europe, and has really become a secret society of anti-illuminati. Of the two centuries, that in which they showed themselves, and that in which they are concealed, we may decide which had the best spirit.

* See what the celebrated Arnaud wrote on this occasion, under the title of La Nouvelle heresie des Jesuites.

The names of Lancelot, Arnauld, Tillemont, Nicole, Pascal, Sacy, etc. are as immortal as the remembrance of the services they have rendered to the sciences and to our literature.

It was to arrive at this result that I introduced the preceding digression, which may, perhaps, appear to have led me out of my subject. But if it be considered that the society of Jesuits became what it was, only because the popes wished to make it a counterpoise to Protestantism, and a militia capable of perpetually opposing it, and also to re-establish the tottering holy see, it will be acknowledged that the existence of this society, as well as the principal events to which it has given rise, and the oppositions which it has excited, must be considered among the important results of the reformation. No reformation, no Jesuits; and no Jesuits, no Jansenists, nor a Port Royal. Now, it is to the rivalry of the one against the other, and to the activity it gave to their minds, that we are indebted for a multitude of good works which appeared during the 17th century; works, in which our language, and French prose in particular, attained a richness, a flexibility, a perfection, which it was far from having before. The polemical writings bent the language into all the forms of reasoning, and gave it precision, strength and delicacy. I need only name the Provinciales, the Cleanthe of Barbier d'Aucour, and I shall not dread being contradicted. All these literary events, so important to us, depend on the great event of the reformation; it is not a chain which I have arbitrarily formed to attach them to it; it is the natural series of historical facts which I have ingeniously followed.

Until their destruction, the Jesuits constantly continued to perform a principal part in all the disturbances which arose on religious or ecclesiastical, and, not unfrequently, on political subjects. In China and Japan, jealous of the missionaries unconnected with their society; in Europe, enemies of the learned and modest fathers of the Oratory, they provoked both the quarrel of the missions, and the condemnation of Father Quesnel, other troubles, which do not belong to our subject, except as they relate to letters, by the writings which they gave rise to. In this point of view we must also place the disputes among the party of the mystics, towards the close of the seventeenth century, at the head of which appear the Abbe de Rance, Mesdames Bourignon and Guyon, but particularly, the noble and pious Fenelon, who was implicated, by this circumstance, in a very animated controversy with Bossuet. The name of these two illustrious adversaries is sufficient to bring within the number of events which have been of importance to literature, this Quietism, a sect which belongs, perhaps, as much to philosophy as to theology, and which is not foreign either to the troubles of Jansenism, or to those of the church, in general, since the reformation.

Reflection on the Employment of the Ecclesiastical Possessions.

It is very evident, that the financial administration is the object which governments believe most deserving of their whole attention; and the most important employment made of the finances of a state is commonly war; to attack or to defend itself; to restrain its neighbours by a formidable army, always on foot, by fortresses, by arsenals. There is nothing in this but what is very laudable. Nevertheless, war is not the only object of men in society; all war itself has peace for its object, and that of peace, is the furnishing the citizens of each state with the possibility of ennobling and ameliorating their existence, of developing all their powers of morality and industry. Study and knowledge, which direct the efforts of mankind to the perfectioning and ennobling everything which constitutes their nature, are, therefore, as a last result, the final objects of the labours of finance, of war, and of peace. But here, as frequently happens, the means overpower the end. How much is lavished on war! What parsimony is practised on the success of study and the advancement of morals!

In what order of things, in what age, in what country of the earth, could the culture of the sciences be more promoted than in a Catholic country! Without the established government having new charges to defray, without the nation having new burthens, there is an entire cast of rich citizens, whose destination removes them from all the professions of civil life, who are in their essence devoted to a contemplative life, to a leisure which they might render learned and useful. A multitude of benefices, of prebends, of chapels, instead of being bestowed on the indolent, might secure a maintenance to men of activity devoted to the sciences. Each monastery provided with an ample library, instead of pious sluggards, might contain studious recluses, whose labours would belong to the state. If the Spanish nation, for example, had the will, it would be in its power, by the touch of the wand, to transform the whole system of its superstitious clergy, into a corporation of learned men and philosophers. In short, it would be consecrating to the mind what has been so long consecrated to the senses; and God knows what advantage such an order, who would people the chapters and abbeys, who might be excused from matins, but not from labour, or study, or meditation, might in ten years procure to the stock of sciences! This is not altogether a dream. We have seen what could be effected by a congregation of Saint Maur, an oratory, a Port Royal, etc. From what they have done well, and even from what they have done ill, a judgment may be formed of what they might have done had they been actuated by a power having no other object but the progress of knowledge! and how often have our kings recompensed literary merit with bishoprics; how many literary men, assisted by a priory, a benefice, have lived in France, sheltered from want and enabled to apply themselves to labours, which have enlightened and done honour to the nation! Under the modest title of Abbe, which a simple tonsure rendered common to them, they became, in fact, the priests of the temple of science; from Amyot to the author of Anacharsis, how has this title of Abbe been ennobled and dignified! It has been borne by a multitude of worthy and learned men of letters, who probably would have remained obscure and inactive, without that portion of the wealth of the church, which warmed them, and permitted them, free and exempt from cares, to enter upon the career.

With us, the revolution has dried up this beneficent source, which might have been rendered so useful to the progress of knowledge.[*] Several of the reformed states have retained some means of encouragement to letters. In Sweden and in

[*] It is curious to observe in these books, when they are read attentively by one acquainted with the literary history of the times, how much they are bestrewed (and even those which seem least adapted for that species of controversy, such as grammars and others) with strokes directed against the Jesuits, their classical books, their method of instruction, without their being once named or pointed at openly.

[*] It has done more; it has swallowed up almost all the patrimony of the ancient establishments of instruction, and has thus deprived the new, which they are labouring to establish, of that material and indispensable basis, without which, such establishments can neither subsist solidly, with honour or efficacy. An endowment and a real property, to be managed by a local administration, are absolutely necessary to every school which would prosper; it requires a security, an existence different from what may arise from the casualty of uncertain boarders, or the assistance of government, which having to provide for a multitude of other wants, will, very frequently, be compelled to leave such objects unattended to.

England there are still certain ecclesiastical dignities which the sovereigns commonly give to men eminent for their knowledge. More than one archbishop of Upsal or of York, more than one bishop of Abo or of Chester, etc. hold a distinguished rank in literature. Holland, Switzerland, and Germany have fewer of these honourable and lucrative posts for men of letters. The possessions of the church have been there principally employed in the endowment of universities and other schools; so that the greater part of their writers are professors, very scantily paid, or superiors or inferiors of schools, who, frequently burthened with a numerous family, set a value on the recompense of an author; and whom this stimulus too frequently induces to write quick, that they may write a great deal.

Summary recapitulation of the Results of the Reformation, as they relate to the Progress of Knowledge.

The human mind is freed both from the external constraint imposed upon it by the hierarchical despotism, and from the internal constraint of the apathy in which it was kept by a blind superstition. It is wholly emancipated from guardianship, and begins to make a more free, and, consequently a more energetic, and more proper use of its faculties. The documents of religion, the titles of the hierarchy are subjected to a severe and profound criticism; and as the study of the holy books, that of the fathers, of the councils, of the decretals are connected with that of antiquity, history, the languages, the masterpieces of Greece and Rome, all these great objects of classical learning assume a new aspect, and are illuminated with a new light. The scholastic philosophy, the ally and supporter of the ancient system, finds, in these innovaters, formidable adversaries, who unveil its vices and attack its weak sides. The torch of reason, which the edifice of the scholastics kept in concealment, begins to shine again. The empty science of the casuists vanishes before the morality of the gospel, the reading of which is restored to all Christians. The human mind delivered from the obstacles which stopped its progress during the centuries of the middle age, displays all its activity, probes the foundations of the tottering societies, discusses the rights of the people, those of governments, those of the state and of the church.

This activity makes its happy influence to be felt on every branch of human knowledge; and the scrutinizing disposition impressed on all minds by the reformation, puts philosophical inquiries and the most sublime theories of the sciences and the arts in motion. D'Alembert has sketched this picture with a masterly hand, and at a single stroke. He says, "the middle of the sixteenth century saw a rapid change in the religion and the system of a great part of Europe; the new doctrines of the reformers, supported on the one hand and opposed on the other, with that warmth which the interests of God, well or ill understood, can alone inspire, equally compelled their partisans and their adversaries to seek instruction: the emulation excited by this great motive multiplied knowledge of every kind; and the light produced in the bosom of error and trouble spread itself to those objects also which seemed most foreign to these disputes."[*]

The long, multiplied, and desolating wars which this commotion gave rise to, retarded some of the effects which should have resulted from it. The moral culture of the people which was on the point of taking a new flight, was, for a short period, driven backward. But shortly, their souls, steeped in misfortune, resumed their energy, and the imperishable spirit which had been awakened, displayed all its activity. At first, it wandered among the devious paths of theological controversies, but, at length, it returned more supple and more accustomed to meditation. Nevertheless, the necessity the different parties felt to gain over the multitude of nations, causes them to cultivate the vulgar languages, and multiplies good writings in them; the French, English, and German prose is developed, perfectionated, and enriched, amidst the disputes of sects and the conflicts of religious opinions.

Particular associations arise, or are strengthened on the different sides, either for attack or for defence; some mysterious and persecuted, the others open and privileged. The order of Jesuits, the most important of them all, is placed in opposition to the reform. It requires a preponderance proportionate to the enormous mass it is destined to counterbalance. Dragged forward by the torrent of the universal spirit, this order, which should only have supported the hierarchy and the scholastic philosophy, contributes, by itself, and by its formidable adversaries the Jansenists, to the progress of knowledge. It falls when the time arrives, at which it should give place to institutions more suitable to the new age. Thus by its action, and its reaction, the religious commotion effected by Luther, carries the European nations forward in the career of knowledge and of intellectual culture.

Conclusion.

Such are the principal results which, I am of opinion, originated in the influence exercised on Europe by Luther's reformation. In analyzing the complicated causes of the most considerable events which have occurred during three centuries in the political world, and in the literary world, it is easy to go astray, to mistake some causes, to lose sight of some effects. Amidst the confusion of all these entangled threads of European politics and culture, he who seeks to unravel those immediately connected with the quarrels on religion, however careful he may be, will too often be in danger of erring. Some of them issue from the establishment itself, from the preaching of the alcoran, from chivalry, the crusades, the use of artillery, the discovery of a new world, the renovation of letters, the institutions of Peter I., the succession war, and the other major events. Were it required to determine the influence of some one of these events, perhaps such of the consequences as I have attributed to the reformation might be claimed as belonging to it. Historians who narrate facts, are generally silent on their causes, and frequently also are unacquainted with them. Sometimes they give these which are false and contradictory. The writers of the opposing parties are exclusive, and render the truth uncertain. To whom must credit be given; the Catholics, or the Protestants; to Duperron or Dumoulin; to Platina or Mornay? How shall we decide between Varillas and Maimbourg, on the one side, Sleidan, Bayle, and Seckendorf, on the other; between Pallavicini and Fra Paolo; between Bossuet and Claude? In the work of the reformation, the one sees only an infinite source of errors and calamities; the others see in it only knowledge and benefits to the human race. Among so many different opinions, each must have his own. We are at present better situated than ever to judge of a revolution which broke out three hundred years ago; let us consider what was before it, and what has happened since; let us hear all parties, look around us, see what exists at the present day, and judge.

When after the long sleep of the European nations and of their reason, during the middle age, we turn our attention to the state of the human race in this fine part of the world, in the fifteenth, and at the beginning of the sixteenth centuries, we shall see it recover from its stupefaction, rise, move unsteadily in all directions, seize instruments for its activity, forge new ones, try them, develope its powers, take possession of the field of science, throw from it the swaddling clothes which embarrass it, and begin a new epocha. How is this interval crowded with decisive occurrences and inventions. The happy employment of the mariner's compass, the telescope, printing, the taking of Constantinople, the new world, the submission of the great vassals to the crown of France, the golden age of poetry and the arts in Italy, the foundation of numerous schools, the books of the ancients revived in it, the establishment of posts, which render all communications rapid, the salutary peace of the empire and the imperial chamber, the extravagant increase of the Austrian power which terrifies Europe, and compels it to arm, Copernicus who reforms the heavens, Luther and Loyola who arose nearly at the same time! The crisis must necessarily have a term, the state of things must change in the order of civil societies, and in that of human knowledge.

"Better is an enemy to well," says a proverb of modern Italy. This ridiculous adage, which ought never to have quitted the language in which it appeared, is the unsophisticated expression of an ultramontane character. Happily it is not in the power of a despised cast, nor of a maxim against nature, thus to fetter the destinies of science and civilization. Men pass them, and give no credit to such reclamations, the reclamations, says Chenier,[*] of those idle and jealous spirits, whose reason, without stimulus, would paralyse the human mind. None of the institutions of the middle age were calculated for the new humanity. As lances and shields had been laid aside for fire arms, so must the scholastic philosophy be removed by the new arms of reason; the inextricable circles of Ptolemy, by the simple idea of the motion of the earth; and the false decretals must fall at the first looks of criticism. The exernal form of religion no longer corresponded with the new culture, any more than the representation of mysteries corresponded with the scene on which Moliere and Corneille were about to appear; any more than Gothic architecture with the basilick of St. Peter. It was requisite that everything should change; the new spirit could not subsist in the ancient form; a harmony, an agreement must be established between it and things; and since it had in itself the energy of a new life, the omnipotence of youth, it acted in all directions with strength and efficacy, and was everywhere seconded by enthusiasm.

It is therefore under this point of view that the reformation must be considered as a necessary product of a new age, as a manifestation of a new spirit. What Dante and Petrarch were to poetry, Michael Angelo and Raphael to the arts of drawing, Bacon and Descartes to philosophy, Copernicus and Galileo to astronomy, Columbus and Gama to the science of the earth, such was Luther to religion. Organs of the universal mind, these eminent men expressed correctly what was lurking in a great number of their cotemporaries, and at one stroke satisfied the wants of their time. As soon as the spark flashed from their genius, the flame, ready to appear, spread in all directions. What was only a prescience, a vague idea, insulated in a number of heads, acquired a consistence, a fixed direction, appeared externally, was communicated from individual to individual, and a continued chain connected all thinking minds. Such is the natural mode of the tacit conspiration which governs all reformations. Those effected in the dominion of the arts and of the major part of the sciences, being foreign to the passions and to the volcanic commotions of the mass of the people, are generally accompanied by peace, and are accomplished without causing the tears of humanity to flow. It could not be thus with that provoked by Luther. Religion was not then a simple opinion, a simple moral being; it had an immense body, which oppressed all the political bodies which laid claim to all thrones, to all the possessions of the earth. At the first wound it felt, the collossus shuddered, and the world was shaken. Princes and nations flew to arms and engaged in a dreadful struggle, a struggle of opinions and interests, the results of which were so varied and so important.

The Institute has demanded an account of such of these results as have influenced the political situation of the states of Europe, and the progress of knowledge. This task was enormous, and far above my powers. What would it have been if the Institute, besides the political and literary consequences, had required an exposition of the influence of the reformation on the morality of the European nations, on their belief and their religious dispositions? But this new point of view might be the subject of a work, perhaps more extensive and more difficult than mine. I was obliged to confine myself within the prescribed limits, which circumscribe a field of vast extent. It has not been my intention to disguise either the evil or the good produced by the reformation. I have only sought to prove that, everything being balanced, and the definitive account closed, this revolution offers a surplus of good to humanity; and, finally, that it must be ranked in the number of the major events which have contributed most powerfully to the progress of civilization and knowledge, not only in Europe, but in every part of the earth where Europeans have carried their culture.

I have also thought I might express myself with the open freedom of an historian, who, if possible, should not belong to any age or any country; supporting myself with an opinion that prejudice could not find access into the sanctuary of the sciences; and that an illustrious society so philosophical as to choose such a subject, and to ask for the truth respecting it, would, doubtless, be disposed to listen to it.

DOCTOR MACLAINE'S NOTE

ON A RECEIVED CALUMNY AGAINST THE PERSON AND VIEWS OF LUTHER.

From his translation of Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History, Vol. iv. page 31, Edit. 1803.

Dr. Mosheim has taken no notice of the calumnies invented and propagated by some late authors, in order to make Luther's opposition to the publication of indulgences, appear to be the effect of selfish and ignoble motives. It may not, therefore, be improper to set that in a true light; not that the cause of the reformation (which must stand by its own intrinsic dignity, and is in no ways affected by the views or characters of its instruments) can derive any strength from this inquiry; but as it may tend to vindicate the personal character of a man, who has done eminent service to the cause of religion.

Mr. Hume, in his history of the reign of Henry VIII., has thought proper to repeat what the enemies of the reformation, and some of its dubious and ill-informed friends, have advanced, with respect to the motives that engaged Luther to oppose the doctrine of indulgences. This elegant and persuasive historian tells us, that the "Austin friars had usually been employed in Saxony to preach indulgences, and from this trust had derived both profit and consideration; that Arcemboldi gave this occupation to the Dominicans;[*] that Martin Luther, an Austin friar, professor in the university of Wittemberg, resenting the affront put upon his order, began to preach against the abuses that were committed in the sale of indulgences, and, being provoked by opposition, proceeded even to decry indulgences themselves."[†] It were to be wished that Mr. Hume's candour had engaged him to examine this accusation better, before he had ventured to repeat it. For, in the first place, it is not true that the Austin friars had been usually employed in Saxony to preach indulgences. It is well known, that the commission had been offered alternately, and sometimes jointly, to all the mendicants whether Austin friars, Dominicans, Franciscans, or Carmelites. Nay, from the year 1229, that lucrative commission was principally entrusted with the Dominicans;[‡] and in the records which relate to indulgences, we rarely meet with the name of an Austin friar, and not one single act by which it appears, that the Roman pontiff ever named the friars of that order to the office under consideration. More particularly it is remarkable, that for half a century before Luther, (i. e, from 1450 to 1517.) during which period indulgences were sold with the most scandalous marks of avaricious extortion and impudence, we scarcely meet with the name of an Austin friar employed in that service, if we except a monk named Palzius, who was no more than an underling of the papal questor Raymond Peraldus; so far is it from being true, that the Augustin order were exclusively, or even usually employed in that service.[§] Mr. Hume has built his assertion upon the sole authority of a single expression of Paul Sarpi, which has been abundantly refuted by De Prierio, Pallavicini and Graweson, the mortal enemies of Luther. But it may be alleged, that, even supposing it was not usual to employ the Augustin friars in the propagation of indulgences, yet Luther might be offended at seeing such an important commission given to the Dominicans exclusively, and that, consequently, this was his motive in opposing the propagation of indulgences. To show the injustice of this allegation, I observe,

Secondly. That in the time of Luther the preaching of indulgences was become such an odious and unpopular matter, that it is far from being probable, that Luther would have been solicitous about obtaining such a commission, either for himself, or for his order. The princes of Europe, with many bishops, and multitudes of learned and pious men, had opened their eyes upon the turpitude of this infamous traffic; and even the Franciscans and Dominicans, towards the conclusion of the fifteenth century, opposed it publicly, both in their discourses, and in their writings.[‖] Nay, more, the very commission which is supposed to have excited the envy of Luther, was offered by Leo to the general of the Franciscans, and was refused both by him and his order,[] who gave it over entirely to Albert, bishop of Mentz and Magdeburg. Is it then to be imagined, that either Luther or the other Austin friars aspired after a commission of which the Franciscans were ashamed? Besides, it is a mistake to affirm, that this office was given to the Dominicans in general, since it was given to Tetzel alone, an individual member of that order, who had been notorious for his profligacy, barbarity, and extortion.

But that neither resentment nor envy were the motives that led Luther to oppose the doctrine and publication of indulgences, will appear with the utmost evidence, if we consider in the third place, That he was never accused of any such motives, either in the edicts of the pontiffs of his time, or amidst the other reproaches of the contemporary writers, who defended the cause of Rome, and who were far from being sparing of their invectives and calumnies. All the contemporary adversaries of Luther are absolutely silent on this head. From the year 1517 to 1546, when the dispute about indulgences was carried on with the greatest warmth and animosity, not one writer ever ventured to reproach Luther with those ignoble motives of opposition, now under consideration. I speak not of Erasmus, Sleidan, De Thou, Guicciardini, and others, whose testimony might be, perhaps, suspected of partiality in his favour, but I speak of Cajetan, Hogstrat, De Prierio, Emser, and even the infamous John Tetzel, whom Luther opposed with so much vehemence and bitterness. Even Cochlæus was silent on this head during the life of Luther; though after the death of that great reformer, he broached the calumny I am here refuting. But such was the scandalous character of this man, who was notorious for fraud, calumny, lying, and their sister vices,* that Pallavicini, Bossuet, and other enemies of Luther, were ashamed to make use either of his name or testimony. Now, may it not be fairly presumed, that the contemporaries of Luther were better judges of his character, and the principles from which he acted, than those who lived in after times? Can it be imagined, that motives to action, which escaped the prying eyes of Luther's contemporaries, should have discovered themselves to us, who live at such a distance of time from the scene of action, to M. Bossuet, to Mr. Hume, and to other abettors of this ill-contrived and foolish story. Either there are no rules of moral evidence, or Mr. Hume's assertion is entirely groundless.

I might add many other considerations to show the unreasonableness of supposing that Luther exposed himself to the rage of the Roman pontiff, to the persecutions of an exasperated clergy, to the severity of such a potent, and despotic prince as Charles V., to death itself, and that from a principle of avarice and ambition. But I have said enough to satisfy every candid mind. Whoever is desirous of knowing more on this subject need only consult Historie du Renouvellement l'Evangile, par Gerdes, Tom. NOTICES OF RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

Occasional Discourses, including several never before published. By Francis Wayland, President of Brown University. Boston: James Loring. 1833. pp. 376. 12*mo.*

This volume contains Dr. Wayland's celebrated discourse on "The moral dignity of the Missionary Enterprise,"—two discourses on the "Duties of an American Citizen,"—"The Death of the Ex-Presidents,"—"The Certain Triumph of the Redeemer," one of the Murray-street lectures of 1830,—"Encouragements to Religious Effort," delivered before the American Sunday School Union,—"The Moral Efficacy of the Doctrine of the Atonement,"—"Elevated Attainments in Piety essential to a successful Study of the Scriptures," delivered on the ordination of Mr. William R. Williams, at New York,—"The Abuse of the Imagination,"—"Motives to Beneficence," delivered before the Howard Benevolent Society at Boston,—"Objections to the Doctrine of Christ Crucified,"—"A Discourse on Education," delivered before the American Institute of Instruction,—"The Philosophy of Analogy," before the Phi Beta Kappa Society of Rhode Island,—"An Address on Temperance, before The Providence Association for the Promotion of Temperance."

Most of these discourses have been for some time before the public, and have received the seal of its approbation. The author has, therefore, done well in collecting them into a neat volume, making thus a valuable addition to our literature. Dr. Wayland is one of our best writers, and hence in this age of the press, as it might with propriety be termed, his pen should not be too long and frequent in its slumbers. If good men do not sow wheat, evil men will sow tares in the field.

Dr. Wayland is not without his faults as a writer. His style is too measured and stately, except when the subject is elevated; common-place ideas, which every writer must use to some extent, are not expressed with the ease, brevity, and directness which is desirable; there is too frequent use of antithesis, and not unfrequently, a scientific mode of approaching truths, which might be arrived at in a much shorter way. We should not, however, have alluded to these things in an ordinary writer, nor in the present case, were it not, that by many, his style is regarded as a model.

We feel inclined to extract from the volume before us the following passages expressive of the views of the author on an important question still under discussion.

"I come then, in the last place, to consider the practical question which arises on this subject. Is the trade in ardent spirits right?

"Allow me here to offer two suggestions. First, I stand here to condemn no man, but to set before you all, the truth, so far as I can discover it, upon a question of duty. That many excellent and worthy men are engaged in this trade I do not doubt. Far be it from me to detract in the least from their reputation for excellence. They may never have seriously thought on this subject. They may not have been allowed sufficient time to decide upon a question involving a large portion of their business. What the particular state of any man's mind is, on a subject like this, I pretend not to decide, nor ought any one else to be forward to decide upon it. Yet this is no reason why the moral nature of the act should not be fully and clearly set forth. Upon this subject we have been all of us either in the right or in the wrong. Neither supposition will afford sufficient reason why the nature of our actions should not be examined. A good man may do wrong, but a good man will always listen with candour to any one who will show him how he may do right.

"Secondly. I do not stand up here to inquire into the rectitude of any particular branch of this trade, but into the rectitude of the whole trade itself. I have to do with wholesale as well as retail dealers. If it be wrong to sell a little, it seems to me that it must also be wrong to sell a great deal. If it be wrong to be accessory to the destruction of one neighbourhood, it seems to me that it must be wrong to be accessory to the destruction of a great many neighbourhoods. I reason here as we do about the slave trade. If it be wrong to import one slave, it is wrong to import a cargo.

"I ask then the attention of my fellow-citizens to the following questions:

"First. Can it be right for me to derive my living from that which is spreading disease, and poverty, and premature death throughout my neighbourhood? How would it be in any similar case? Would it be right for me to derive my living from selling poison, or from propagating plague, or leprosy around me?

"Second. Can it be right for me to derive my living from that which is debasing the minds and ruining the souls of my neighbours? How would it be in any other case? Would it be right for me to derive my living from the sale of a drug which produced misery or madness, or from the sale of obscene books which excited the passions, and brutalized the minds, and ruined the souls of my fellow-men?

---

* Sleidan. De statu Rel. et Reip. in Dedic. Epist. ad August. Elector.

"Third. Can it be right for me to derive my living from that which destroys for ever the happiness of the domestic circle,—which is filling the land with women and children in a condition far more deplorable than that of widows and orphans?

"Fourth. Can it be right for me to derive my living from that which is known to be the cause of nine-tenths of all the crimes which are perpetrated against society?

"Fifth. Can it be right for me to derive my living from that which brings upon society nine-tenths of all the pauperism which exists, and which the rest of the community are obliged to pay for?

"Sixth. Can it be right for me to derive my living from that which accomplishes all these at once, and which does it without ceasing?

"Do you say that you do not know that the liquor which you sell will produce these results? Do you not know that nine hundred and ninty-nine gallons produce these effects for one which is used innocently! I ask then,

"Seventh. Would it be right for me to sell a poison on the ground that there was one chance in a thousand that the purchaser would not die?

"Eighth. Do you say you are not responsible for the acts of your neighbour? Is this clearly so? Is not he who knowingly furnishes a murderer with a weapon, considered an accomplice? Is not he who navigates a slave-ship considered a pirate? On this subject, however, I will take the liberty to introduce an anecdote, which will show at once the awful nature of this trade, and also the manner in which the responsibility which it involves affects the conscience of a child. A deacon of a Christian church was in the habit of selling rum to one of his customers, a man habitually intemperate. The wife of the drunkard besought the deacon, for her own sake and the sake of her children, not to sell liquor to her husband, for that she and her children could not endure his treatment. At last, the husband and father went home drunk one night from the deacon's store, and murdered his wife. One of the deacon's children hearing of this murder and the circumstances, said to his father, 'Father, do you not think that, in the day of judgment, you will have to answer for that murder!' such was the decision of the child. Can any of us gainsay it?

"If these things be so, and that they are so who can dispute, I ask you my respected fellow-citizens, what is to be done? Let me ask, is not this traffic altogether wrong? Why, then, should we not altogether abandon it?"

Memoirs of the Rev. Thomas Halyburton, Professor of Divinity in the University of St. Andrews. With an Introductory Essay by Robert Burns, D. D. Paisley, Scotland; and a Preface by Archibald Alexander, D. D. Princeton, Baker & Connelly. Philadelphia: J. Whetham, 1833. pp. 299. 12*mo.*

We are pleased to see this new and neat edition of the Memoirs of Halyburton. The volume is introduced to the public by a warm recommendation from Dr. Miller and Professor Hodge of Princeton, and a Preface of about ten pages, full of rich and seasonable thought, by Dr. Alexander. We have next, Dr. Burns' Introductory Essay on the subject of experimental religion; it is judicious, and interesting, but we had much rather the space had been occupied with matter from Dr. Alexander's pen. Then follow the memoirs which have been "carefully revised, and divested of a few obsolete words and phrases, while the utmost care has been taken not only to preserve every idea of the author, but to exhibit it faithfully in his own manner." This volume has long been considered as one of the best specimens of religious biography extant. "We have here" says Dr. Alexander, "the faithful narrative of the views, feelings, conflicts, temptations, victories, and consolations of a man of eminent piety, and uncommon soundness of judgment, made at the period when he was capable of forming an impartial opinion. He has portrayed the unregenerate heart in its deceitfulness and corruption, without disguise. From his own experience, he clearly testifies the inefficacy of a religious education, while unaccompanied by the grace of God. He, in the next place, teaches us, how powerfully the truth of God operates on the natural conscience, and how strongly it restrains even the unregenerate heart, from rushing into all the excesses of wickedness." We have, in truth, in this volume a mine of facts in the philosophy of religion, or rather, of facts of infinite use to the student of that philosophy. We cordially adopt the opinion of Dr. Miller, that it is "worthy of a place in every family," and especially in the libraries of theological students and ministers.

Lectures, Explanatory and Practical, on the Epistle of St. Paul to the Philippians. Intended chiefly for the use of families. By Manton Eastburn, M. A., Rector of the Church of the Ascension. New York: G. & C. & H. Carvill, 1833. pp. 217. 8*vo.*

It is a mistaken opinion entertained by some persons, that there are books enough in the world: there are doubtless bad books enough, but an increase of good ones will be desirable for some centuries to come. Perhaps not many new ideas may be brought forward, but what is next in importance, old ones will receive a form that will attract attention. When so great a work as this world's reform is before us, every means adapted to aid in its accomplishment should be put in requisition. It is therefore peculiarly fitting that those who write for the pulpit should occasionally give to their productions a more enduring form, even if they should not circulate beyond the bounds of their own congregations.

Mr. Eastburn has made an acceptable present to his people and the Christian public in the plain, practical, and spiritual Lectures before us. We learn from the preface that they were composed in the winter of 1829–30, and delivered during the same period, on successive Sunday mornings, from the pulpit of Ascension Church. The author justly remarks that "in this age of wild speculation on religious subjects, every attempt to lead the mind to that pure and undefiled fountain of truth, which is contained in the Bible, seems, whatever may be its merits in other respects, to be of itself a commendable endeavour." But Mr. Eastburn's merits are not merely those of good intention; he has performed the task he proposed to himself in an able and judicious manner, and in a spirit entirely free from sectarianism. "He has constantly kept in view those distinguishing features of practical and experimental religion, in which all Christians agree, and has thus rendered his work suitable for general circulation."

A Harmony of the four Gospels. Founded on the arrangement of the Harmonica Evangelica, by the Rev. Edward Greswell. With the Practical Reflections of Dr. Doddridge. Designed for the use of families and schools, and for private edification. By the Rev. E. Bickersteth, Rector of Walton, Herts. Philadelphia: Key & Biddle, 1833. pp. 420. 12*mo.*

A popular Harmony of the Gospels, by which we mean one adapted to the use of English readers and private Christians, has long been a desideratum. In consequence, Christians generally have not that knowledge, that connected knowledge of the history of their Saviour, which it is surely desirable and important to possess. The obstacles hitherto in the way of this are removed by the publication before us. The pious and well known author remarks in his preface, that his object has been "to give such a Harmony of the Gospels as might furnish heads of families with a suitable work for family instruction; schools with a profitable school-book; and Christians in general with a combination of the different accounts given of our Lord by the Evangelists, so that all may have a more distinct and full view of His divine and glorious character.

The text is divided into sections of convenient length, each followed by practical reflections from the pen of the pious and judicious Doddridge. It will no doubt be widely circulated and prove eminently useful.

John Milton: his Life and Times, Religious and Political Opinions: with an Appendix, containing animadversions upon Dr. Johnson's life of Milton, &c. &c. By Joseph Ivermy, author of the "History of the English Baptists," &c. New York: D. Appleton, 1833. pp. 230, 12*mo.*

Mr. Ivermy is a Baptist clergyman of London. Some ten years ago he wrote the "History of the English Baptists," which Robert Hall pronounced to be "a permanent monument to his talent and devotedness to the cause of religious truth and liberty."

In the preface to the work before us, the author remarks; "The former biographers of Milton have exhibited him principally in his character as a poet, but have obscured his features as a patriot, a protestant, and nonconformist. The writer has attempted to give an accurate and full length portrait, in all those respects, of this most eminent of our countrymen. For the purpose of accomplishing this design, he has made considerable extracts from the prose writings of Milton, by which, in a good degree, he appears as his own biographer."

There may be something of truth in the above remarks; still, we are not sure that a new biography of Milton was a desideratum, or that Mr. Ivermy's book throws any new light on his character. The incidents of his life are not interesting to the great body of general, much less, of religious readers. Those to whom they are so, will seek for them in a more extended history of his times than can be comprised in a single volume.

We were amused with Milton's definition of the Fathers, which we met with for the first time in the work before us. We quote it without expressing any opinion as to its correctness. "Whatsoever either time, or the heedless hand of blind chance has drawn down to this present, in her huge drag-net, whether fish or sea-weed, shells or shrubs, unpicked, unchosen—these are the Fathers."

The Divine Purpose Displayed in the Works of Providence and Grace; in a series of twenty letters, addressed to an inquiring friend. By the Rev. John Matthews, D. D., Professor of Theology in the Theological Seminary, Indiana. Fourth Edition. Philadelphia: J. Whetham, 1833. pp. 259, 18*mo.*

The letters composing this volume originally appeared in the "Literary and Evangelical Magazine," edited by the late Dr. Rice of Virginia. A second edition was soon after published, in a book form, at Richmond; a third some time after at Lexington, Kentucky—the fourth is before us, with a brief introductory preface by Dr. Alexander.

The object of the author of this volume is to discuss, in a simple and popular manner, the much controverted doctrine of the "Divine Decrees,"—to present what he conceives to be the truth on this subject, divested of that severe and forbidding aspect which it assumes in the view of many. In pursuing his object, he has given us the results, rather than the process, of profound investigation, and has uniformly preserved a "spirit of meekness and kindness."

Letters to Young Ladies. By a Lady. Hartford: P. Canfield, 1833. pp. 152. 18*mo.*

This volume, we are informed, is from the pen of Mrs. Sigourney. This fact will commend the book to a large class of readers—those who are familiar with the many excellent pieces of poetry which she has of late given to the public. The letters are eight in number, on the following subjects; the "Improvement of Time—Female Employments—Dress, Manners, and Accomplishments—Books—Conversation—Doing Good—Self-Government, and—Motives to Exertion." These topics are treated with ability and judgment, and in a style calculated to secure the attention of those addressed. We know not that any new thoughts are advanced—this was not to be expected. Many excellent books have been written on the same topics. But books, however excellent, in order to be useful, must be read. That writer, therefore, does the community essential service, who presents old, yet valuable ideas, in a form adapted to secure perusal.

The Life of Nicholas Ferrar, M. A., and Fellow of Clare-Hall, Cambridge. Designed particularly for Youth. Philadelphia: French & Perkins. Boston: Perkins & Marvin. 1833. pp. 108, 18*mo.*

The external appearance of this little volume is elegant, and its literary execution excellent. The author is well acquainted with the English language, an accomplishment by no means as common or as highly estimated as it should be. The book would be well worth reading were it only on account of the purity of its style. We are told it is particularly designed for youth; the author has, however, attained that happy simplicity which renders it adapted to readers of every age.

Ferrar was born in 1591. His life abounds with interesting incidents. His character "was marked by intelligence, enterprise, firmness, decision, mildness, humility, self-denial, devotion, and love. His youth was amiable and full of promise. His early manhood was spent in adventures which are almost romantic. His public life, though short, was brilliant. His years of maturity and decline were devoted to retired acts of piety. His death was like the serene going down of the summer's sun."

Letters of Euler on Different Subjects in Natural Philosophy. Addressed to a German Princess. With notes, and a Life of Euler, By David Brewster, L. L. D. With additional notes; by John Griscorn, L. L. D. In two volumes. New York: J. & J. Harper, 1833.

To those who are not acquainted with these letters we cannot make known their nature in a briefer manner than by adopting the words of M. Condorcet. "The Letters of Euler to a German Princess, have acquired all over Europe a celebrity to which the reputation of the author, the choice and importance of the several subjects, and the clearness of elucidation justly entitle them. They may be studied to advantage without much previous elementary knowledge; they convey accurate ideas respecting a variety of objects, highly interesting in themselves, or calculated to excite a laudable curiosity; they inspire a proper taste for the sciences, and for that sound philosophy which, supported by science, and never losing sight of her cautious, steady, methodical advances, runs no risk of perplexing or misleading the attentive student."

These letters were translated into English by the Rev. Dr. Hunter, of Scotland, and have passed through three editions there—the one before us, is, we believe, the first that has appeared in this country. Every lover of sound knowledge must rejoice to see the writings of such men as Euler thrown into circulation. His mind was of the first order, his acquirements extensive, and his piety, so far as we can judge, consistent and genuine.

HISTORY

OF THE

CIVILIZATION AND CHRISTIANIZATION OF SOUTH AFRICA,

FROM

ITS FIRST SETTLEMENT BY THE DUTCH, TO THE FINAL SURRENDER OF IT TO THE BRITISH.

INTRODUCTION.

Though the colony of the Cape of Good Hope has now been a considerable time in the British possession, it was only of late, comparatively speaking, that much interest was taken in the history of its civilization. Sparmann was the first to do justice, in some measure, to the Hottentot character and their capability for receiving instruction, and to restore them to the rank of rational agents. He likewise brought to light a part of what Barrow afterwards freely exposed,—the detestable system under which a nation, allowed to be free, was enslaved, tortured, and destroyed, by the unprincipled avarice of the Boors, and the general apathy of the magistracy. His statements were in several instances contradicted by Lichtenstein; but they have now been fully confirmed by the missionaries, whose personal residence among them for such a length of time has given them the best opportunity of informing themselves accurately upon the subject.

The Moravians, who made the earliest attempts to civilize them, have always been more distinguished for acting than for writing; and for a long time their early efforts were but imperfectly known beyond the people in their own connexion. In the following pages will be found a pretty full account of their transactions, drawn chiefly from their own journals, and the description of travellers, who have been quite delighted with the lovely establishment they have formed in the wilderness, where the arts of civilized life are cultivated with a diligence which would do honour to any nation. The cause which has produced such amazing effects, and that in so short a period, and which the travellers so completely misunderstood, was none other than the introduction of the gospel, and entirely overturns the speculations of Dr. Lichtenstein, —that it is first necessary to teach savages to be men, before you undertake to make them Christians. "The elevation of a people," Dr. Philip well remarks, "from a state of barbarism to a high pitch of civilization, supposes a revolution in the habits of that people which it requires much time and the operation of many causes to effect. By the preaching of the gospel, individuals may be suddenly raised to a surprising height in the scale of improvement, and the influence of such on a savage tribe must be great; but those on whom the power of divine truth operates in a direct manner, bear a small proportion to the number who are only the subjects of an indirect or reflected influence. On the mass of the people, who are but slightly affected with divine truth, the missionary must call in every auxiliary to assist him in his work, or he will never have much pleasure or much honour by them."

While the missionary who labours among a savage people has no right to expect much success if he neglects their civilization, it may safely be affirmed, on the other hand, that such as make the attempt without the doctrines of the cross, will soon lay it aside in despair, and leave the work to the slow and uncertain operation of natural or ordinary causes. Suddenly to raise a savage tribe to the comforts of the world in which we live, their minds must be impressed with the reality and importance of the life to come.

The first step towards the civilization of a savage is to rouse the thinking principle. This can only be done by proposing to his mind considerations of sufficient force to overcome his native indolence. These considerations must be addressed to his passions, and suited to his capacity. The desire of hoarding is too weak in the savage to excite enterprise or exertion; although, when he sees the fruits of civilization and industry he may desire them, yet he would rather sleep in his sheep-skin kaross, and depend upon the precarious subsistence of the chase, than submit to the labour of cultivating the ground, or of providing other clothing. Science and literature are above the comprehension of the untutored being; and religion is the only instrument left that can reach his case.

If religion be necessary to awaken the attention,—rouse the thinking principle, and conduct the process of civilization to that point where it may be left to the influence of other causes to conduct it to a successful issue, it is no less necessary to supply the resources, form the combinations, and call forth the instruments required in this work of benevolence. The miseries incident to savage life,—the injuries nomade tribes have received from their contiguity to civilized states, and which, to the shame of America, they are at this day receiving from that republic,—have excited, indeed, much eloquent declamation; but Christian charity alone has furnished the money and the men who have left their homes to reside among barbarians, for the sole end of reclaiming them.

To this principle does the London Missionary Society owe its existence; and the immense and powerful influence which the exertions of their missionaries have had on the moral state of South Africa, is every day becoming better understood, as their settlements are acquiring stability, and extending through that vast country. They are already the seats of industry and improvement of agriculture and the arts, which, but for them, would never have flourished in the wastes where they now bloom. Their exertions will also be found pretty fully detailed in this brief history. They had the honour of being the first who attempted to civilize the rude natives beyond the boundaries of the colony, and to commence a struggle for their civil liberties, which has at length proved successful.

The Wesleyan Methodists have also entered upon the missionary field, which they are cultivating with equal assiduity and success; but their labours had not commenced at the date at which this volume ends.

Africa, which forms one grand division of the globe, is a peninsula, of vast extent: its figure somewhat resembles an irregular pyramid, whose base stretches from the Nile to the Atlantic, and whose apex is the southernmost point of the Cape of Good Hope. Its northern countries were illustrious in the earlier, the ancient, and the succeeding ages, for their progress in knowledge, and in the useful and ornamental arts,—monuments of which remain in the majestic fragments strewed over those once highly cultivated and flourishing regions. Egypt, on the east, the first powerful monarchy on record, was the cradle of the sciences, and the centre of civilization, at a time when the other nations were scattered in clanships or families over the habitated places of the earth. Carthage, the greatest commercial state of antiquity, and which disputed the sovereignty of the world with Rome herself, stretched along the shores of the Mediterranean, farther to the west, occupying the territories now denominated the states of Barbary, Morocco, Fez, Algiers, Tunis, Tripoli, and Barca. Under the Roman dominion, these provinces were the granary of Italy and the empire; but the lands which were denominated then the garden of the world, lie now uncultivated, or productive only in a rank and useless vegetation.

What knowledge the ancients had of Central or Southern Africa, can barely be guessed at,—so entirely have the records of mercantile adventure, by which alone they appear to have been explored, perished amid the wreck of ages. But it has been conjectured, with much probability, that the Tyrians, in the days of Solomon, were not unacquainted with the passage from their own land to the Red Sea, round the southern promontory. It seems certain, however, though not undisputed, that Phenician mariners, under the patronage of Necho, king of Egypt, two hundred years before Herodotus, had circumnavigated that continent, setting out from the Red Sea, and returning by the Mediterranean, through the Pillars of Hercules,—the Straits of Gibraltar. What confirms to moderns this report, is the fact which induced the father of history to disbelieve it: the adventurers stated, that in their progress they saw the sun to the north of their course, which he thought impossible, but which must have actually been the case after they passed the equator. Nor is it undeserving of observation, that the time said to have been spent in this extraordinary expedition was three years, exactly the same period as that allotted in Scripture for the voyages of the combined fleets of Israel and of Tyre to the land whence they brought to Judea gold and silver, ivory, apes, and peacocks. The mere outline of the coast, however, appears to have been indistinctly traced; and after the fall of the Carthagenian empire, even that was forgotten, during the lapse of above a thousand years.

When the spirit of maritime adventure awoke in the fifteenth century, the Portuguese directed their attention to the south-west coast of Africa: but it was not till near its close (1493) that their admiral, Bartholomew Diaz, discovered its southernmost point, which, from the tempestuous weather he encountered, he called the "Cape of Storms." King John II., who augured better, gave it the name it still bears, the "Cape of Good Hope." Gama followed. He doubled the Cape, but, without landing, continued his adventurous track; and while the Portuguese were rearing their dazzling empire in India, they neglected that rugged promontory which forms the key of the East. Once, indeed, they projected a settlement; but having quarrelled with the natives, and been worsted, they contented themselves with a cowardly and treacherous revenge, nor ever again renewed the attempt. The Dutch perceived the advantage the others had overlooked, and seized it as soon as they had obtained a firm footing in the oriental regions.

At first they merely erected a temporary fort for protection, while their ships waited to take in refreshments; but in 1650 they effected a permanent establishment, under the direction of Van Riebeeck. a surgeon of one of their company's vessels, who had particularly pointed out the importance of the station. During the long casual intercourse these calculating merchants had had with the inhabitants, they had introduced among them a taste for finery, and the more pernicious appetite for tobacco and brandy,—for trifling presents of which, they were easily induced to allow the strangers to settle among them; and the Cape and surrounding country were alleged to have been formally ceded by the natives, when they were taken possession of by the Dutch.

Great encouragement being held out to settlers by the East India Company, the colony was soon increased by emigrants from various nations, many of them men of desperate fortune and depraved character; and the original proprietors of the soil were either forced to move farther back, or reduced to a state of more than West Indian slavery by their new friends.

With usual circumspection, however, the Dutch did not at once, but progressively, encroach on their simple neighbours, who, while they were allowed a sufficient range of pasture for their cattle, did not view with much jealousy the occupation of the lands around the Cape by the rising colony; but the farmers of the new settlement, who coveted the more fertile parts of the country, most iniquitously obtained possession both of the cattle and the pasture ground of the unthinking savages, for some trifling presents of tobacco or strong liquors, under whose influence the latter generally concluded their bargains, and to obtain which they sacrificed their wealth and independence, and were reduced to the situation of keepers of those cattle of which formerly they had been the possessors. Yet it was not without some bloody struggles that they relinquished their paternal inheritance, nor have they even now forgotten that they were fraudulently or forcibly dispossessed. When Mr. Latrobe visited S. Africa in 1815–16, the Moravian settlements had been deprived by the farmers of some portions of ground which their people had brought into cultivation, and Mr. Latrobe endeavoured to reconcile them to the Boors. Among other arguments, he told them, that the government had given the lands which were now left them, to the (Moravian) brethren, and that, had it not been for them, they would not have had even the portion they enjoyed. "The Dutch took from me," said an intelligent chief, "the lands of my forefathers. It was not theirs to bestow."

These people differ entirely from the surrounding nations, and have always been known by the name of "Hottentots," a word to which various derivations have been assigned,—some supposing it a native appellation, others a foreign corruption, a third, perhaps the most probable, that it originated with navigators, who imposed it from the peculiarity in their language, a clicking of the tongue, which seemed to resemble "hot" or "tot." The name, however, which they are said to acknowledge among themselves as national, is Quaiquæ. When first noticed, they were divided into tribes or hordes. Kolben enumerates seventeen who spoke the same language, and had the same customs; but if such were actually the case, the greater number have now disappeared, or merged the smaller in the more powerful.

The origin of this insulated nation has been attributed by Mr. Barrow, to the Egyptians; and if we allow the voyages of the Egyptians round the Cape in the early ages, it is by no means improbable but that either by accident or design they may have left colonies on these shores; yet the division into tribes seems rather to point out a Tartar race.

The customs and manners, too, of these people distinguish them both from the negroes and Caffres, as do their physical characters. How far the country properly called "Hottentotland" should extend, it would be difficult to ascertain, nor is it of much importance.

The manners and customs of the savages have now become almost entirely matter of history, and though comparatively recent, are yet involved in considerable difficulty, by the contradictory statements of the earlier travellers, who, while pointing out the errors of one another, have not sufficiently allowed for the changes which time and the intercourse with strangers naturally produce, or for their own liability to misrepresentation or mistake. The following brief sketch is drawn up from comparing their different statements together, and correcting them from the journals of the missionaries, who, if not always the most scientific, are certainly the most faithful reporters, and have possessed the best opportunity for being well informed.

No where did Europeans obtain admission among wild and heathen nations, in the early ages of discovery, but their footsteps were marked by murder, robbery, and oppression. Africa, in particular, has been doomed to be the scene of their most wanton, long-continued abuse of power and superior intelligence; while, to justify their barbarity, they pictured her inhabitants, particularly the Hottentots, as forming a link between the human race and the inferior creation—a species of ourang-outang, devoid of the understanding, and almost of the features and form of man. These misrepresentations disappeared as information increased; and that race are allowed to possess the good and bad qualities natural to savages,—unfortunately, the latter most dreadfully increased by their intercourse with Europeans.

Their appearance is not prepossessing: their colour is a yellowish brown, inclining to olive; the nose flat; the cheek-bones high; the eyes dark, and long, and narrow in their shape; their mouths of a middle size, with very white teeth, and their hair a sort of frizzled wool in tufts. They are generally low in stature, and not devoid of symmetry. The women, in youth, are described as well shaped, but after child-bearing their figures soon alter materially for the worse. The hands and feet are small and delicate in both sexes. What tends to disgust a stranger is, the practice they have of besmearing their bodies with the fat of animals, mixed with red ochre, or the charcoal of tinder-wood, perfumed with the high scented powder of the boughou—plants of different species of the diosma—which they think highly ornamental. But, however disgusting, the practice is salutary in hot climates;—the Hottentots are generally free from cutaneous disorders;—and although it tends to generate a very disagreeable population, at least in their clothes, Vaillant asserts that "boughouing" is an excellent preservative against fleas, with myriads of which he was attacked in some particular situations, till he submitted himself to this fashionable anointing.

This ornamental daubing, of which they are so fond, their dress is not intended to conceal. A sheep skin, saturated with grease, the woolly side inmost, which they termed a kross, or caross, flung over their shoulders, and a short flap to vail what decency requires to be concealed, with occasionally a rude cap, and as rude sandals, form in general the whole habiliments of the man. In fine weather the cloak was allowed to hang loosely, or even thrown aside, but in cold, or during a storm, they are more closely girted, and serve also for blankets and bed-clothes; if the night be chill, they roll themselves together, planting their chins on their knees, and catching hold of the different ends of the covering, they lie as warm as a hedge-hog when coiled within its natural protection.

The women use a similar dress, but their krosses have a hood, in which they carry their infants; and whether the mother goes to work or amusement, she never quits her child; even in dancing it is not unloosed. The head of the little creature only is seen, and is scarcely ever observed to cry, except when the leaping ceases, or when it has occasion to suck: in the latter case, the mother draws it on one side, and conveys her breast to it under her arm, or over her shoulder; when the child is satisfied it ceases crying, and the mother recommences her sport. They, besides, wear aprons in front, which they delight to ornament with buttons, or beads, or shells, and a kind of cap, made of the skins or entrails of animals, above which they place a broad rim, about four fingers deep, of zebra or buffalo hide, with the hair outward, and decked with rows of small shells, or beads when they can procure them. They have necklaces also of the same materials. Formerly, thick leather straps, in the shape of rings were worn by men and women, upon their legs and arms, but now the women use the more fragile European ornaments—beads, preferring, as do sometimes their more civilized sisters, the show to the substance, and rather choose to expose their ankles to be torn by the briars, or bitten by the serpents, than exhibit them unadorned before their countrymen.

Their dwellings, equally rude as their dress, are circular huts, resembling bee-hives in appearance, formed of bent rods or branches of trees, and covered with skins, mats, or reeds, plastered over with clay, sometimes mixed with cow-dung. They are seldom so high as that a man can stand upright; and the only opening to let in air, light, and the inhabitants, is a small hole through which a man must crawl, and which is the only aperture to let out the smoke. The fire-place is in the centre, round which the whole family lie when asleep, or cower when the weather is stormy, without being incommoded by the villanous combination of smells, or the more troublesome little companions which the unctuous coating of the savages and the heat of the climate and the place, tend to produce. "The smoke, stench, vermin, and filth, with which the kennels were filled," says Vaillant, and he is an admirer of the Hottentots, "would have stifled an European who might have had the courage to remain in them two minutes." A kraal, or village, consists of a number of these huts ranged circularly, with their doors placed inwards,—the space in the middle forming a court, within which the cattle are penned during the night, or in times of danger.

Unacquainted with agriculture, they depended on their flocks for subsistence, and knew no riches but the number of cattle. Milk was their favourite beverage, and the flesh of their animals their favourite food; but their herds or flocks were not resorted to till the chase had failed, which was not often in a country abounding in game. Roots were never eaten but in times of the greatest scarcity, although they possess some which Vaillant pronounces both pleasant and nutricious: the kamero, (Hott.) which is shaped like a radish, and as large as a melon; kaa-nap, (Hott.) a kind of potatoe, exceedingly sweet; and two others of the size of a finger, of the smell of fennel and annise, known by the Dutch names of anys-wortel, and vinkel-wortel.

Dancing is almost the only amusement to which they are much addicted; but the uncouth movements defy description. Sometimes they are slow and melancholy; sometimes they are violent, irregular, and wild, and are different in different districts. They are generally practised by the light of the moon, when the air is cool, which gave rise to the report that they worshipped that fair luminary. Their music is of akin, monotonous, dull, or loud, but not harmonious, though their voices are flexible and soft, and, when properly taught, execute foreign airs with great sweetness. Their musical instruments are few, and of no great compass; nor would it be easy to convey any distinct idea of them by mere verbal description. One is a very imperfect sort of guitar; another an equally rude flute; and a third somewhat like a bow, to one end of which a quill was attached, and a hollow vessel to the other; but how the musical sounds were produced and regulated, it is rather a difficult matter to say. A drum, formed of part of the trunk of a tree, hollowed and covered with sheep-skin, concludes the enumeration.

Of the arts of life they have little knowledge. The fabrication of their mats, of baskets for holding their milk, and the preparation of the skins for their apparel, is the utmost extent to which their ingenuity reached, if we except the preparation of poisons, and the making of arms. These last consist of the hassagi, a kind of javelin, having an iron head, about a foot in length, usually barbed and serrated, fastened to a tapering shaft, with which they were deadly marksmen; and the bow and arrow,—the latter always poisoned. The poison is obtained from roots, poisonous plants, or the most venomous serpents. The slightest scratch is commonly fatal. When an animal is killed with one of these arrows, the flesh is immediately torn away from the wound, and the rest is eaten without danger.

Nor are they much better acquainted with the arts of government. The only authority known among them is that of the chief, or captain, as the Europeans call him, of the kraal. He is voluntarily chosen by universal suffrage; but the power which he possesses beyond what his strength, riches, or eloquence confers, is extremely limited. When he cannot persuade, it is very seldom he is able to coerce, for, upon the least disgust, the community would break up, and the captain be left to strut—"himself his regiment."

With regard to religion, they were still more deficient. They had no idea of a Supreme Being. And Africaner, one of the most dreaded warriors, and intelligent savages, declared after his conversion, that before the arrival of the missionaries, he had no idea of a Spirit, Creator, or Supreme Ruler. But they had a superstitious veneration for an insect known by the name of the creeping-leaf, or mantis, the soothsayer. Of this genus there are a great variety of species. The general characters are,—the head is unsteady, being but slightly attached to the thorax, which is very long; the mouth is armed with jaws, and has its feelers filiform. The wings are four, membranaceous and convolute,—the under ones plaited or folded. The fore legs are compressed, armed on the underside with teeth like a saw, and terminated by a single claw. The hind legs are smooth, and formed in some of the species rather for moving slowly than for leaping. This is thought to be one of the most curious genera in the whole class of insects, and is found in the warmer parts of Europe, and in South America, as well as in Africa; but the most extraordinary circumstance relative to it is, the general veneration in which it is held among the ignorant and the uncivilized in all these countries.

"I experienced this morning," says one of the missionaries belonging to the London Missionary Society, "grief and wonder, in conversing with the driver of our wagon, respecting the ignorance in which his nation was involved before the missionaries came among them. He showed me a small insect, (the mantis) called by the farmers the Hottentots' god.' I asked him, 'Did you ever worship this insect?' he answered 'O yes! a thousand times: always, before I came to Bethelsdorp, whenever I saw this little creature, I would fall down on my knees before him, and pray.' 'What did you pray to him for?' 'I asked him to give me a good master, and plenty of thick milk and flesh.' 'Did you pray for nothing else?' No, sir. I did not then know that I wanted anything else.' 'Did you not know that you had an immortal soul?' 'O no! I was as ignorant as these oxen, and knew nothing. Whenever I used to see this little animal, I used sometimes to fall down immediately before it; but if it was in the wagon road, or in a foot path, I used to take it up as gently as I could, to place it behind a bush, for fear a wagon should crush it, or some man or beast should tread it to death.'" If a Hottentot, by some accident, killed or injured this creature, he was supposed to be unlucky all his lifetime after; but if one of these insects happened to alight upon any person, he was considered as highly fortunate. But the most conclusive fact, respecting their natural atheism, is what Dr. Phillip mentions, that neither they nor the Bosjesmen had any word in their language to express a Deity. The only name which the Hottentots have for Him, is Thuite, or Utika, an appellation of which the derivation and meaning are very uncertain.

The general character of the Hottentots, as described by some of the earliest journalists, was that of a good-natured, brave, honest, and truth-telling people: and that they still are distinguished for these virtues, the missionaries and modern travellers bear witness. Their hospitality and readiness to act kindly, even to the Dutch, by whom they had been so much injured, is evinced in every page of the Journal of Joh. Sterreberg Kupt, a landrost, who, in 1705, travelled among the Gonemaas, Grigriquaas, and Namaqua Hottentots, for the purpose of procuring cattle for the use of Government. At every kraal where he halted, he found that freebooters had been before him, who had robbed the natives of numbers of their best oxen; yet they uniformly treated him hospitably, offered him sheep for his subsistence on the journey, and even,—although they were their families' only support,—allowed themselves to be persuaded to part with a few of the cattle the robbers had left them. Of their bravery they gave undoubted proof in their engagements with the Portuguese, and latterly, when embodied in the "Cape regiments."

Their honesty is the theme of Sparrmann's amazement. "Even when compelled by the most cruel usage to leave their places, it is never known, and is really a subject for wonder, that when one of these poor devils runs away from his service, or more properly bondage, he never takes with him anything that does not belong to him. This (he adds) is an instance of moderation in the savages towards their tyrants, which is universally attested, and at the same time praised and admired by the colonists themselves." The Moravian missionaries observe, in praise of the Hottentots, that they are in general strictly honest. They never touch the property of another, unless driven by severe hunger; "and we are told," say they, "that even then, thieving is very rare. If a Hottentot finds anything lost or mislaid, he brings it carefully to its owner. We have already had some instances of this honest disposition in them."

Here, however, panegyric must cease. They are also an indolent, imprudent, gluttonous, and often unnatural race. Their indolence is such, that, provided they are allowed to sleep, they would willingly fast the whole day rather than be at the trouble of digging roots, or following the chase. Sparrmann could seldom engage any of them for long continued exertion; upon one occasion, when he wanted a driver, he applied at a kraal, and was informed by an old man, that his son, a youth about nineteen, could be very well spared, in case he could persuade him to follow him; but although he offered a cow with calf, knives, brass tinder-boxes, glass beads, and even tobacco, the lad, who had some of the latter article at the time, remained sullen and silent; nor was it till after repeated and urgent interrogations, that he could be prevailed upon to utter the emphatic monosyllable, "No." Barrow complains, that his servants frequently passed days without a morsel, rather than walk a mile for a sheep; and the inherent native indolence of their converts was what the missionaries found it often the most difficult of their vices to overcome.

His physical wants force man in his most savage state to exert himself to procure what will satisfy them; but it does not appear that a feeling of these alone have ever made him provident. Although in times of scarcity the Hottentots can be content with very little, they are gluttonous as long as there are plenty of provisions. Vaillant could never make his people comprehend that it would be prudent to reserve a little for a future day. They would not only eat as much as they could—and a Hottentot is capable of eating ten or twelve pounds of meat in a day—but distributed the remainder to whomsoever they met. They were never disturbed respecting the consequence of their prodigality,—their usual answer when spoken to about it was, "We will hunt, or, we will sleep." This latter alternative they seemed able to command at pleasure, or, if the pangs of hunger were too excruciating to allow it, they would resort to a strange method, similar to what is practised among the wild Esquimaux, and compress their stomachs by a leathern bandage, till they could procure food.

But their besetting sin, when they can procure the means, is drunkenness; and almost every traveller who has carried brandy in his luggage, has had to complain, that to get possession of the delirious draught, the Hottentot forgets his usual honesty. Some of the tribes had a method of procuring an intoxicating liquor from honey, which they manufactured at particular seasons; but with this, as with their meat, they kept no bounds, nor reserved any for another occasion. They likewise indulged immoderately in the use of tobacco, or the hemp plant,—in their tongue, dagha,—the leaves of which are still more stupifying than those of the other narcotic weed. For smoking they fabricate pipes of the bamboo reed, with baked earth, or a soft kind of stone, which they cut and scoop out to a considerable depth, as the more capacious they are, they consider them the more valuable.

The most forbidding features of their character, however, are those which they share in common with almost every savage tribe that has yet been discovered,—the destruction of infants, and the desertion of the sick and the aged, which, though not carried to such an extent as among some other barbarians, were yet neither uncommon nor rare occurrences. Much of their degrading vices, however, it must be acknowledged, has either proceeded from, or been encouraged by, their intercourse with Europeans, and the oppressions and spoliations they have suffered from them,—which, by depriving them of every thing that renders life desirable, tearing asunder the dearest ties that unite society together, and reducing them to a state of hopeless subjection, took away every motive to exertion, led them to seek oblivion of misery in intoxication, and to be careless about preserving a life to their relatives which they found so wretched to themselves. The Hottentots are distinguished, as "those within the colony," the Corannas, a pastoral nation inhabiting the banks of the Great Orange River; the "Namaquas," occupying the western coast, with some other roving tribes; and the "Bushmen," or Bosjesman. These last are the wretched remnant of those who, driven from their homes and reduced to desperation, have had every species of obloquy heaped upon them, to justify, if possible, the injustice of which they have been the victims.

Kupt's journal, formerly referred to, confirms this as their origin. When he arrived at a kraal consisting of twenty-three huts, and was surprised to find so few cattle, he was informed that a party of colonists had come to their kraal, and, without saying a word, had fired upon them from all sides,—chased away the Hottentots,—burned their huts,—and carried off their cattle, without their knowing any reason for it, since they never offended any of the Dutch. That, in consequence of having lost all their cattle, they were obliged to go to the bordering Dutch to collect some, and to rob their own countrymen; and whenever they could get any, they drove them into the mountains and feasted till all was consumed; then they went to fetch other cattle, and in this they had succeeded several times; but in order to save the few cattle left them, they were obliged to fight daily with elephants, to procure subsistence for their families. And he afterwards repeats a similar tale, accounting at once for the depopulation and the barbarizing of the natives: "I was much vexed to have found, during a journey of twelve days, along such a tedious and troublesome road, no more than two kraals, and which, although mustering ten captains, were so badly provided with cattle. From this I have learned with sorrow, by the late opened free traffic and the misbehaviour of these vagabonds, the whole country has been ruined; for when one kraal was robbed by the Dutch, the sufferers were driven to rob others, and these again their neighbours. With the plunder they retired into the mountains, and feasted till it was consumed, when they went again in search of other booty. And thus, from a people living in peace and happiness, divided into kraals under chiefs, and subsisting quietly by the breeding of cattle, they are become almost all of them huntsmen, Bosjesmen, and robbers, and are dispersed everywhere among the barren and rugged mountains."

Harassed and plundered on every side, they divided among themselves, and those who preferred famine to slavery, retired to the mountains or most uninviting parts of the deserts.—while those who remained in the fertile territory, sunk into a state of servitude, as herdsmen or domestics to the Boors; the former, obtained the name of Bosjesmen, the latter, were still denominated Hottentots. For a period of seventy years, the same system continued, till the increase of the colonists requiring an increase of servants, they followed the Bushmen into the deserts and mountains, to murder the men whose imperishable love of freedom they could not eradicate, and seize the women and children to reduce them to slavery, on the lands their husbands and fathers had occupied as rightful and independent proprietors. Turning in despair on their pursuers, the Bushmen often inflicted a merited revenge, when the Boors formed the horrible project,—surpassing even that conduct which has doomed the Spanish name in the West to execration,—of enslaving or extirpating all that remained of the original inhabitants.

By the most vilifying representations, they prevailed upon the colonial government, which now shared in the produce, and sympathised in the iniquities of the farmers, in 1774, to order the whole race of Bushmen to be extirpated, reserving the women and children, with the cattle, to be divided among the destroyers. To accomplish this infernal plan, three commandoes, or military parties, were formed, with instructions to proceed against these unfortunate men, and, if possible, to take them by surprise. Imperfect records of these bloody exhibitions remain, to stamp with infamy forever the avaricious wretches, and rescue the insulted character of their victims from their aspersions. One of these bands of legalized robbers, after having surrounded a kraal, fired upon it, and either killed or made captive the whole.

Two spies were sent out about the same time with two Bushmen, whose conduct on the occasion might have illustrated with no secondary splendour the brightest page in the annals of ancient or modern patriotism. They promised to show where some of their countrymen were concealed; but, instead of conducting them right, they led them to a different quarter. A few days after, they were sent out again, and seven spies with them, assured that, in case of a second failure, they should certainly be put to death, but if they pointed out their comrades, they should as certainly be spared. Resolved, however, not to betray their friends, they proceeded for an hour, then fell flat on the ground, and lay as if they had been dead. When commanded to rise, they lay still—threats, promises, blows, were in vain—they remained inflexible; and the brutal wretches who accompanied them, incapable of appreciating the magnanimity of their self-devotion, murdered them on the spot.

It is impossible to ascertain the extent of the massacres committed upon the Bushmen by the commandoes; but the murders committed by the farmers equalled, perhaps exceeded, these. Hostilities never ceased for a day; the Boors considered the murder of a few Bushmen, wherever found, and in whatever circumstances, a meritorious action, and the capture of their wives and children, lawful prey. In their parties for hunting or pleasure, they followed and killed these proscribed wretches as they would have done any other species of game; and so universal was the passion, that Vaillant mentions a young woman not twenty, who was admired for her heroism because she was accustomed to accompany her father on horseback, and pursue and shoot the Bushmen without mercy. "A Boor from Graaf-Reinet being asked in the Secretary's Office, a few days before we left town, if the savages were numerous or troublesome on the road? replied, 'he had only shot four,' with as much composure and indifference as if he had been speaking of four partridges. I myself have heard one of the humane colonists boast of having destroyed with his own hands near three hundred of these unfortunate wretches."

Such a system rendered the Bushmen the very thieves and assassins the farmers had represented them: from peaceable happy neighbours they were transformed into ferocious and vindictive enemies. "One of them," says the same writer, "represented to us the condition of his countrymen as truly deplorable: that for several months in the year, when the frost and snow prevented them from making their excursions against the farmers, their sufferings from cold and want of food were indescribable: that they frequently beheld their wives and children perishing with hunger, without being able to give them any relief. The good season even brought little alleviation to their misery. They knew themselves to be hated by all mankind, and that every nation around them was an enemy planning their destruction. Not a breath of wind rustled through the leaves, not a bird screamed, that were not supposed to announce danger. Hunted thus like beasts of prey, and ill treated in the service of the farmers, he said they considered themselves driven to desperation. The burden of their song was—Vengeance against the Dutch!"

Exasperated by their long continued sufferings, the Bushmen know no sweeter pleasure than revenge, and this they extend, not only to the farmers, but to the Hottentots employed by them; and should they seize one guarding his master's cattle, not content with putting him to death, they torture him by every means of cruelty their invention can frame,—drawing out his bowels, tearing off his nails, scalping, or other acts equally cruel. Yet they exercise among themselves a union and benevolence which, the missionaries at Zak River remark, would shame not only nominal but real Christians. After about a twelvemonths' residence among them, they say they had never perceived a quarrel; and when they gave them a little tobacco, it was always equally divided among all present; and when one or two were invited to the mission-house, and meat presented them, they would not eat it by themselves, but carried it off, to share it with their friends.

Their huts are the most miserable that can be conceived. In the cliffs of the rock they dig a round den about three feet deep, which they cover with a few reeds, seldom sufficient to defend them from the rain, in which they lie with their whole family. Their dress is similar to the other Hottentots, as is their custom of besmearing themselves; only, the women do not cover the whole body with colour, but vary the painting, by laying it on in stripes of red and black. Their arms are the small bow and the poisoned arrow, which will fly a distance of two hundred paces, and hit with tolerable accuracy at half length. They generally conceal themselves, and take aim from behind a bush; and if the object be within sixty paces, the shot is deadly.

When hunting or foraging among the farmers fails, they feed on wild roots, berries, and plants, or on the larvæ of insects, white-ants, grasshoppers, snakes, and reptiles; and as they are often exposed to hunger, their figures are in general stunted and shrivelled, yet not deformed; and they are wonderfully agile. They practise bigamy; but conjugal affection is little known; and often in a quarrel between the wives, the defeated party wreaks her revenge on the child of the conqueror. Nor do the men hesitate to kill their children when ill shaped, in want of food, or when obliged to flee from the farmers, in which case they will strangle them, cast them away in the desert, or bury them alive. In the dreadful depression caused by their extreme poverty, even natural affection is almost extinguished. The children in general cease to be objects of their mother's care, as soon as they are able to crawl. As the females alone gather roots or berries, they go out in the morning, and leave their infants till they return in the evening, when an old sheep skin for a bed, a little milk, or a small portion of such food as they may have, is all the attention they receive. In removing from place to place, they frequently forsake their aged relatives, leaving with them a piece of meat, and an ostrich egg-shell full of water.

But excepting the misery which results from polygamy, the frequency of the other crimes was certainly the result of the monstrous cruelty to which these poor wretches were exposed from the Dutch farmers. The natural consequence of extreme long-continued poverty in civilized life, is to steel the heart against all the finer affections, nor is it to be expected that it should be different among savages, although the effects may be more horribly evident. When at all free from the immediate pressure of their terrible calamities, the Bushmen are a sprightly and a cheerful people, and, like their ancestors, amazingly fond of dancing.

War, which, amid all its cruelties and desolations, has in Europe occasionally called into action some of the highest faculties and noblest dispositions of man, produces often the same effects among those wild and hitherto despised outcasts. When a horde is surrounded by farmers, and little chance is perceived by them of effecting an escape, they will fight it out most furiously, so long as a man shall be left alive. It frequently happens on such occasions, that a party will volunteer the forlorn hope, by throwing themselves in the midst of the colonists, in order to create confusion, and to give to their countrymen, concealed among the rocks, or in the long grass, at the expense of their own lives, an opportunity of exercising more effectually their mortal weapons upon their enemies, and at the same time to facilitate the escape of their wives and children. Their plundering expeditions are conducted not without system. They never venture on an attack without having first well reconnoitered their ground, and having come to a proper understanding with each other upon the signals to be made in every possible case that can occur. In managing these, they have attained to such perfection, that they will make themselves understood at the distance of many miles, particularly in the night. By means of fires on the summits of the mountains, they will indicate to each other the numbers of a herd or flock they mean to plunder, with the means of defence that the people possess who are guarding them. And their sight is rendered so acute by spying constantly around them, that they perceive objects clearly, at a distance which no European with the best eyes could see, without the assistance of glasses. If in carrying off their booty they chance to be pursued, they always divide, one party to drive off the cattle, the others to annoy and harass the pursuers; and when the Boors are too many for them, they stab or maim the whole herd. Should the farmers continue the pursuit after the depredators, they take refuge in the steep mountains, which they climb with the agility of baboons. From thence they roll down stones on any that is imprudent enough to approach, and, sheltered themselves behind some jutting piece of the rock, laugh at their assailants. The language is the same with that of the Hottentots, only the clicking is more rapid, which renders their speaking more unintelligible.

Influenced most probably by the representations of the colonists, Lichtenstein appears to have adopted the common prejudices against the Bushmen; yet, notwithstanding his general view of their character, which, by the way, is not altogether consistent with itself, agrees, in some of its material points, with the descriptions of the missionaries. "There is not," he says, "perhaps any class of savages upon the face of the earth that lead lives so near those of the brutes as the Bosjesmen; none, perhaps, who are sunk so low—who are so unimportant in the scale of existence—whose wants, whose cares, and whose joys, are so low in their nature,—and who are consequently so little capable of cultivation. Certainly, no other tribe of savages has yet been found in whom so high a degree of brutal ferocity is united with so much craft and so many proofs of real power of mind. To sleep, to eat, and to drink, are the only wants, smoking tobacco and drinking brandy the only joys, that the Bushman knows; yet these wants—these joys, he can forego longer than any other mortal. The very same person who, with five of his fellow-countrymen, will eat a fat sheep in an hour, or a quagga in half a night, will be able to fast for three or four days together, even without this abstinence having been preceded by such a feast. Mere sloth is sometimes the principal motive of this forbearance: he would sooner resist the cravings of his stomach, and endeavour to sleep them away, than make any bodily exertion to satisfy them. He will live for months together upon a few little bulbs, which at certain times of the year are to be found in the low parts of the country, and never leave the spot till the whole harvest has been consumed."

An uncommon degree of perseverance is distinguishable in everything he undertakes. He will sometimes spend a whole day together in low places, scratching up the ground to find water, and if once convinced that there is any to be found, will dig even to the depth of six feet to come at it. The whole recompense for this toil is, perhaps, a handful of water for each person concerned in the achievement, which they take in rotation,—each being obliged to wait the replenishment of the little well, after the former has had his quantum. If they perceive the track of any wild animal, they never cease following it till the animal itself is taken. On the naked barren plains, where dexterity and artifice must supply the defect of his weapons, he will conceal himself from the shy antelope and the quick-sighted ostrich, by crawling along the earth on his belly, and strewing his body or garments over with dust, that the colour may not betray him; and if the animal chance to look his way, he will remain immovable for hours, till at last he approaches so near that he is sure of his mark. No difficulties deter them from pursuing any undertaking on which they are at once resolved. To the first step alone do they ever show any reluctance; but if once their propensity to indolence is so far subdued as to begin, the object is pursued with boldness, with cunning, and with pertinacity, till it is obtained.

Wretched and miserable as was the situation of the Bushmen, the state of the aborigines who remained within the colonies was yet worse. They were driven from one fertile spot to another, and harassed on every side; till worn out, they resigned themselves to what seemed their inevitable destiny,—like "the unwary sailor" left upon a sand bank, and surrounded by the flowing tide, who first gives up one dry spot, when he sees the waters approaching,—then another, and another, where he vainly thought he might be safe; till at length he lays him down to rest in some distant corner, far off as he supposes from danger, to wait the receding tide, and is only awakened to the horror of his situation by the dashing of the billow that cuts off every hope of escape, then, listless and careless, submits to his fate.

The numerous free villages with which the country once abounded, one by one disappeared; and the few paltry and miserable hordes who had established themselves in some of the districts, had no longer the power of choosing their own chiefs. To this office none were appointed but by the governor of the settlement; and to mark his dependence, he had the honour, upon repairing to Cape-Town, to receive a large cane with a copper head, and a gorget of the same metal to put round his neck. From that moment his melancholy horde, which for a long time had lost its natural name, assumed that of its new chief, who became to the governor a new spy and a new slave, and to his people a new tyrant,—for the governor himself never being personally acquainted with those whom he appoints, the planter nearest the horde usually procures the nomination of one of his own creatures, who he knew would have all his vassals ready at his service, whenever he chose to require it: and, thus, without any preliminary information, and even without any regard to justice, these helpless and feeble hordes were obliged to receive the law from a man often incapable of commanding them, and to pass into real servitude, while mocked with the empty name of freedom.

Those dispersed among the farmers, as servants, were still more miserable: having no protector, and his master no superior at hand to check his excesses, the unfortunate bondsman was urged to incessant toil, by the infliction of the most cruel and revolting punishments. Though nominally a free man, blows and stripes could be heaped upon him at the caprice of his master; and as the latter lost nothing by his mutilation or death, these were not unfrequently the result of his hasty or deliberate vengeance. Of the treatment to which they are subjected, Barrow gives several instances. "We had scarcely parted from these people when stopping at a house to find our horses, we by accident observed a young Hottentot woman, with a child in her arms, lying stretched on the ground in a most deplorable condition. She had been cut from head to foot with one of those infernal whips made from the hide of a rhinoceros, or sea-cow, known by the name of samboes, in such a barbarous and unmerciful manner that there was scarcely a spot in her whole body free from stripes. Nor had the sides of the little infant, in clinging to its mother, escaped the strokes of the brutal monster. The only crime alleged against her was, the attempt to follow her husband, who was among the number of those of his countrymen that had determined to throw themselves upon the protection of the English. The next house we halted at upon the road presented us with a still more horrid instance of brutality. We observed a fine Hottentot boy, about eight years of age, sitting at the corner of the house, with a pair of iron rings clenched upon his legs, of the weight of ten or twelve pounds; and they had remained in one situation for such a length of time, that they appeared to be sunk into the leg,—the muscles being tumefied both above and below the rings.

The poor creature was so benumbed and oppressed with the weight, that being unable to walk with ease, he crawled on the ground. It appeared they had been riveted to his legs more than ten months ago. The charges against the poor child were, that he had slept when he ought to have watched the cattle; that he had lost him some sheep; and that he was a worthless boy. Another ruffian, not far from one of the missionary settlements, chopped off one of a Hottentot's hands with an axe, and said, when quarrelled for his cruelty, that the fellow had always been idle and good for nothing before, but that since he had lost his hand he had become one of his most attentive and valuable herdsmen.

Nor were they at liberty to choose their employment or their masters. Any Dutch peasant was allowed to claim as his property any child of any Hottentot in his service, till the age of twenty-five, to whom he had given a morsel of bread. Should a Hottentot, therefore, who had perhaps engaged himself only for a year, wish to depart at the expiration of his time, his master might permit him; but his children, who had been tempted to enter the Boor's door and taste a morsel of food, were detained; or, if the master wished to detain the person himself, he would give him a piece of tobacco or a glass of brandy, or say that he had suffered an ox to stray, and muster up an account which his servant was detained to work out; but this he seldom accomplished till age and infirmity came upon him, and then he was a free man, and turned to shift for himself as he might.

Degradation of character was the necessary consequences of such treatment. A deep and settled gloom, and a habitual depression of spirits, took place of that hilarity which had formerly distinguished them; their indolence increased to a degree hardly credible, and they became more and more addicted to gluttony and drunkenness; their numbers began gradually to decline, the very structure of their bodies was said to have shrunk, and to have lost its force and its agility, and the whole race seemed rapidly wasting away, nor could aught, but the disinterested exertions of Christian missionaries, have saved them from entire annihilation.*

Besides the various tribes of Hottentots within the colony or on the frontiers, there are increasing and important classes of natives scattered over the country, who have sprung from the connexion of white men with Hottentot women, and of Hottentot women with negroes, both known by the generic of "Bastard Hottentots," but differing exceedingly in the features and dispositions. The former are robust and well made; their skin is of a clearer yellow than that of the Hottentots, and has the colour of a dried lemon-peel; their hair is black, much longer, and less frizzled. The intermixture of Europeans with females produces a species still whiter; till, in the third generation there is little perceptible difference between them and the Europeans, except the distinguishing prominence of the cheek bones. They are courageous, active, impetuous, and enterprizing; but being treated with contempt by the whites, they form a distinct and separate part of the community. The others are in general taller and better made, and their colour, a medium between the black of the father and the olive tint of the mother, is more agreeable to the sight. They are capable of great labour, and to much activity, without turbulence, they join a fidelity which never betrays. But they are not so numerous as the former; both are estimated as equal to one-sixth of all the Hottentots within the colony. And some of them have raised themselves to opulence, while others, as leaders of bands, have rendered themselves formidable to the colonists, by whom, if they are not much more esteemed than the Hottentots, they are much more dreaded. All were, however, upon a level as to religious instruction. To speak to any of them upon the subject, was deemed by the farmers little less than sacrilege; and, latterly, the aversion of the Boors to their instruction was such, that in some of the churches in the interior, boards were affixed upon their doors, on which was inscribed, "No Hottentots or dogs admitted." The whole number of the Hottentots remaining within the boundaries of the colony, were lately estimated at nearly twenty thousand; the Bastards about four; in all, perhaps, not more than twenty-five thousand.

Dutch attempts to convert the Hottentots—Given up in despair—Hottentots declared incapable of receiving instruction—Attention of the Moravians directed to South Africa—George Schmidt sent out on a mission—Arrives at the Cape of Good Hope—Received favourably—Commences his labours near the River Sunder Eynd—Encouraging prospects—Obliged to remove—Settles near Sergeant's River—His success in educating the children—Several of the natives baptized—Their cheering progress—Mission obliged to be given up—Congregation scattered—Mission renewed—Settlement of Bavian's Kloof—Old Helena—Hottentots flock to the settlement—Farmers hostile to the instruction of the Hottentots—Government friendly—Calumniated—Commence their school—A Hottentot funeral—The Brethren's plan of instruction—Eager attention of the Hottentots—Prosperous state of the mission—Persecution—Mr. Clude visits them—Their distresses—Awakening among the people—their enemies disappointed—The Boors rise in arms, and threaten the Moravians—Distracted state of the colony and of the mission—Afflicting departure of the Hottentots from Bavian's Kloof—Resolutions of "the Nationals" force the missionaries to quit the settlement—They go to Cape-Town—Return joyfully.

Along with the commercial oppressions, the Dutch commonly made some endeavours to impart a knowledge of Christianity in their foreign colonies; but while generally successful in their mercantile speculations, they were by no means equally happy in their missionary efforts. We are told that many learned and pious men were sent by them to the Cape, who underwent numberless dangers and fatigues, and took the greatest pains to make proselytes among the Hottentots, but without effect: neither the force of their reasonings, nor the charms of their address, made any impression, and they were compelled to abandon their generous design, without leaving the least trace of it on the minds of the savages. "And I'll venture to prophecy," adds Kolben, after mentioning the fact, "that for this age, at least, it will not be attended with better success."

In support of his opinion, he quotes Boeving, who says—"These infidels," meaning the Hottentots, "show the utmost reluctance when they are called to reason on matters of religion. How often have I admonished them to adore Gounja Gounja, as they call Almighty God, and give Him thanks for the benefits they daily receive at his hands! They neglected not among themselves to return one present or kind office for another, and bowed their bodies when they received a gift from a parent, friend, or stranger;—how, therefore, I asked them, could they neglect to pay the gratitude that was due to God the father of all mercies, and giver of every good thing? They replied, they did thank Gounja Gounja. But how? demanded I; pray, let me have the particulars. But they, not being able or willing to proceed, I went on and endeavoured to instruct them after what manner they ought to pay their acknowledgments to the God of gods, and to make them sensible of the homage and veneration that was due to Him who is the faithful rewarder of all who diligently seek him: but, alas! they grew uneasy before I had entered far into these matters; and at length, losing all patience, retired, some frowning, and others laughing: so that I could not so much as pave a way towards instructing them in the great points of Christianity."

This method of conversion having proved ineffectual, the historian of the Cape relates, with great naiveté, his own attempts in the way of Christianizing the same infidels. "Many a time," says he, "have I allured them, in small companies, with tobacco, wine, brandy, and other things, to places of retirement, in order to eradicate their nonsensical whimseys, and instruct them in the pure worship of God. As long as my store lasted, I had my company, who seemed to attend with a desire to learn; but when that was spent, they called out for more, and, without it, would not stay to hear another word."

That such attempts to enlighten the heathen should have failed, is no great matter of surprise, nor is it wonderful that the colonists, who thought it their interest that the poor natives were kept in bondage and ignorance, should have industriously propagated a belief that they were incapable of receiving instruction. It was reserved for that highly honoured people, the Moravians, practically to demonstrate the folly of these modes of conversion, and the falsity of the conclusions drawn from them. Their attention was called to this despised nation, by an application from Messrs. Von Alphen and Domine de Bruin, of Amsterdam, 7th February, 1736, to the congregation at Herrnhuth, wishing to know, whether it would be practicable for them to send one of the brethren to endeavour to lead them to the knowledge of our Saviour? These devoted men immediately took the subject into their serious consideration, and called their brother, George Schmidt, to the service, who, on the 14th of the same month, left for Amsterdam,—so ready was this servant of God to undertake a long voyage to preach the gospel to a people, reported the most degraded of the human race; but he had been trained in a good school, and had already suffered imprisonment for the sake of the gospel, from 1728 to 1734, under the hands of the Papists, in the dungeons of Bohemia.

* Philip's Researches in S. Africa, vol. i. pp. 55—57

When he arrived at Amsterdam, March 9, many difficulties were to be encountered; and he was obliged to wait a year, before he could obtain permission from the East India Company to go to the Settlement. In the month of September, when the general court of directors met at Middleburg, in Zeeland, he presented a petition to the court, stating, "That from love to God our Saviour, and the poor heathen, he wished to go to the Cape, to preach the gospel to the Hottentots; praying that leave might be granted to take his passage on board one of their ships." His petition being admitted, some clergymen were appointed to examine him. These reverend gentlemen first examined him on several points of faith, with which being satisfied, they mentioned to him the difficulty of attaining a knowledge of the Hottentot language, and of being among a people who had no other food than wild roots. To which he answered, that with God all things were possible; and as he was convinced of its being the Lord's will that he should preach the gospel to them, he trusted confidently in Him for help to carry him through every circumstance, however discouraging. At first this language appeared rather strange to his examinators, but at length they agreed, that God, to whom indeed all things are possible, would not despise his good intentions; and his views being sincere and laudable in themselves, they wished him the blessing of the Lord.

His petition being now granted, he was informed that he might take his passage on board one of their ships—had a passport given him—and one of the directors kindly gave letters of recommendation to the two governors at the Cape, M. de La Fontaine and M. Von Kerbel. On the 11th March 1737, he left Holland in the Reynsburg frigate, Captain John de Bruin,—the text of Scripture for the day being, "The way of the righteous is made plain," Prov. xv. 19. Contrary winds drove the vessel into Saldanha bay, where they remained at anchor for a fortnight; and there he first saw some Hottentots, with whom he held a little conversation in the Dutch language; "and my very heart," he observes, "rejoiced at the sight of them." July 9th, they arrived at Cape Town; and he immediately waited upon the governor, by whom he was received with great kindness.

A few days after, Captain Rhenius offered him board and lodging at his house, which he gladly accepted; and he was treated by all the authorities with much civility. During his stay, he made frequent excursions into the country, to see the natives; and finally left the town on September 4th, to pursue the object of his mission, in company with a Dutch corporal, sent to procure provisions, and two Hottentots, captains Africo and Kibbodo. On the 13th September, they arrived at the river Sunder Eynd, about seventy miles distant, where was a Dutch post, and where Africo resided, who, with his people, welcomed him after their manner,—with music: and he, in return, addressed them on their more important concerns, in Dutch. Africo then took him and showed him the country; after surveying which, he resolved to settle among the Hottentots in that quarter,—the corporal very kindly offering him the use of his tent, till he could build a hut. The text for the day, when he first pitched his tent among them, was remarkable—"Enlarge the place of thy tent, and let them stretch forth the curtains of thine habitations: spare not; lengthen thy cords, and strengthen thy stakes," Isa. liv. 2.

Having brought seeds with him, he instantly commenced digging a garden, and framing a hut. Every evening, the Hottentots came to see him; and he endeavoured to learn their language. But, that no time might be lost, he, through the medium of Africo, as his interpreter, began to attempt communicating to them the things of God. He asked if they knew that a great Spirit dwelt above, who had given them their cattle and all they had? to which they readily answered, "Yes!" on which he added—"This good Spirit is He who alone can save you; and I am come hither with no other view than to make you acquainted with Him." They replied, "We are glad to hear this!"

After labouring at the Hottentot language till the end of October, he found it inadequate to convey the knowledge of the gospel, and therefore began to teach the Hottentots Dutch. Africo's family were his first scholars. He was, about the same time, cheered with the company of the corporal at the post, to whom, having spoken freely of the love of the Saviour, it pleased God to open his heart to receive the word in faith, and he loved him as his Redeemer. "This man," he adds in his journal, "remained my firm friend, till the Lord took him home to himself." Nor were his ministrations without effect among the Hottentots. But just when his situation was beginning to be pleasant and comfortable, he received notice that it was too near the Company's post,—probably some of the inhabitants envying him the spot that he had cultivated.

He, in consequence, left his dwelling on the 23d of April, 1738, and removed with eighteen Hottentots, who loved him, and relished his doctrine, to a desert place on Sergeant's river, twelve miles from the post; where he built a new hut, and planted another garden, and at the same time taught his Hottentots to dig, build, and plant. Meanwhile his school proceeded prosperously. They met every evening; and one of his scholars, named Willem, he took into his hut. Of him he says, "He truly loved the crucified Jesus, and had found the remission of sins in his blood. He afterwards became my assistant, and told his countrymen, in their own language, that he knew by experience that what I said of God our Saviour was true."

By degrees, a pretty large number came to attend, and sent their children to learn to speak and read Dutch; and to enable him to board them, they gave him a couple of milch cows, that they might have a sufficiency of milk, besides the roots they gathered. The scholars now amounted, generally, to upwards of thirty, and were sometimes so high as fifty. Africo and Kibbodo, to his great joy, declared for the Saviour; they confessed that they had been vile slaves of sin, but had now found that Jesus' blood had power to deliver them from the dominion of evil. The Dutch likewise began to visit this little settlement, and some of them spoke well of it; but, although not explicitly stated, it seems highly probable that others began to oppose and secretly to raise those hinderances which eventually forced the good man to leave the colony. Nevertheless, the work of God went on, and a circumstance took place of no little importance, in 1740: Schmidt's friend the corporal died, and was succeeded by Daniel Christopher Martinson, who was a man of superior abilities, and, being converted by the ministration of Schmidt, preached most powerfully to the Hottentots of the atonement made by the blood of the Lamb.

According to the practice of the brethren among the heathen, he was in no hurry to administer the ordinance of baptism, nor was it till 1742, that Willem, Africo, and Kibbodo received this initiating rite; but as soon as it became known in Cape Town that he had baptized Hottentots, the people were astonished, and some of them were highly displeased; and when two of them happened to be in the town, the clergyman sent for and examined them respecting their creed. The answer of the baptized was simple: "We believe in God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost," with which they appeared satisfied; and asked if they could read? when, a New Testament being produced, they read the third chapter of the Gospel according to John. The clergymen then exhorted them to remain obedient to their teacher, and dismissed them in peace.

Several others having been admitted to partake of the same holy ordinance, he began, 1743, to have meetings with the baptized alone, preparatory to forming them into a church; but he met with so many impediments and difficulties, that he was advised to come to Europe, in order to get them removed. Accordingly, making over his hut and garden to Africo, he delivered a farewell discourse to his beloved Hottentots, October 30th, 1743, and took leave. They wept much at parting. He then set out for the Cape, where he remained till 4th of March, 1744; when, having obtained testimonials of his good conduct in the country, and permission to leave it, he set sail for Holland, and arrived in the Texel, June 17th. All his endeavours, and those of his brethren, to procure leave to return, were in vain; and thus terminated this first most interesting mission to the Hottentots. The number of his congregation settled at his station, (afterwards better known as Bavian's Kloof, i. e. "baboon's cliff," or mountain,) amounted in all to forty-seven persons, when their teacher left them.

By succeeding accounts, they remained together waiting for his return: how long is uncertain. In 1747, John Martin Schwaebler went thither to take care of the forsaken Hottentots, but no further accounts were heard of him. Information was, however, received of a remnant of the work, in the year 1760. Though this congregation, however, was dispersed, it is more than probable that by this means,—though the facts be unknown,—was silently spread through the country that desire for Christian instruction which afterwards, by the blessing of God, under the care of succeeding missionaries, and in happier times, has had such astonishing effects. The attempt itself was vilified and traduced among the Boors for years after; and the hatred they expressed, and the obliquy they poured on the memory of the venerable Schmidt, evidently pointed out the causes which led to the breaking up of this society of Christian Hottentots.

When Sparrmann was near the spot in 1775, he was told that the doctrines of Christianity had been formerly preached there to the Hottentots, and received by them with great avidity and zeal, and that it was still within the memory of several of the inhabitants, that one of the converts, an old female Hottentot, was living, and used to perform her devotions every morning on her bare knees, by the side of a spring situated near this spot, who had a German (Dutch) Bible, which she often read, and treated with the greatest veneration, and that her behaviour throughout life was decent and quiet; but the doctor's informers added, that the missionary who had converted her, had been banished out of the country, for having illegally made himself a chief among the Hottentots in these parts, in order to enrich himself by their labour, and the presents they made him of cattle.

Some of the Moravian brethren who were at the Cape, on their passage from the East Indies, in 1780, saw a Hottentot woman who had been baptized by Schmidt, and who expressed a great desire for the renewal of the mission. She had a Dutch Bible he had given her, which she valued above all things. These accounts of the remaining sparks of that fire of the Lord which once began to kindle among the dispersed Hottentots, excited among the friends of the cause a strong desire to revive the mission; and the synod of the brethren which met at Herrnhuth in 1789, renewed their applications to the Dutch East India Company for leave to send missionaries to the Cape of Good Hope.

This being granted, three brethren, Henry Marsveld, Daniel Schwinn, and John Chr. Kuehnel, accepted the call to proclaim the Gospel to the Hottentots; and in 1792, sailed for their destination, to renew the mission, under circumstances most unexpectedly favourable. They arrived at Cape-Town in November, where they remained a month. A revival of religion having taken place here, a society was formed of about sixty, who met twice a week for mutual edification; and being invited to attend, they found, to their great encouragement, that many prejudices which had been raised against the brethren, by false accusations, had entirely vanished; and these, their fellow-Christians, were ready to bid them God speed,—expressing great joy that God had again opened a door for the Gospel among the Hottentots. They experienced much friendship from the governor, commissioners, and Col. Gordon, who advised them to wait the arrival of Mr. (or Baas, i. e. the master) Teunis, inspector of a large district, to whom they would give proper directions to take them with him, and lend them every proper assistance.

While waiting, they had an opportunity of learning the opinions the Boors entertained concerning them; some of whom considered them as a species of monsters, while others did not hesitate to say, "If these Moravians come here to convert the Hottentots, they ought instantly to be put to death." But none of these things moved them: they committed themselves and their cause to their God and Saviour, convinced that nothing could happen either, but what was according to his good pleasure. When Mr. Teunis arrived, it was the general opinion of the governor, commissioners, and the inspector, that the missionaries should attempt their first settlement at Bavian's Kloof, where their late brother Schmidt had resided; to which they assented, especially on being assured that more Hottentots resided there than in any other part of the country: and on the 20th December set out with their guide, the inspector, who engaged to provide them with provisions on the journey.

They had often been surprised on seeing farmers arrive at Cape-Town with twelve oxen yoked to a wagon, which two could easily have drawn; but when they came to ascend some of the stupendous and almost perpendicular hills on their route, they found that double the number was not superfluous. They travelled by night, and rested all day, during which the oxen were turned loose, to seek their food on the luxuriant herbage,—the heat being too fatiguing to proceed. Early on the 22d, they crossed the river Sunder Eynd, and arrived at Mr. Teunis's house, which he desired them to consider their home till otherwise provided.

The 24th, the day appointed to determine their future habitation, before entering upon so important an undertaking, they devoutly implored their Saviour's grace and help, and entreated Him, on the eve of the memorial day of his nativity, to bless and sanctify them in soul and body, as his redeemed ones, for his service; and commended themselves especially to his gracious guidance, in fixing on a spot for their residence. At 6 o'clock in the morning, they set out, and at 10 arrived at Bavian's Kloof. On inquiry at a Hottentot kraal, whether any of the inhabitants knew the place where George Schmidt's house had stood? a man immediately went with them, and showed them the very spot, where they found a large piece of the wall still standing, and several fruit trees in the garden. There were three other trees, an almond, apricot, and pear-tree, at some distance, which they declared they were certain Schmidt had also planted. Some ruins of cottages, which the Hottentots had built round their teacher's dwelling, also remained.

They found, too, at no great distance, an old woman whom George Schmidt had baptized, but now so feeble, that she was unable to walk. She told them her name was Helena; and that she was now the only one remaining alive of those he had baptized. When asked, whether she remembered anything of the doctrine she had been taught, she confessed she had forgot all. "But," said the missionaries, "have you forgotten that he told you of Jesus, who, though God from heaven, became a man, and died on the cross to save us from our sins?" she replied, "That I remember." They then told her they were George Schmidt's brethren; and if the Hottentots desired to be saved, they would point out the way unto them, as he had done,—when she exclaimed, "Thanks be to God!" "Which word," say the missionaries, "filled our hearts with joy." She then showed them a Dutch New Testament which had been given her by Schmidt, which she kept carefully enclosed in a leathern bag, wrapped round with two sheep-skins. She could formerly read, but was now blind. Another woman, however, about 30 years old, who had been taught to read by one of Schmidt's scholars, read to her; and when desired to let the missionaries hear her, read with considerable propriety the 2d chapter of Matthew, containing the history of our Saviour's birth; but when asked if she knew who the child Jesus was? could give no answer.

Having fixed upon this spot for a settlement, they marked the site of a house, 36 feet long, 15 wide, and 7 from the floor to the roof, to contain a sitting-room, a sleeping-chamber, and a kitchen, about 15 yards from the ruins of Schmidt's dwelling. While thus engaged, nine Hottentot men and ten women assembled to bid them welcome. To them they immediately began to preach Jesus as the Saviour of sinners, standing under the shade of the great pear-tree planted by their venerable predecessor. At length they had the pleasure, January 5, 1793, of laying the foundation-stone of their habitation. It was formed of wood and sun-burnt bricks, which the Hottentots prepared in the following manner:—One of them ploughed a piece of land with six oxen; and having made it pretty even with a harrow, he drove the cattle backwards and forwards upon it till the clods were properly trodden. A large bull's hide being then spread out and filled with the clay, it was dragged by the oxen to the building, where it was formed by the workmen into bricks, and the wall raised about a foot high on all sides. In this situation it stood one day to dry; and a similar process was continued till the walls were finished.

One of the brethren, in turn, superintended the building, which the indolence of the Hottentots, and the difficulty of providing food for them and their families, who came to reside near while the work was proceeding, rendered both a teazing and a tedious business.

News of what was going forward spread speedily in all directions, and numbers of Hottentots came to offer their assistance in building, or to settle on the premises. The Boors, too, came to see the rising settlement, which they viewed with the utmost jealousy and suspicion; and although they behaved to the missionaries in a friendly manner in their presence, behind their backs they gave vent to all their malignity. What tended to increase this hatred was—government had decidedly declared in their favour, and sent to the landrost of Schwellendam, to Teunis, and to themselves, an official order, declaring that they, the missionaries, were permitted to settle at Bavian's Kloof,—a place where at present no Christian congregation dwells,—for the purpose of instructing the Hottentots in the Christian religion, and forming them into Christian communities: that they should in nowise be molested. And the landrost of the colony, Stellenbosch, was directed to give orders to the officer of that district, to see that no injury should be done them, either in their persons or property, or in their daily avocations; but that every one should endeavour to promote their safety, and give them all due assistance.

This declaration seemed almost the signal for insurrection; and even the inferior officers of government were afraid to second their good intentions. A field-corporal, who had been ordered to ride to the settlement, to inquire whether the missionaries had any complaints, eluded obedience, and gave as his reason,—"I must live with the Boors, and be on good terms with them." These wretches endeavoured also to prevent the Hottentots from going to the brethren, by the most unfounded aspersions. "They will treat you very kindly at first," say they; "but if you listen to them, more of them will come, and then they will seize on you, and send you as slaves to Batavia." "Only wait a little," said one of their myrmidons, "and you 'll be well thwack'd by them: I have heard that they beat their scholars most cruelly, and have brought a whole chest of bamboos with them to beat you." Yet nothing would prevent their coming; and the missionaries remarked, with admiring gratitude, that there was an amazing eagerness in the Hottentots to be instructed.

Their house being finished, the brethren appointed 3d March solemnly to celebrate their entrance into their new dwelling; and, accordingly, dedicated their house with prayer and supplication unto the Lord, entreating him to grant that his Spirit might dwell and reign in it; to give them every gift and grace needful for his service; and to impart power and blessing to their weak testimony of his cross and death for the redemption of the world, and that many heathen might hear it as the message of God for their salvation. They then had a meeting with all the adult Hottentots, and informed them, that next day they should begin their school, when the names of sixty adults and children were written down, and each got a spelling-book. Many more sent notice that they intended to come, so soon as they could provide themselves with victuals. Some supposed they should have had food given them for their attendance. The brethren told them they were unable to do this, but they would take nothing for their teaching.

One of these scholars having lost a child, requested their presence at the funeral, and towards evening, himself brought them to the place. All the men and women of the village were also invited; and when the missionaries arrived, they found them seated on the ground smoking tobacco. The corpse was then brought out of the cottage, wrapped in a sheep skin. The procession to the grave, which was about two hundred yards from the cottage, was in the following order: first, a man representing a priest or clerk, next the bearer of the corpse, followed by the father, and after him the rest of the men, several of whom carried shovels. The grave was about four feet deep, and larger than would have been necessary for a grown person. A hole being made in one side of it, resembling a vault, the corpse was put in it, and the opening shut up with pieces of wood and faggots. Afterwards, each of the company threw a shovelful of earth into the grave, till it was not only filled, but a very considerable hillock raised above it, upon which they set a plant called the Hottentot fig, which grows remarkably fast, and bears a fruit in taste not unlike a fig, and which is eaten in times of scarcity. The grave and hillock were at last covered with stones, to prevent the wolves from getting at the body. The ceremony being ended, the first man thanked the company for their attendance, and the procession returned. The women remained all the while sitting and smoking, and viewing the funeral at a distance. A goat was then killed, and all the company partook of the repast.

The scholars attended with great punctuality, and old Helena and her friend were always among them. The latter assisted in teaching the others, and their progress was so rapid, that in about a fortnight, their teachers expressed their surprise at their proficiency,—most of them having learned to know all the letters perfectly, and some of them having begun to spell. The peasants, however, opposed most violently, beating some, and threatening others who wished to join the settlement, and even detaining infants, to prevent their mothers from going thither, ; yet a few farmers in the neighbourhood were friendly, and Mr. Teunis on every occasion showed them kindness. Mr. Marsveld having some business to transact for the brethren, he carried him to the Cape in his own wagon, and brought him back with what necessaries he required. The true missionary devotedness of this brother is marked by the following passage, which occurs in his diary of that journey: "Being arrived near the foot of the hill, I went aside, and sat down to rest in a cave. Here I turned with many tears unto the Lord, praying him to bless and support my brethren at Bavian's Kloof, and to give them all the grace they require for the beginning of their labour among the Hottentots. I felt myself truly unworthy of such honour as that of serving our Saviour in his kingdom, and could not help being astonished that he should choose such a poor helpless creature as I am, to be engaged in so important a work as the proclamation of his love towards the poor human race. I called to mind how I was disposed when I first joined the brethren's congregation: my highest wish was then, that I might live unobserved, earn my bread by the work of my hands, and even in poverty and want, enjoy the fellowship of the children of God; and now I am called to his service among the heathen! I broke out into this ejaculation, 'Blessed Saviour! thou hast indeed chosen a weak instrument to do thy work!' I felt at this moment the presence and peace of our Saviour in so powerful a manner, that I left the cave rejoicing."

When he returned, the brethren arranged their plan of future procedure thus:—They began school at eight o'clock in the morning, first with the men, and then with the children; and at two in the afternoon, first with the children, and then with the women. After the women's school, the evening meeting commenced, in which, a lesson out of the Bible was read and explained. On the evening of the day on which this arrangement was made, the twenty-third chapter of Luke (treating of the crucifixion of our Saviour) was read and expounded.—"We wish," say the missionaries, "our brethren and friends in Europe could see such an assembly, and be witnesses of the reverence with which the Hottentots hear our testimony, that Jesus loved them even unto death. They look as if they would eat the words as they proceed from our lips, and many are so much moved that they shed tears. On the 31st, being Easter Sunday, at ten o'clock, we had a meeting with all our people, at which we spoke of the glorious resurrection of our Saviour from the dead. Forty-four Hottentots attended with such reverential silence and devotion, as is scarcely met with among Christians. We are already in great want of room, and hear daily of others who intend to come to hear the gospel. When we arrived here there was not one building on the spot; now there are thirteen Hottentot cottages inhabited."

The report had now spread far and near, and it became a common saying among the Hottentots, that God had sent them men to teach the way of salvation, and that whoever refused to hear and believe, would expose themselves to the punishment of God.

Early in 1794, a Hottentot came three days' journey, to inform the missionaries that he and his family purposed to remove from the east to the settlement; and his account of the disposition of the natives in his neighbourhood was such, that the brethren, Marsveld and Kuchnel, set out to visit them; and everywhere on their journey they were informed of numbers who were preparing to come to them: nor did these turn out false reports. At the end of the year, the population of Bavian's Kloof had so much increased, that frequently two hundred were present at public worship: the men's class contained thirty scholars, the women's seventy, and the children's seventy.

Such prosperity could not be expected to continue undisturbed—nor did it. The machinations of their enemies, the farmers, induced the officers of government, who dreaded their turbulence and their power, to concur for a time in some of their vexatious proposals. They forbade the missionaries to erect any new buildings, not even so much as a shed for their goats. They then, under pretence that the brethren harboured runaways, ordered all the Hottentots to quit the premises. The falsehood of this charge being easily proved, the order was revoked; but another, hardly less cruel, followed. Teunis, who had acted so friendly a part to them at first, having been seduced by the farmers, or desirous of obtaining the mission property, of part of which his son had already taken possession, bribed a Hottentot captain, Stoffel, with two shillings and a bottle of wine, to report that the Hottentots of Bavian's Kloof had so many cattle, that the farmer's cattle would be all driven away by them; and therefore this harsh mandate was issued, that they who had herds should return with them to the places whence they came, though it was a palpable fact, that the farmers possessed almost every inch of fertile land in the country. But the Hottentots who had felt the power of Christianity, declared that nothing should induce them to comply. "We must live in a place where we may daily hear and profit by the word of God—we cannot return to our old ways," was the language of some. Others said, "We cannot forsake the Christian congregation, let the consequences be what they will. This appears to us as if we should deny the Lord Jesus; and we know that the sufferings of this time are but short, and will be followed by everlasting happiness." And one of them even sold part of his cattle, and determined to sell the rest, rather than leave the place where the name of the Lord was known. Baas Teunis again repeated his orders for the Hottentots to quit; and rumours were spread, that the landrost of Stillenbosch would come in a few days with an order for breaking up the establishment, and banishing the missionaries. The grief and distraction of the poor people in the midst of these troubles were indescribable, while their affection for their teachers was most wonderfully displayed. "The Boors may do with us what they please," said they, weeping, "if they would only not hurt our teachers." Nor would they be comforted by the missionaries. "But, indeed," these good men complained, that "while they endeavoured to comfort them, they wanted comfort themselves!"

In the midst of this distress, their anxiety was augmented by the appearance of a wagon with eight horses and two horsemen, which halted at a little distance; and a gentleman alighting from it, the three advanced on foot to the settlement. Their fears now suggested evil tidings in every stranger, and they dreaded the meeting; but they were happily disappointed: they proved to be Mr. Clude, proprietor of Constantia, who had been a pupil of Schmidt, accompanied by a Mr. Hofman, late a privy counsellor, and Andrew Otto, a field-corporal, resident about fifteen English miles distant. Mr. C.'s object was to inquire minutely into the state of the settlement, and ascertain upon the spot, the truth or falsity of the reports spread against the mission. He found that the grossest falsehoods had been circulated. The numerous herds they had been represented to possess, amounted to precisely five oxen, five cows, two calves, two sheep, one horse, and one hundred goats; while the ground between the house and the river was sufficient to maintain one hundred oxen.* Having taken a survey of the land, and likewise of some Teunis's son had begun to take possession of, they took leave.

Besides the other disadvantages under which the mission laboured, they had nowhere to lay up their winter's provisions; for, not being allowed to build a church, they were under the necessity of using their kitchen and sitting-room as schoolhouse and chapel, and both were too small; nor were they permitted even to add an out-house to their dwelling; and their goats were reduced by disease to thirty-six. But in noticing all their trouble, they add: "We cannot but observe with great pleasure, that just at this time, when our external affairs wear such a gloomy appearance, there is a peculiar awakening among the people. Hardly a day passes, but one, and sometimes many Hottentots come to us, chiefly new people, to ask what they shall do to be saved, accompanying their words with many tears." Shortly after, they received a letter from their ancient friend Teunis, in a style more cordial than they had lately been accustomed to; and when they were rejoicing in this apparent renewal of his friendship, they received accounts from the Cape, which explained the change. Mr. Clude had represented to government the falsehood of the representations made respecting Bavian's Kloof, and obtained a revocation of all the distressing orders for the removal of the Hottentots and their cattle. He had also made a purchase of the ground himself, on purpose to ensure the safety of the mission.

Disappointed in these attempts to scatter the congregation, the farmers resolved to obtain by force what they had not been able to procure by fraud. The revolutions in Holland had rendered the government of the colonies precarious and inefficient; and the Boors had such an overweening idea of their own consequence, that they openly bade defiance to their rulers: upwards of a hundred rose in arms to demand a redress of grievances; and, assuming the name of "Nationals," advanced in a menacing attitude towards the capital, but breathing out threatenings especially against the Moravians, whose settlement they declared their intention of laying in ruins, by way of preliminary.

Threatened with a visit from the insurgents, on the 13th June, the report of signal cannon summoned all the Hottentots capable of bearing arms, to Cape-Town. The congregation declared their aversion to comply; but the missionaries representing that it was a Christian duty for subjects in all things to obey the magistrate, they set out next morning. One of them, however, before marching, asked—if ordered to go against an enemy, whether he should kill him? His teachers replied, they could say nothing more than that he should be obedient to his superiors. Rumours of the most alarming and contradictory nature were now spread on every hand; but in general those which reached Bavian's Kloof were pregnant with threatenings of vengeance from the Boors. One of them asked a Hottentot, if he went to school? when he answering, "Yes," the ruffian replied, "What! are the Hottentots to be made wise, when so many Christian children run about, and learn nothing? Only wait a little, and your place shall be destroyed, for I would have you to know that we are now the governors." The arrival of the British made the Cape Government extremely anxious to come to an accommodation with the insurgents; but this only increased their insolence; and while they were offered any terms, if they would only assist against the common enemy, they appeared anxious about nothing but the destruction of the Moravians. The missionaries were in the greatest perplexity: the terrors of their Hottentots increased, and it was evident that they remained at the settlement merely because they could not think of leaving their teachers; they therefore, at the evening meeting, told them that they would not take it unkind if any of them should fly to a place of safety, and requested them to act without the least restraint.

But a more trying scene succeeded. Brother Kuehnel having gone to Baas Teunis to ask his advice, was told, nothing would satisfy the "Nationals," except sending back the whole of the Hottentots who had come from Schwellendam, a distance of upwards of 150 miles; that he, Baas Teunis, was detaining fifty from the same quarter, who wished to settle at Bavian's Kloof, and whom he could not persuade to return; and if the missionaries would use their influence with them also,—on these terms he thought he might promise them safety. After much deliberation and prayer, they thought they could not act otherwise than consult their own and their people's preservation. Yet to tell persons in whom they thought they perceived such a powerful work of the Spirit of God, who declared they would rather suffer all things than forsake a place where they were taught the way of salvation, was to them most heast-rending; but it seemed necessary for the present. They also resolved to close the school for a time.

In the evening most of the women and children fled to the mountains, and hid themselves among the rocks, fearing to be surprised during the night. Early in the morning, when they came from their hiding-places, the brethren called them together, and intimated to them their decision. "We cannot describe," say they, "the effect it had upon the poor creatures: they broke out into loud weeping and lamentations, and, in about an hour after, came in a body to take leave of us. The women and children wept incessantly; and a heart of stone would have melted at the sight of the poor children, tied naked on the backs of their weeping mothers, going to traverse a wild country, in which rivers and brooks were swollen and impassable by the continual rain. About thirty set out to-day, and we were so overcome with grief, that we could hardly bear to notice them any more. In the evening, we fell on our knees, and with hearts filled with sorrow, called upon the Lord to have mercy upon these poor people,—to send his Spirit to be their comforter and teacher,—and to preserve in them that ardent desire to hear his words.

Shortly after, Teunis sent to inform them, that a troop of the "Nationals" were at no great distance; and if they wished to know what they had determined respecting the school, they should go thither. Brother Kuehnel accordingly went, and learned from these friends of freedom, whose watchwords were, "Liberty and Equality," that some of the articles in the memorial to be presented by them to the government, were—"We will not permit any Moravians to live here and instruct the Hottentots; for as there are many Christians who receive no instruction, it is not proper that the Hottentots should be made wiser than the Christians; but they must remain what they were formerly. Those Hottentots who are born on a farmer's estate, must live there, and serve the farmer till they are twenty-five years old, before they receive wages. The Hottentots must live among the farmers, and not assemble at Bavian's Kloof. All Bushmen, or wild Hottentots, caught by us must remain slaves for life. Item.—The Moravians were never meant to be employed among the Hottentots of this country, but among the Bushmen." And these, Kuchnel was informed were the most favourable of their resolutions.

* This appears to have been the property of the missionaries; that of the Hottentots is not mentioned, at least not distinctly, but they could not be many.

A troop of twenty-five of these liberals, who were actually on their march to destroy the school, were met by a deputy, with offers from government, upon which they returned to consult with their comrades, threatening, however, soon to come back, and put their design into execution. A few days after, an order was brought them from the commandant, Pissani, to quit the place within three days, and to go either to Cape-Town or some other part of the country, inhabited by Dutch citizens, on pain of being treated severely in case of refusal. As resistance would have been useless, they immediately prepared to obey: their goods they sent off to Teunis, as to a place of safety, and proceeded themselves to the Cape. The parting with their beloved flock was not without many tears; yet they indulged the secret hope of soon again seeing them. A great number followed them during the night, and on the morning, they had another sorrowful farewell. On reaching Cape-Town they waited on the governor, who expressed his surprise at Pissani's presumption, but commended their prudence in obeying, as some outrage might otherwise have been committed. Within a few days, he gave them permission to return, and a letter of safe-guard. That very afternoon, a signal-gun was fired, and, soon after, four more, to announce that there had been an engagement, between the British and the Dutch, and that the Dutch had been worsted. The drums immediately beat to arms,—the bloody flag was hoisted, and the women returned to the country; they also left the scene of tumult and confusion, for the peaceful village, and were welcomed back with tears of joy by the inhabitants they had so lately left, who could scarcely believe the truth of their return.

CHAP. III.

British capture the Cape—Protect the Moravians—Prosperous state of the Mission—Discontent of the Boors—Conspiracy against it discovered and frustrated—Progress in the arts of life—Barrow's description of the Settlement—Numerous parties visit it—The inn—Chapel enlarged—Contributions of the natives—Their increasing improvement in building, planting, and sowing—Envy of the neighbouring farmers—They seize the Hottentots' cultivated grounds—New missionaries arrive—Old Helena—Religious character of the natives—Other missionaries arrive—Contagious distemper—Fatigues of the missionaries—Their consolations—Revival of religion among the baptized—The burial-ground—Trials from a neighbouring military station—Scarcity—Enmity of the Boors—Instances—Kindness of the British Governor—The Cape reverts to the Dutch.

WITHOUT much resistance, the Cape surrendered to the British forces, under General Craig, about the middle of August, 1795; and the Hottentots were allowed to return home,—not a man of them having been hurt. Uncertain as to the disposition of the British general, and experiencing the most determined opposition from Baas Teunis, who disturbed the settlement, and prevented the Hottentots from attending, Brother Marsveld waited upon General Craig, to whom the mission had been previously recommended by the Dutch governor, who readily gave them assurances of his favour and protection, and promised, that if any Hottentots wishing to join the settlement were kept back in future, he should take effectual steps for their relief. He likewise granted the brethren permission to build a chapel, and afterwards sent a written order, allowing them to cut as much timber as they might require for the work. The foundation stone was laid on the 14th of December.

About the end of the year, the main object of the mission flourished exceedingly, and in a manner hitherto unexperienced: the poor Hottentots came not singly, but in companies, to speak about the way of salvation; and not in the day only, but also in the night. On Christmas they had their solemn meeting under the shade of the trees, and counted upwards of five hundred Hottentot hearers. Thus, this year of sore trial and multiplied sorrows, was crowned with goodness!

Under the British, the Moravians enjoyed a more effective protection; for they being free from any dread of the Boors, did not hesitate to act in a manner in which the former government dared not venture. Of this the farmers were sensible, and, upon a rumour of the French coming to attack the Cape, told the missionaries—"While the British are here, you have been masters; but now that the French are come, we shall be masters." As the French, however, did not appear, about one hundred of these fellows conspired to carry their former plans against Bavian's Kloof into execution, and Baas Teunis' house was the head quarters of the conspirators, where they were already met, when the British General hearing of the plot, sent a message to Teunis, threatening, that if any such outrage was committed, the perpetrators should be brought to condign punishment; and they found it necessary to quit their leaders, and disperse.

Exempt now from the harassing fear of the farmers, the progress of the settlement in the arts of life was rapid: a smithy was erected, and a cutlery commenced; a corn mill was erected, and a vineyard planted. It is true, every obstacle which the unabated malignity of the farmers could devise, had been put in practice. They agreed never to purchase an article they might make; and tried to starve them during the erection of their mill, when a number of hands were employed: but there soon was a greater demand for knives than brother Kuchnel, with an apprentice could supply; and though corn was withheld for a while, yet afterward some of their greatest enemies came and sold what they wanted, cheaper than they could have bought it at the regular market.

Instead of being looked upon with jealousy, Bavian's Kloof was visited and admired by the British, and among the rest, by Mr. Barrow, who has borne this honourable testimony in favour of the settlement.—"Proceeding up the valley, through which the endless river [the Sonderend] meanders, we halted late in the evening at a plain called Bavian's Kloof, where there is a small establishment of Moravian Missionaries. Early next morning, I was awakened by some of the finest voices I had ever heard, and on looking out, saw a group of female Hottentots sitting on the ground. It was Sunday, and they had assembled thus to chaunt the morning hymn. They were all neatly dressed in printed cotton gowns. A sight so very different from what we had hitherto been in the habit of observing with regard to this unhappy class of beings, could not fail of proving grateful, and, at the same time, it excited a degree of curiosity as to the nature of the establishment. The good fathers, who were three in number, were well disposed to satisfy every question put to them. They were men of the middle age, plain and decent in their dress, cleanly in their persons, of modest manners, meek and humble in their deportment, but intelligent and lively in conversation, zealous in the cause of their mission, yet free from bigotry or enthusiasm. Everything in the place partook of that neatness and simplicity which were the strongest features in the outline of their character. The church they had constructed was a plain neat building; their mill for grinding corn was superior to any in the colony; their garden was in high order, and produced abundance of vegetables for the use of the table: almost everything that had been was done by the labour of their own hands. Agreeably to the rules of the society of which they are members, each of them had learned some useful profession: one was skilled in every branch of smith-work, the second was a shoemaker, and the third a tailor.

"These missionaries have succeeded in bringing together into one society upwards of six hundred Hottentots, and their numbers are daily increasing. These live in small huts, dispersed over the valley, to each of which was a piece of ground for raising vegetables; and their houses and gardens were very neat and comfortable,—numbers of the poor in England not so good, and few better. Those Hottentots who chose to learn the respective trades of the missionaries, were paid for their labour, as soon as they could earn wages. Some hired themselves out by the week, month, or year, to the neighbouring peasantry, and some made mats and brooms for sale; some bred poultry, and others found means to subsist by their cattle, sheep, and horses. Many of the women and children of soldiers belonging to the Hottentot corps, reside at Bavian's Kloof, where they are much more likely to acquire industrious habits than by remaining in the camp.

"On Sundays they all regularly attend the performance of divine service; and it is astonishing how ambitious they are to appear at church neat and clean. Of about three hundred that composed the congregation, about half were dressed in coarse printed cottons, and the other half in the ancient sheep-skin dresses; and it appeared, on inquiry, that the former were the first who had been brought within the pale of the Church,—a proof that their external circumstances, at least, had suffered nothing from their change of life. Persuasion and example had convinced them that cleanliness in their persons, not only added much to the comforts in life, but was one of the greatest preservatives of health; and that the little trifle of money they had to spare, was much better applied in procuring decent covering for the body, than in the purchase of spirits and tobacco,—articles so far from being necessaries, that they might justly be considered the most pernicious evils.

"The deportment of the Hottentot congregation during divine service was truly devout. The discourse delivered by one of the fathers was short, but full of good sense,—pathetic, and well suited to the occasion. Tears flowed abundantly from the eyes of those to whom it was particularly addressed. The females sung in a style that was plaintive and affecting; and their voices were, in general, sweet and harmonious."

This state of the settlement in 1797-8, continued, to attract such a number of visitors, that the brethren found they had not the means of treating all with that hospitality which they could have wished, and which is common in South Africa, where the farmers, having such a superabundance of cattle, were wont to receive all strangers with rough liberality. Some of those Boors were now become friendly; and when they condescended to call at Bavian's Kloof, planted themselves without ceremony in the mission-house, as they would have done in any of their neighbours', and never thought of making any remuneration. The number of British military travellers at the posts was very considerable; and especially during the Christmas holidays, the settlement was crowded with white people. A public inn was therefore suggested to the missionaries; and as it was absolutely necessary that their avocations should not be interrupted, they consented that a friend, Mr. Negrini, should open one for the accommodation of strangers, which relieved them from the embarrassment of contriving how to lodge and feed so many guests.

The inhabitants of the settlement continuing to increase, and numbers of Hottentots arriving from a great distance to hear, as they expressed it, "the sweet words of their Father in Heaven," they built a new and larger chapel,—for which the British General furnished them with wood. As they had laboured with their own hands in its erection, the missionaries told their own Hottentots that they expected their assistance in maintaining its establishment. The first thing necessary being lights for their evening services, their people at once, with the greatest cheerfulness, came forward, and in about three days collected among themselves seventy-four fine candles and fourteen rix-dollars in money, which, considering the poverty of the people, was exceedingly encouraging.

From this poverty, however, they were gradually emerging;—instead of wretched huts, their cottages now consisted of two apartments, in one of which they cooked and slept, and in the other stored up their corn and garden-fruits, of which, at the close of the eighteenth century, they began to have abundant crops. They had now learned of the missionaries, to sow corn and to plant fruit-trees, which formed a considerable addition to their means of livelihood. The more diligent raised pumpkins, beans, carrots, and potatoes. In the modest computation of the brethren, these improvements had not followed each other very rapidly; but an indolent nation is not soon trained to habits of industry, and great patience and persevering labour were required on the part of the missionaries; and to those who saw the change, but had not been watching the painful progress, or partaking of the toil, the period of eight years was forgotten, and the whole seemed like the work of enchantment. The uniform language of these men, "greatly beloved," on reviewing their success, was: "What shall we render unto the Lord for all his benefits? We are not worthy of the least of all his mercies and of all his truth. Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto thy name give glory. But when we ask ourselves, Have we always been obedient to thy directions? always walked uprightly before thee? Was thy will always our will, and thy service our heart's delight? Have we never neglected or hurt any part of thy works by slothfulness or inattention? Alas! we stand ashamed before thee! We call upon thee as our merciful and gracious Lord and Saviour, abundant in goodness and truth: pardon all our mistakes, known and unknown to us; blot out all our transgressions by thy atoning blood; grant to us a renewed assurance that we are thine, and that thou art and wilt remain our constant help and refuge, yea, our everlasting portion!"

Amid their anxious unremitting exertions, while the brethren were borne up by the evident blessing of God, which they saw accompanied them, they were sorely tried by the conduct of the neighbouring Boors. These men, who, while they reproached the Hottentots with indolence, never themselves descended to any other exertion than that of the chase, and would have considered putting their hands to any agricultural employment as a degradation, when they saw the face of the country assuming a new aspect, under the well directed industry of the despised natives, they looked with an envious eye upon the cultivated lands which were springing up around them; and being accustomed to seize without ceremony whatever property of the Hottentots lay within their grasp, took forcible possession of the fields they had sown and planted with great care; and, in some instances, after long and vexatious litigation, the owners were obliged to allow the spots they had so diligently improved, to remain in the hands of the rapacious colonist.

As their success increased, so did their fatigue; and the brethren who had often applied for further assistance, were gladdened by the arrival of a married brother, J. Philip Kohrlammer, and his wife. The female missionary was peculiarly acceptable to speak with inquirers of her own sex; and the baptized, or communicants, were highly gratified to have one whom they could consult in their difficulties, and who could visit them in their sickness, and perform a number of little kind offices, for which a man was not competent. Considerable sickness prevailing at the time of their arrival, they instantly commenced their visits of mercy. The situation of sick Hottentots, carefully attended and kept clean, was now very different from what it had been formerly; yet still to Europeans it appeared very miserable—the distressed patient on the floor, lying naked on the hairy side of a cow's hide, and covered by a sheep-skin; but these feelings were soon forgotten, when the poor invalid, with his eyes intensely fixed upon the missionary, inquired what he must do to be saved?—to become a child of God, and an heir of everlasting life?—or, if firm in the faith, he expressed, in energetic language, the desires of his soul; recalling to mind the covenant he had made with God in baptism, and his deliverance, by the merits of Christ's blood-shedding and death, from the power of sin and Satan;—while the little children, who ran about naked, would hang around the visitors, and gazing upon them with their dark eyes, and speaking countenances, appeared to listen attentively to every word that fell from their lips.

None received Mrs. Kohrlammer with greater delight than old Helena. She had been confined by extreme old age and feebleness to her hut for some time; but when she was told she would soon see a sister from Europe, she appeared to revive, and said, "I wish much to go home to our Saviour, but now I pray him to let me live long enough in this world to see this sister arrive, and then I will gladly depart." Her petition was granted. And when told that brother and sister Kohrlammer had arrived, she wept for joy, and begged of some of her friends to carry her to the mission-house, to bid them welcome. "We shall not," say the missionaries in their diary, "easily forget what we felt at that meeting." Having been so long without the advantage of teachers, her mind had become stagnant, and she had forgot all but the foundation on which she rested. After the first brethren, however, arrived, her mind appeared to awake from a slumber; her memory returned; and she surprised them after a short time with the distinctness of her recollection. She expressed the most fervent gratitude to God for having again sent teachers to her nation. When unable at last to come to the chapel, it was a pleasure to visit her; and for some years, when confined to her hut, she was inquired after by many persons of consequence in the country, who knew and respected her, and also by many English officers, who had heard of her character, and called to see and leave her some gift. To all she testified her faith in and love to her Saviour; and not a few departed greatly affected. She remained patiently waiting for the coming of her Lord, till her frame being totally exhausted, the silver cord was loosened, and her spirit freed from its prison-house of clay.

Worldly ends will always produce hypocritical professors in a Christian community; and it is no wonder that, where the advantages were so evident as at the Moravian settlement, numbers of the poor Hottentots should have acted from no higher motive. Among many who came to speak with the missionaries about their souls' concerns, there were some who, having lived among the white people, had learned to talk religiously, and were so expert in the art of dissimulation, that it was difficult to discover their real character; but the others, who had never been so far "civilized," although they would express their meaning in stranger language, yet gave evidence, which could not be mistaken, of their sincerity. The care which the missionaries took to prevent imposition in admitting members to church-fellowship will best appear from their own words:—"Perhaps our brethren may think that we are rather too ready to receive and baptize the new people; but if they could hear and see what we do,—how the Spirit of God teaches so many of them most earnestly to seek and know their Saviour, and how they are led, with weeping and supplication, and daily repeat their earnest request to be added to the Christian Church, they would perceive that we proceed very gradually, and with as much caution as poor short-sighted human creatures are capable of. Nor do we ever take the baptism of any of the candidates, or the admission of the baptized to the Lord's-supper, into consideration, without most fervent prayer unto the Lord to direct us, that we may not collect merely a host of baptized infidels, but a company of true believers, who grow in the love and knowledge of our Saviour, and honour his gospel by their works." The inhabitants of the settlement at this period amounted to above thirteen hundred.

An addition of another married brother and his wife was made to their number this year, 1800, and most opportunely, when an epidemic was carrying off great numbers of the inhabitants. The amount of sick was so great, that having divided the settlement into quarters, and appointed the different missionaries to different posts, each missionary, with his wife, had daily fifty or sixty patients to attend,—to administer to their temporal and spiritual assistance,—both a fatiguing and perilous service, as their rounds were about four or five English miles, and the fever was very infectious, frequently returning to the same person, and carrying off at a fourth those whom three previous attacks had spared. But they had much pleasure mingled with their grief; a majority of those whom it pleased the Lord to remove by this visitation being such as had given evidence that they were in a state of reconciliation with himself; many, with their last breath, declaring their firm belief in the merits of his sufferings and death, and their confidence that he would receive them in mercy into his everlasting kingdom, and thanking him with fervour and tears, for having sent them teachers to bring them the precious Gospel, and for having washed them from their sins in his own blood.

This visitation was the means of awakening among all the people a great earnestness. Many who before were cold or indifferent, now exclaimed: "Ah! who knows whether I shall still be alive to-morrow? What will then become of me? Where will my poor soul go?" This was particularly the case among the new people and children. Scarcely had the missionaries left their beds in the morning when their doors were beset by anxious inquiries after advice and instruction; and this often lasted from morning till night. In the church, which was generally crowded, all attended with silent devotion. The effects were great and permanent. Not long after, the missionaries observed, with pleasure, that the newly baptized, the candidates for baptism, and the communicants, began to take evening walks in the mountains,—to converse together upon what they had heard at church,—communicate their experience to each other,—and join in hymns of praise to the Saviour. It was like the first days of the brethren's church, and evidenced the sweet breathing of the Holy Spirit on their souls. One of the missionaries asked of one of these parties, whither they were going? They answered, they were walking towards the mountain, with a view to be alone, and converse together. And when questioned what they were conversing about, "We are talking," they replied, "about the great mercy God has shown us in making us acquainted with his love, and in sending teachers even to such wretched creatures as we are, to tell us what HE hath done for us. And we were speaking of those dark times when we knew nothing of God, and our Saviour, and his word, and that we are not worthy to experience such grace and favour as is now bestowed upon us, especially as we are still so disobedient and ungrateful." It is here also deserving of particular notice, that the conduct and simple remarks of the believing Hottentots was blessed as the means of leading more than one of the farmers to serious consideration; but it was those who did not live in the immediate vicinity of the settlement.

The baptized Hottentots being now buried in a Christian manner, brother Rose undertook to put their cemetery in order; for looking forward to the grave as a place of rest, the brethren wished that their last lodging should present nothing unpleasant to the eye. Having measured a square of a hundred and eighty feet, he divided it into nine compartments, with paths between them; and as there was no stone near fit for grave-stones, each grave was marked with a short post, upon which a board was fixed, with a number painted upon it, referring to a ground plan, which exhibits a catalogue of the deceased. A broad path was formed, leading through the garden and the burying-ground,—brother Schmidt's large pear-tree in the centre, preserved in memory of the venerable saint. The broad path he enclosed by rows of trees, and surrounded the burying-ground with a hedge of roses.

Trials of a different, perhaps more severe kind, followed. A military station in the neighbourhood was the cause of much sorrow; for although the men were kept under strict discipline, and were not guilty of any outrageous behaviour, some of them succeeding in seducing one or two unbaptized young women, of whom the brethren had entertained good hopes; and, about the middle of this year, two women were sent away from the settlement, one of whom, a member of the congregation, had been led astray by a person of notoriously bad character. He had remained some time in the settlement, and, on the last day that he was suffered to abide, had contrived to introduce a keg of wine, and invited some of his relations to partake. Several of them got drunk,—a scuffle ensued,—and a youth was severely hurt. Among the company were four of the congregation, who, after being sharply reproved, were excluded the meetings of the classes to which they belonged. Not long after, one of the inhabitants, returning from Cape-Town, brought a keg of brandy, which he disposed of among his neighbours, some of whom drank to excess; on which the missionaries reminded their people of the standing rule of the settlement, that neither wine nor spirituous liquors were permitted to be sold there, and that whoever should in future transgress should leave the place; and it does not appear that, from this date, any attempt of the kind was made. This time, besides, was a season of severe scarcity; the wild almonds and fruits which had occasionally supplied the wants of the Hottentots failed; and even those who wrought with the farmers found difficulty in obtaining food. Yet the missionaries were enabled, by great exertions, and at considerable expense, to prevent the horrors of famine within their bounds. And they obtained afterwards an honourable testimony from the fiscal, in presence of General Dundas,—that though upwards of one thousand Hottentots resided there, he never had a complaint against any one of them, so orderly was their behaviour; while at other places, if three hundred were collected, they required the presence of a justice of peace, and generally afforded him sufficient employment; and that, during the years of contagion and famine, no relief had ever been required, the missionaries alone supporting the burden of the poor, sick, and famishing people.

To persons who have never actually engaged in missionary labours, it is perhaps impossible to convey a distinct idea of the feelings, the cares, and the anxiety of a missionary. If he have joys into which we who tarry at home cannot fully enter, he has pains and griefs, the extent of which we cannot feel. The misconduct of those connected with their establishments, although not members, and not in communion, occasions such a flood of obloquy, misrepresentation, and reproach, to be poured out upon the good cause in which they are engaged, and the honest inmates of their community, that the missionary's heart is often ready to faint, and his patience to give up the ghost, in circumstances so peculiarly trying to the natural temper, and so calculated to rouse the passions of anger and disdain. On many such occasions, the Christian spirit of the Moravian brethren was put to the test; and about this time, one was particularly trying. They had been most unwarrantably accused by the Boors, who had robbed the poor Hottentots of their lands, their cattle, their liberty, their all,—of encouraging the Hottentots in idleness and bad practices,—of giving them instruction, in order that they might be better able to cheat the farmers. And while these reports were current, a farmer came and charged one of their people with stealing a sheep. The fact was proved against a man who was an inhabitant of Bavian's Kloof, but he was neither baptized, nor a candidate for baptism, and he was instantly dismissed. The farmer, though not a friend, declared himself satisfied with the plain downright dealing of the brethren; yet this could not cure the grief they felt that one who had lodged in their premises should have been guilty of such conduct.

An incident of a diametrically opposite description gave them scarcely less trouble. A herdsman of Bavian's Kloof found a strange horse straying in the fields, and brought it home with him. The missionaries immediately delivered it into the care of a trusty Hottentot to keep till its owner should be found, and at the same time, informed the landrost of Stellenbosch, that such an animal was in their possession. Soon after, they received a letter from the owner of the horse, accusing, in most violent language, the Hottentot of having stolen his horse. They mildly answered, he might come and fetch his horse, and they would inform him of the particulars. He came accordingly, and having proved the property, his horse was delivered up; but he was required to recall his false accusation against the herdsman, and give a certificate of his honesty. This he refused contemptuously: "He! he's only a Hottentot: he's no Christian!" The missionaries would not, however, allow one of their people to lie under an imputation of dishonesty, and the fellow at last agreed to give a written declaration that the Hottentot who had recovered and restored his horse, was an honest man! Yet it was not without long altercation, much uneasiness, and much trouble, that the good men could obtain for their calumniated brother, this tardy act of justice. It was some consolation, however, that they enjoyed the approbation and confidence of the constituted British authorities; and when General Dundas wished servants on whom he could depend, he sent to the missionary settlement for them.

Among the General's last acts, was an equitable adjustment of differences respecting some disputed property which the farmers had seized from the Christian Hottentots, after they had reclaimed it from the wilderness. It was adjudged to be restored to the Hottentots; but for a part the farmers were suffered to retain, an indemnification was allowed in other lands, which, as they were low lying, a sum of money was also given, to enable them to drain and bring them into cultivation. Commissioners were at the same time appointed to settle finally the respective boundaries, and set up land-marks. In noticing this transaction, the brethren express themselves in terms of the greatest gratitude towards the British Governor, the Secretary, and all concerned, for the justice, wisdom, and decision which distinguished all their proceedings in this troublesome affair. Indeed, upon every occasion, the British authorities, both civil and military, displayed not only a sense of justice towards the Moravians and their congregation, but a kindness and a readiness to serve them to the utmost extent of their power, nor did they ever take any of the Hottentot's labour, without sufficiently rewarding them for their trouble.

Intelligence now having been received of the Peace of Amiens, and the transfer of the Cape of Good Hope to its old masters, the colony began to be agitated in no common degree. But the settlement of the brethren continued to prosper, and was blessed with peace and rest, as if they had been only observing the troubles of this earth from amid the calm serenity of heaven. The Cape was delivered up to the Dutch in the latter end of 1802.

CHAP. IV.

BOSJESMEN, OR BUSHMEN.

British mission to Africa—Dr. Vanderkemp at its head—Arrives at the Cape—Find three Bushmen at Cape-Town—Cause of their visit—Two missionaries consent to proceed to their country—Joined by a native of the Cape, Mr. Kramer—Arrive at Mr. Fischer's, the last farm in the colony—He accompanies them to Zak River—Pitch on a spot for a station, and name it Happy Prospect Fountain—Sensations of the Missionaries on being left by their friends—Bushmen arrive—Their employments—Changeable tempers—Interpreters procured—Preaching begins to take effect—Attempts to excite to industry—Mr. Kicherer visits Cape-Town with some Bushmen—Incidents during the visit—Savage chief's attempt upon the settlement—Providential deliverance—Conversion of Bastard John—His son Cornelius—Remarkable escape of the people from the vengeance of a runaway slave—of Mr. Kicherer from assassination—Extraordinary character, Stephanos—Wants of the settlement remarkably supplied.

STIMULATED by the success of the Moravian brethren, the London Missionary Society had their attention directed to South Africa, when the capture of the Cape of Good Hope by the British appeared to afford a favourable opening in Providence for making an effort in that quarter. Instruments peculiarly adapted for this great object soon presented themselves. At their head was Dr. Vanderkemp, a man not more distinguished for natural ability than acquired knowledge, of high literary attainments, and great personal intrepidity. He had studied at the universities of Leyden and Edinburgh, and beside the learned languages, which he perfectly understood, he could speak readily most of the fashionable European tongues; and during his residence in our city, he added the Gaelic to the number.

Having chosen the military profession, he obtained the rank of captain of horse, and lieutenant of the dragoon guards in the Dutch service, and had every prospect of rising to the most elevated station, when a quarrel with the Prince of Orange induced him to quit the army. He then devoted himself to medicine, and taking a degree at Edinburgh, he settled as a physician at Middleburg. His talents and reputation procured him the first practice; but he would never undertake more than he thought he could properly attend, and limited the number of his patients to twelve at one time. Ten years after, when his wife, his only child, and himself, were upon a pleasure excursion, the boat upset—they were drowned—and he saved with the utmost difficulty. At college he had imbibed the fashionable infidelity of the day; but in the hour of trial, he found it incapable of yielding support or consolation, and was led to seek comfort, and obtained peace in the hope of the gospel. For some time after, he acted as director and superintendent of an hospital near Rotterdam, till the breaking out of the Revolution, when he quitted the service, and lived in retirement, devoting himself to the study of the Scriptures. An address from the London Missionary Society falling into his hands, he immediately wrote to the directors, offering himself as a missionary to the heathen. Inquiry being made concerning him, the result was satisfactory, and he was invited to London. His personal intercourse confirmed every favourable impression, and he was deemed the fittest person, to conduct a mission to Africa.

Returning to Holland, he effected the formation of two societies, one at Rotterdam, and another at Friesland, and brought over with him to England a worthy associate, Mr. Kicherer, an ordained minister of the Dutch Church; who, being joined by two Englishmen, Mr. Edmond and Mr. Edwards, embarked for the Cape of Good Hope, on the 23d of December, 1798, where they landed 31st March 1799. They took their passage in a convict ship going to New South Wales, and commenced their labours among a class of outcasts, perhaps more hopeless than even the heathen. But the Lord was pleased to smile on their endeavours; and before they reached the Cape, they enjoyed the sublime pleasure of hearing the sounds of imprecation exchanged for the breathings of prayer. Immediately upon their arrival, through the Doctor's zealous exertions, The South African Missionary Society was formed.

All the missionaries had intended to proceed to Caffraria; but a few days previous to their arrival, three Bushmen chiefs had come thither from Zak river, between four and five hundred miles N. E. of the Cape, for the purpose of soliciting Government to send teachers into their country; and, in consequence, they judged it proper to divide,—Dr. Vanderkemp and Mr. Edmond to pursue their original plan, Mr. Kicherer and Mr. Edwards to proceed with the savage leaders. The cause of this uncommon embassy was—The farmers in the back settlements, who had suffered severely from the incursions of the Bushmen, finding the plan of hunting them down not altogether successful, had agreed to purchase a peace. At the ratification of this treaty, one of the colonists, field-cornet Florus Fischer, who was piously inclined, offered up a prayer. The savages, who had never witnessed anything of the kind before, were desirous of knowing what it meant: and on being informed that it was to implore the blessings of the Almighty God, the source of every good,—ignorance and neglect of whom was the cause of their comparative wretchedness,—they expressed an earnest desire that proper persons might come and reside amongst them, who would instruct them, and enable them to become rich and happy. The farmers directed them to apply to the Government at the Cape, and they were now there upon that errand.

From the Government the missionaries received the most marked favour, and from their Christian friends the most affectionate attention; but were detained at Cape-Town till the 7th of June, waiting for the wagon which the Government had promised. During this detention they were joined by a young Dutchman, named Kramer, who, after much consideration, had determined to devote himself to the service of the heathen. At Rodezand, where Mr. Voss was minister, they were kept waiting some time, but spent it pleasantly in preaching the gospel in the neighbourhood, and in an excursion to Bavian's Kloof. Their next stage was to Florus Fischer's, who possessed the last farm in the Karoo,—a vast tract of country, many days' journey in extent, which, for a considerable part of the year, is so dry that not a blade of grass appears till after the rainy season, when, the ground being saturated with moisture, vegetation proceeds with such amazing rapidity that, in a short time, the arid waste is transformed into a rich meadow, enamelled with flowers of the liveliest hue. When Mr. Kicherer and his companions passed, it was in full bloom, and afforded sufficient pasture for the cattle, and for those of the surrounding inhabitants, who, hearing of their journey, came from all parts to hear the gospel.

Mr. Fischer received them with great cordiality, and they passed three weeks with him, preparing for their further progress, during which they enjoyed many a crowded and happy meeting with the neighbouring farmers, particularly on the Sabbaths, when once twenty-two wagons full of people, besides many on horseback, some of whom came four, and others eight days' journey, arrived to hear the gospel, and to partake of the Lord's-supper. Here they were strongly solicited to prolong their visit; but, anxious to commence their proper work, as soon as their preparations were finished, they set out, accompanied by their generous host and several other farmers, with servants, amounting to about fifty. Six wagons full of provisions followed in their train, eleven oxen, seven cows, and a calf, and near two hundred sheep,—presents they had received from the friendly colonists. The road lay through a desert country, abounding in wild horses, and ostriches, whose eggs afforded them an agreeable repast. Their nights were disturbed by the lions and panthers, who approached their encampment, and were only deterred from entering by the large fires which they kindled around.

On the 6th of August, they fixed on a spot, where they agreed to settle, and gave it the name of "Happy Prospect Fountain," near Zak river.* It possessed the advantage of two fine springs of water, and a considerable quantity of ground for cultivation, but the surrounding country was barren, and the inhabitants few. Here they fell down on their knees, and devoted the place, as well as themselves, to the service of the Lord, supplicating his continual presence to be with them, while they dwelt in the wilderness, and imploring his blessing on their future labours. Immediately, they began to prepare a plot for a garden, and to build a hut of reeds,—the only materials they could readily procure, there being no trees within their reach. Mr. Fischer and their other kind friends returned home on the 12th September. Alone, amidst the rudest savages in this dreary land, the sensations of the moment were acutely painful. "I felt," says Kicherer, in his narrative, "inexpressibly dejected at first, but the Lord comforted me." And the urgent business in which they instantly and heartily engaged, allowed them no time to waste in gloomy reflection. About twenty Bushmen had arrived, and having a woman who partially understood both the Dutch and Bushman languages, they were enabled to communicate to them at the first the important message they were commissioned to proclaim.

Their days were spent in the following manner: At sunrise they met for prayer; read a portion of Scripture, and sung a hymn; after which, the business of the school commenced, when the young people were taught to spell and read Dutch, till breakfast. From that time till noon they occupied themselves in manual labour, digging, planting, or building; about noon they dined, then re-commenced their labours, and continued till the evening. The evening they spent in endeavouring to communicate religious knowledge; and concluded the day, as they began, by singing, reading, and prayer. At this most trying period of their labours, they found the great need and importance of prayer. "I was enabled," says Mr. Kicherer, "often to bend my knees, jointly with my little flock, before Him who had promised that he would take the heathen for his inheritance. Prostrate at his feet, I was peculiarly assisted in wrestling earnestly for the blessing, and a felt happy freedom in pleading Christ's own words in this case, and in relying upon his faithfulness to fulfil them. I shall never forget this remarkable season; it was admirable to me to observe, that frequently the more dark and gloomy my prospect was, the more abundantly the spirit of prayer was given unto me, so that I was enabled to shelter myself in Jesus,—to lay fast hold on him by faith,—and to commend these savages to his free love and grace."

The Bushmen had no idea whatever of a Supreme Being; like the other Hottentots, they had a superstitious reverence for the mantis, coupled with some notion of an evil spirit, which they imagined to produce mischief and inflict diseases; and the only symptom they discovered of any approach to religious observance, was employing a species of conjurors to make a kind of humming noise over the sick, to counteract the supposed injurious influence. When they heard of a God, and of the resurrection of the dead, they were amazed; nor could they sufficiently express their astonishment that they should have lived so long without ever having thought of a Divine Being. But often, when the missionaries were rejoicing over the apparent impression as deep and indelible, the promising objects of their solicitude and hope would, with the natural inconstancy of savages, revert to all their former grossness and insensibility, and put the patience and prudence of their instructors to the severest test. Some, however, now began to pray: "O Lord Jesus Christ, thou hast made the sun, the moon, the hills, the rivers, the bushes; thou hast power also to change my heart—O be pleased to make it entirely new!" Others told the missionaries they had not been able to sleep on account of their sorrow for sin, and had been forced to rise to pray, or, in their hunting excursions, had felt a sudden impulse to prostrate themselves before the Lord, and entreat for a renewed heart. The missionaries were grateful for these appearances, but thought it their duty to be cautious, lest they should prove like the morning cloud and the early dew; and what materially contributed to their uncertainty, and added to the difficulties with which they had to struggle, was the want of a good interpreter.

Providentially, just at the very nick of time, a Bastard Hottentot, married to a Bushman woman, came to live with them, both able to speak fluently the Dutch language and that of the wild natives. He was, besides, well acquainted with gardening, and she could undertake the management of their household affairs; so that now the missionaries were not only materially assisted in their communication with the savages, but relieved of a great part of the secular drudgery of the infant establishment.

About this time, Mr. Edwards, wishing to teach the Hottentots English, rather than Dutch, removed with a few Hottentots to a short distance from the settlement; but soon after, on a call from Dr. Vanderkemp, joined that missionary in Caffraria.

At the commencement of their labours the missionaries endeavoured to convince their hearers by arguments addressed to their understandings, but found that the savages were very expert in raising difficulties. They then resorted to the simple declaration of the Gospel of the cross of Christ, insisting on his dying love and all-sufficiency to save lost and helpless sinners,—affectionately inviting them to come to him that they might be saved. The blessing of the Lord accompanied this method of preaching; and those who were before impenetrable, now came to them with tears in their eyes, and acknowledging the truth, and confessing it to be the power of God to their salvation. Totally unaccustomed to any employment, except robbery and the chase, and averse to vegetables, except in cases of necessity, the missionaries found it almost impossible to excite a spirit of industry among the people. Mr. Kicherer's garden began now to assume a flourishing appearance; but so far were they from following his example, that they would not even eat of its produce, unless it was carried to their huts ready cooked! and it was only by giving little presents, that any of them could be induced to attempt manual labour.

In January, 1800, Mr. Kicherer having occasion to make a journey to Cape-Town, several Bushmen, who had never been in the place, accompanied him,—an instance of confidence with which he was the more pleased, as, besides being naturally suspicious of white men, attempts had been made to inspire them with particular distrust of the missionaries. Among the first objects that met their view, and struck them with terror and alarm on their arrival, were the bodies of several malefactors hung in chains; and their fears were increased by beholding the execution of another, a few days after. Mr. Kicherer seized the opportunity of explaining to them the European system of justice, as an ordinance of God, who had appointed civil rulers as a terror to evil-doers, and a praise to them that do well. They were pacified by the explanation, allowed its propriety, and earnestly wished that a similar institution could be established in their wilderness. Being called upon to preach in the Calvinistic Church, he carried his Bushmen with him. They were wonderfully amazed at the great number of well-dressed people assembled together, which, in their simplicity, they compared to a nest of ants,—the humming of the organ they at first mistook for the swarming of a bee-hive. Mr. K. also embraced every opportunity of introducing them into Christian company and religious meetings, from which they derived much advantage. They ascertained that the doctrine he taught was the common belief of Christians; and that Christians, in general, were much happier than Bosjesmens. They were likewise presented to the governor, General Dundas, who received them with much affability. They "in their way" thanked him for having permitted missionaries to come and teach them.—no man before having cared for their souls; and his excellency promised that he would continue to afford them every protection and assistance. Nor were these merely words of course: the government encouraged every plan for the civilization of these hitherto dreaded and irreclaimable savages, and promoted a yearly subscription on their behalf. During this visit, Mr. Kicherer received nearly two thousand guilders in money, besides many gifts of necessary and useful articles, as farming utensils, culinary vessels, and cloths. From this journey, during which they experienced much kindness, they returned in March with one hundred and thirty-six sheep, and four cows, which their Christian friends had given them.

* The Zak river, in summer, is a small stream that flows into Fish river;—both abound in fish, but the Hottentots are not fond of fish if they can procure flesh.

While Mr. Kicherer was absent, Vigilant, a captain of the Bushmen, came to seize a sheep as his due, which Mr. Kramer opposing, he first stabbed the animal, and then aimed a thrust at him. Providentially, a girl interposed, and warded off the blow with her kaross, when Kramer, seizing the assassin, had him carried to Mr. Fischer's for the purpose of being conveyed to Cape-Town. Having, however, escaped from his confinement, he came to the settlement soon after Mr. Kicherer's return, foaming with rage, and calling upon his numerous horde to assist him in revenging the affront. The situation of the brethren was now extremely critical; but that very night, Mr. Scholtz, a new assistant from Cape-Town, arrived with a farmer and his servant, and the infuriated chief fled from the neighbourhood. Soon after this, Mr. Kramer left Prospect Fountain for Hex river, and Kicherer, accompanied by Mr. Scholtz, removed with all their Bushmen to the Zak. Here they were joined by many "tame" Hottentots, so called in contradistinction to the wild Bushmen; but though they increased in numbers, they did not for some time appear to increase in grace; and their fickleness often occasioned their teachers great heaviness of heart.

Just at this time, Mr. Kicherer received an invitation to be minister at the Paarl, a rich village not far from Cape-Town, which occasioned him much perplexity, as he knew not whether to consider it as a temptation to divert his attention from the heathen, or a call from the Lord to a more useful station. In this emergency he most earnestly committed his way to the Lord, entreating that he would direct his steps. His mind became composed; and a providential hinderance soon made his way clear. From that time many whose hearts had been hard as their native rocks began to cry out, What must we do to be saved? And frequently the very hills, in a literal sense, resounded with their loud complaints.

One of the first converts was an old Bastard Hottentot, John. He had for some time felt a strong inclination to hear the word of God, but some of the rude farmers in the neighbourhood endeavoured to dissuade him, by insinuating that the missionary would either sell or kill him; but he could not resist the internal monitor. He came and heard, and had not sat many days under the sound of the gospel, till he began to cry aloud under a painful sense of his sins; and he had indeed been an atrocious offender. He compared them for number to the sands of the desert; and for some time mourned bitterly on account of them. At length the love of Christ became his darling theme; and so entirely was his heart filled with the things of God, that he could scarcely speak of anything else, while his eyes streamed with love and gratitude. When worldly business was introduced, he would say, "Oh! I have spoken too much about the world, let me now speak of Christ,"—and his walk and conversation was such as became his profession. After a short but lively course of five or six months, he was laid upon a sick-bed, from which he never rose, but he insisted upon being carried to the place of worship, saying, "as long as he could hear, he would endeavour to catch some of the words of life." Two days before his death he was troubled by doubts about his acceptance with Christ; but on the day of his departure, when Mr. Kicherer called, he joyfully burst out,—"O sir! I now see that the Lord Jesus loves me with an everlasting love; that he has accepted of me,—that he will be my portion for ever; and now, though the vilest sinner on earth, I will die and go to Christ, and there I will wait for you."

His eldest son, Cornelius, who was servant to a farmer at some distance, and had entered just at that moment, exclaimed with tears: "Ah, my father die so happy in Jesus, and I have no opportunity to hear about him!" Moved by his sorrow, Mr. Kicherer went to his master, requesting him to allow Cornelius to reside at the station. The farmer replied, that though he would not on any other account have parted with his best servant, yet, for the sake of the gospel, he would give him leave to go. Accordingly, Cornelius joined them, and the Lord was pleased to bless the word of reconciliation to his soul also. Having obtained peace through the Redeemer, he felt a strong impulse to proclaim his mercy and grace to those who knew him not; and thought himself called to leave wife and children, and go to distant tribes to preach Jesus to them. For half a year he struggled against this impulse, while his body wasted in the secret conflict, for he carefully concealed what passed within his bosom; till at length, unable longer to sustain the burden, he suddenly flung his knapsack over his shoulder, and marched into the wilderness. Here he betook himself to prayer, when the words came powerfully into his mind,—"Thou didst well that it was in thine heart;" and the calm which this produced was followed by a conviction that it was his first duty to try to bring his own near to the Lord. On which he returned home,—turned his attention to his kindred, and commended the gospel to those around him by his pious and prudent conduct.

Deadly revenge has ever been a prominent feature in the African character; and their intimate knowledge of poisons affords them too often a facility for gratifying it. About this time the missionaries had a narrow escape. Several farmers having assembled with them to partake of the Lord's supper, a runaway slave made his appearance, and they talked of sending him back to his master, agreeably to an order of government. The fellow, learning their intention, determined to be revenged; and while they were engaged in worship at the church, poisoned their well with a sort of moss, resembling human hair, which acts violently upon the stomach, contracting the bowels, and producing convulsions. Providentially, a little girl watched him, and gave information, else they must all have inevitably perished. Upon examining the slave, they found part of the poison about him. He was sent to Cape-Town to stand trial for the atrocious act; and they returned thanks to the Lord for their deliverance. Another singular escape from assassination is mentioned in Mr. Kicherer's narrative. On the evening of a day which had been uncommonly sultry, he was sitting near an open window, when a party of Bushmen approached secretly, and were about to discharge a volley of poisoned arrows at him; but the same girl who saved Mr. Kramer's life, gave the alarm, and they fled with precipitation.

Not less remarkable was the following. A base impostor, a Greek by birth, who had been condemned to death at Cape-Town for coining, but made his escape, came to the settlement under the fictitious name of Stephanos. The brethren Kramer and Scholtz, were absent among the distant Bushmen, endeavouring to persuade them to come and hear. Mr. Kicherer viewed the stranger with distrust; but his conversation was so religious, and his professions that he came to assist them in building their chapel so plausible, that Mr. Kicherer blamed himself for entertaining any suspicion, and permitted him to sleep in a room next to his own. It turned out, however, that he had devised a scheme for murdering the missionary, that he might seize on his wagon and goods, and then depart to some distant horde; and he had actually approached his bed to perpetrate the deed, when Mr. Kicherer started from his slumbers in a fit of terror, and cried out, as if aware of his bloody design. Disconcerted at this unexpected exposure, the villain stammered out an apology for disturbing him, and spoke of a pain in his bowels, and went away. In the morning it was found out he had gone off, taking with him Mr. Kicherer's gun, and several of the Bushmen, whom he had seduced, by pretending that the whites were coming to take vengeance upon them. The Hottentots immediately pursued and overtook them in the desert; compelled Stephanos to return the gun, dismiss the Bushmen, and follow his route alone. Unfortunately, he was met by Messrs. Kramer and Scholtz, who brought him back to Zak River, which occasioned great perplexity, as Mr. Kicherer had now ascertained that he was the malefactor who had escaped from justice; but, unwilling to have any hand in his death, he gave him his best advice, some provisions, and a Bible, and suffered him to depart in the night,—a lenity for which he afterwards suffered severely.

The subsistence of the missionaries in this desert, at so great a distance from habitations of civilized life, was also wonderfully provided for, in such a manner as evidently showed the hand of their Heavenly Father. Often, when in want of some necessary article of food, and asking each other, How shall the Lord now send relief? ere the day closed, relief came; nor was ever their confidence put to shame. Sometimes the hearts of people of whom they knew nothing, were moved to send them the very things they were in need of, and that at the very moment when their own stores were completely exhausted. Once, when they had nothing left except a few sheep, and they knew not where to look but to Heaven, they perceived some loaded oxen approaching, bearing the gift of a friend at a distance,—a measure and a half of meal, and a half measure of salt, and accompanied by thirty sheep,—twenty from himself, and ten as an offering from his Hottentots, two of whom esteemed it a high privilege to be allowed to conduct the present, that they might have an opportunity of hearing of the Lord Jesus.

A MISSIONARY station in a heathen land is like a city set upon a hill—it cannot be hid—it attracts the attention of the surrounding people, and sends forth among them the truths of the Gospel, the principles of civilization, and the practice of industry. The station at the Zak River attracted the attention of the Corannas, who frequently visited them; and one of these people was among the most striking instances of the power of grace to elevate the human character: her name was Tray. When she first came to the settlement, her appearance was scarcely human: her kaross was filthy beyond description; and her whole behaviour denoted brutality in the extreme,—so much so, that the missionary often said to himself, "Surely it is impossible that such a being can be converted." But where sin abounded, grace did much more abound. Soon her penitential tears began to flow: for more than a year she mourned over her sins, till the Lord spoke peace to her soul. She then was baptized by the name of Esther, and became one of the most active, industrious, and useful members of the congregation.

This tribe of aborigines, divided into several families or clanships, are numerous. Living beyond the limits of the colony, near the great or Orange River, they have their principal residence on the banks of the Narb and Vaal Rivers, south of the Beetzuan country, and still retain the manners and customs of their forefathers, whom they likewise resemble in the mildness of their temper, the indolence of their dispositions, and their roving habits. They are more attentive to their cattle than the other Hottentots, or even the colonists; and are celebrated for training, riding, and draught oxen. These animals go at a good trot or gallop, and clear a great deal of ground in a very short time. There is no occasion ever to be harsh with them—it is sufficient to touch them with a thin osier. The bridle is fastened to a wooden pin, stuck through the nose, and a sheep or goat-skin serves for a saddle. On this the rider has so firm a seat, that there is no danger of being thrown by even the wildest animal. When they wish to move, the staves and mats of their huts are easily struck, and, together with all their effects, packed up and laid on the back of the patient ox: and thus a whole village is ready to march in a few minutes. The want of food for their cattle was the cause of their frequent removals; for, being totally unacquainted with agriculture, when they had eaten up one pasture, they were under the necessity of seeking out another,—a wandering mode of life which presented the most formidable obstacles to any attempt to instruct or civilize them; but a great desire to hear the gospel having been manifested by them, and a fit opportunity offering, a mission was commenced among them early in the year 1801.

Four new labourers, Messrs. Tromp and Vanderlingen, Dutchmen, and Messrs. Anderson and Reed, Englishmen, having arrived at the Cape about the latter end of 1800, Mr. Anderson joined himself to Kicherer and Kramer, when they resolved to comply with the pressing invitations of that tribe, especially as a colony of Bastard Hottentots, in the same quarter, had joined in the request. This colony had settled on the Orange River about the year 1780. They consisted of only four families, old Adam Kok, and three brothers, Berends. The district abounding in game, their families increased rapidly, and were joined by others; but the accession of numbers brought division; and having no government, their contention became so violent, that they separated.—Cornelius Kok, the son of Adam Kok, forming one kraal, and the Berends forming another. The latter were the people who joined in inviting a missionary. Mr. Anderson set out first, (March 24, 1801,) accompanied by a number of Bastards. The journey, dangerous at all times on account of the wild Bushmen, was now peculiarly so. A wretch, known by the name of "Africaner," notorious for his murders and robberies, kept the whole country through which they were to pass, in a state of subjection and terror. He was a Bastard Hottentot, of the most fearless, determined, cruel, and relentless description. He had been servant to Mr. Pienaar, a person of undaunted courage, and excellent practical ability, "whom no danger could shake, and no obstacle turn,—the more arduous the task, the more determined was he in accomplishing it." This gentleman had constructed a road over a wild, and supposed impracticable hills, and accomplished a great work, of most essential benefit to the colony. Whether in constructing this road, or from what other cause of disgust, is uncertain, it so happened that Africaner, with his band, fell upon the man, his benefactor; and when Pienaar went out alone, and unarmed, to remonstrate with him, and try to induce him to return to habits of quiet industry, he fell upon him, and murdered him. Africaner immediately fled to the district of Orange River; and, hopeless of pardon, became the most desperate of all the savages that haunted that region. Wilder than the beasts of the forest, not a sense of want, but a delight in blood, led him on to destroy. Nor did he appear more pleased with ending the lives, than with prolonging the tortures of his victims. One instance may suffice: he had robbed the Corannas of almost the whole of their cattle; and when they humbly entreated that he would only restore as many of their cows as might, by their milk, keep them from starvation; he, with apparent kindness, told them he would leave the animals they wanted on the other side of the river, and they might come and fetch them. Relying upon his assurances, the unsuspecting people went to bring them away; but the robber was lying in wait: some he shot, some he maimed, and others he seized,—cut out their tongues, and tied them to trees,—leaving them faint with the loss of blood, or to die by slower consuming hunger. From this destroyer, the travellers were happily preserved. They were, besides, delivered from the hands of other rude Bushmen. One evening these "thieves of the desert" surrounded them, and a little boy heard the chiefs deliberating whether they should not murder the missionaries; but it so happened that the missionaries had that day shot two wild horses, which enabled them to give a hearty meal to their wild visitants, who departed highly gratified with their entertainment.

Rivers in Africa, like rivers in Scotland, after rains, often come down impetuous, deep, and broad. The river which Mr. Anderson had crossed was now speated. He succeeded, however, in crossing, by means of floats, and waited till his brethren could join him. Meanwhile, Mr. Kicherer having consulted with his people, they all agreed to change their habitation. The country along the banks of the river is the most pleasant in South Africa; the grass is abundant; the trees of large size; and the river never empty, continues full for nearly the one half of the year. But what was a more important consideration, the country was far more populous than where they were. The huts upon Zak river were therefore struck in May, 1801. On their journey, they were joined by Cornelius Koopman, whose haughty demeanour gave the brethren a very unfavourable opinion of him; but he had scarcely been in their company a single day, when conviction seized upon his soul, while Mr. Kicherer was praying. Divine grace appeared to touch his heart, and he became as distinguished for humility as he had been for pride. "Ah!" he would say, "I would rather starve here, where Jesus is preached, than return to serve those Christians who never told me of God, or of Christ, or the way of salvation." Surrendering himself entirely to the Lord, he became a pattern of godliness to all around him. Four or five times a day would he walk alone to the wilderness for prayer. And many a time, Mr. Kicherer, who followed him unperceived, and watched him at a distance, and heard his fervency of supplication, confesses that he was put to shame by marking his importunity in wrestling with God. He would talk to his children in his retirement, and weep, and pray, and, folding them in his bosom, beneath the shadow of a rock, or beside a bush, would commend them to his God and Saviour.

About July, they reached the great river, which, although in the dry season not broader than the Thames at London Bridge, was now impassable: they were therefore obliged to wait for its fall. As soon as the waters had a little subsided, though the rolling of the dark brown torrent was yet dangerous, some of their friends ventured to swim over; and, constructing rafts, carried, though not without difficulty, the missionaries to the other side. They pitched their tents at the Reed (or Riet) Fountain. Here they were joined by wanderers from another tribe of the aborigines,—the Namaquas. This nation, horde, or tribe, formerly proprietors of the Nieumeveld, the Bokkeveld, and the Roggeveld, now inhabits the western coast, from the boundary of the colony to the desert, stretching from Kamiesburg to the bay of Angra Pequina. There it might have been thought they would have been allowed to remain unmolested; but mercantile cupidity is a stranger alike to mercy or repose. Their herds were too powerful allurements; they were followed by—so named civilized Christians—miscreants; and when the European ruffians had roused them to vengeance, the sufferers were branded with epithets which of right belonged to their oppressors—barbarians, savages, murderers, and thieves.

The missionaries were received with the greatest expressions of regard; and soon found themselves surrounded by crowds of the different people, with their numerous flocks and herds. An universal desire of instruction appeared among their visitors: and the effects of their preaching were visible and strong. Persons emerging from a savage state are like children; they can neither suppress nor control their passions, when strongly excited; and, like them, they must give full vent to the expression of their feelings, in whatever company. Here the poor untutored Hottentots did so, and were often so powerfully affected with the wonderful tidings they heard for the first time, that some actually fainted under their convictions, whilst the tears which were shed were innumerable.

At this place they built a long shed of timber, reeds, and clay,—the roof reaching to the ground. The middle part was their church, with a room at each end, for the accommodation of the missionaries. Another small building was erected, in which the Corannas, Namaquas, and such strangers as did not understand Dutch, assembled, who were addressed through the medium of interpreters. A large garden was likewise enclosed and planted.

Twice, while here, Mr. Kicherer was preserved from the paws of the lion. Once when sleeping by the side of a cart, among a number of natives, when the animal was approaching silently, a little dog gave notice of the danger. And another time, when returning home on horseback, attended by one Hottentot only, he was obliged to sleep in the open field. About midnight they were awakened by the unruliness of their horses. The Hottentot, who was much alarmed, wished to conceal from Mr. Kicherer that it was a lion; but being closely interrogated, acknowledged that he had seen one at no great distance; and Mr. Kicherer himself soon perceived a pair of eyes shining like candles. Having set the grass in a blaze, the Hottentot fired, and the lion made off. They saw the huge animal, with his mane erect, in the very act of springing upon them, when the Hottentot fired, and he made off. This appeared the more extraordinary, as they next morning traced his bloody footsteps on the ground,—a proof of his having been wounded; and in such a case a lion seldom, if ever, retreats till he has avenged his blood.

An afflicting circumstance occurred about this time—Stephanos, after leaving the Zak river, had found refuge in Cornelias Kok's Bastard Hottentot's kraal, where he announced himself as a prophet, and had gained such an influence over the superstitious inhabitants, that he practised the most atrocious crimes with impunity: and whoever ventured to say a word against him was beaten unmercifully. He had erected a sort of temple, and an altar on which sacrifices were offered, and had a select number of disciples who, like himself, pretended to dream dreams and see visions, during which the angel Gabriel brought them messages from God himself. If the impostor wished to gratify his lust, his covetousness, or revenge, an answer from heaven authorized him to effect his purpose; and should any lukewarmness appear among his followers, he thundered out against them the judgments of the Almighty, as he did also against the missionaries.

As the chief, who possessed vast property, was completely devoted to the will of this wretch, the missionaries began to fear, lest, under such a protector, his doctrine, like that of Mahomet, might widely diffuse its baneful influences. Mr. Kicherer therefore, after mature deliberation and consultation with his brethren, determined to attempt stopping his diabolical proceedings, and, aware of the danger, took all his men armed with him. Stephanos, apprized of their design, called a meeting of his followers, and told them that this was the important moment in which they were called upon to demonstrate their attachment to God and his prophet; but if they proved unfaithful, fire from heaven would come down to destroy them. When Mr. Kicherer and his people approached the kraal, he saw the other party standing, their eyes sparkling with rage. Stephanos stepped forward, and offered his hand, which he refused to take; but desired him to walk with him under a tree, where they would decide the matter. The followers of both accompanied them to the spot, where Mr. Kicherer, with his Bible in his hand, disputed with him for the space of four hours. He insisted chiefly from Joel and the Revelations, that in the latter days there should be dreams and visions. Mr. Kicherer proved from the Scriptures, they could not be such as he laid claim to; and his own people declared themselves highly satisfied. Stephanos rolled his eyes madly, and spoke with incessant volubility; and his followers seemed waiting to proceed to violence, when Mr. Kicherer ordered his men to seize the prophet, as a malefactor already under sentence of death, and have him conveyed to the Cape for punishment. The order was promptly obeyed, and he was made prisoner in his own temple.

Instantly his crest fell, and he humbly besought Mr. Kicherer in French,—a language the people did not understand,—to set him at liberty, and he would leave the country. Mr. Kicherer replied, if he felt due contrition for his crimes, and evinced it by a frank confession of his guilt, perhaps he would let him go. The fallen wretch immediately, in a whining tone, addressed the people, acknowledging that he had imposed upon them—that if they went on in his ways they would certainly go to hell—and that they ought to thank God, who had sent them teachers of the truth.

Whenever the multitude perceived that he was effectually humbled, they thronged round Mr. Kicherer, and thanked him for what he had done, expressing boundless joy at deliverance from the shackles of this tyrannical impostor; and with a hatred proportioned to the feigned submission they had been forced to show, wished to send him away naked into the desert; but Mr. Kicherer interfered, and procured him provisions and a guide to take him to the coast, where he might, perhaps, find a vessel to carry him out of the country. On his journey, however, he was recognized by a farmer, Mr. Englebrecht, an officer of militia, who attempted to seize him, but in the scuffle unfortunately fell. Stephanos took advantage of his situation, and cut his throat from ear to ear with a razor he had concealed; after which, he fled and joined Africaner.

Leaving Mr. Anderson and Mr. Kramer settled at John Kok's kraal, Mr. Kicherer and Mr. Scholtz, after having continued ten months, resolved to return to Zak river, as the land was insufficient for the support of all their numerous cattle, and the frequent removals were inconvenient. Taking advantage of the river being low, they crossed it in the month of March; but as the desert was impassable, they erected temporary booths with branches, on the opposite bank, to wait till the rains should have enabled them to proceed; but some of the savage Bushmen having sent them false intelligence that a considerable quantity of rain had fallen in the wilderness, they determined to proceed. They travelled, however, till the third day without finding a drop; and at length, when they discovered a small pool containing sufficient to satisfy their own thirst, but not that of their distressed cattle, they perceived, to their grief that it was poisoned, by a number of serpent's heads swimming in it. Water thus poisoned causes a person who drinks of it to become soon so giddy that he cannot walk upright, and if an antidote be not immediately procured, he will certainly expire in a few hours.

Greatly distressed, the missionaries knew not what to do, and deliberated whether they should not have a public prayer meeting to implore of God a supply of rain; but at last they resolved to beseech the Saviour in secret, and they earnestly entreated his help in their time of need. The Lord graciously heard and answered their supplications, by sending in the course of a few hours a plentiful shower. Here they rested two days to recruit their cattle: but on the very morning fixed for their departure, one of their cows came home with an arrow sticking in her flank,—a token that the Bushmen had driven away part of their herd. Some armed Hottentots were therefore despatched in the track of the robbers, while the rest of the company pursued their journey; they were fortunate in recovering seventy-three out of eighty oxen that had been carried off.

Mr. Kicherer, who had not tasted bread for half a year, being seized with extreme longing for a morsal, left the care of the company to Mr. Scholtz, and passed forward to a farmer's, along with three of his people, whose conversation was so spiritual, that he declared the hours spent with them were amongst the happiest of his life. At length he arrived at the farmer's house; on entering which, his first request was for a piece of bread. This he ate with the keenest appetite, and observes: "It is difficult to conceive of the gratification I enjoyed when tasting once more this long missed article of food."

Shortly after he had returned to Zak river, he wished to form his people into a regular settlement, for which many necessary articles were wanted. A favourable opportunity presenting itself for going to the Cape, where these things only could be procured, he embraced it. When he arrived at Cape-Town, he received from the governor a hundred pounds sterling for services which he had rendered the colony. This he laid out in clothes and utensils for the poor Bushmen at Zak river;—for whose sake he also declined, at this time, the parish church at Rodezand, which had been kindly offered him. As soon as he had despatched his business at the Cape, he hastened back to his station in the wilderness. He informed his people that he had again refused the church of Rodezand, and if they would only be diligent and industrious he would never leave them, but if they relapsed into their indolent habits, he would assuredly take the next offer. The people promised everything he could desire, and assured him he should never have cause to complain more. He immediately commenced building a more commodious church, and procured a carpenter and a mason to assist. His Hottentots began with spirit; but their natural indolence returned upon them and they grew tired. He then repeated his former declarations, adding he would assuredly leave them in eight days if they did not amend. "A scene ensued," says he in his narrative, "which I cannot recollect without much emotion. They began to weep, and entreat me so fervently, that my heart melted within me. I gave them my word that I would not desert them. The joy occasioned by this promise was excessive: many of them clasped me round the neck, and I was convinced that they loved me better than I had imagined."

The settlement was situated in an elevated valley, surrounded by barren mountains, without a tree to enliven the prospect: it was susceptible of cultivation, but not remarkable for fertility. Besides the church, which was capable of containing eight hundred people, there was erected a good mission-house, consisting of several rooms on one floor, built of stone. Before the house was an excellent spring, which supplied them with water. On the one side, a kitchen garden, and on the other, a cattle-yard. Around, the baptised built comfortable houses in the farmer's style, and, behind, the heathen lived in small huts. The river flowed about three quarters of a mile distant from the house, and on its northern banks were the cornfields. But the climate is not very favourable; the heat during the day being very great, and the cold during night piercing. In winter there are sharp dry frosts, which prove very destructive to vegetables. In the summer months the rains are heavy—frequently attended with thunder and lightning, sometimes destructive both to men and beasts. The grass is scanty, but the cattle crop the tops of the bushes.

The difficulties attending the formation of a settlement on such an unprofitable spot were not few; but the missionaries had not always the choice of a situation. They had, however, the satisfaction to find the work of the Lord prosper in their hands. Mr. Kicherer, about the end of the year, baptized, at different times, thirty adults and twenty-four children; and these occasions, he remarks, were peculiarly affecting. On the day preceding, they were strictly examined as to their faith, and their determination to follow the Lord wholly; and the missionary being satisfied, on the next, usually the Lord's-day, they were admitted into the church. After the forenoon service, consisting of singing, reading the scriptures, prayer, and a sermon, the ordinance was administered by sprinkling; then the apostolic benediction was pronounced over the baptised individually; and the minister went round, and shook hands with each of them, welcoming them in the name of Jesus into His Church, as dearly beloved friends. All the Christians present joined in congratulatory expressions, full of tender affection,—the women embracing their sisters, and crying out. "God is performing wonders in this dry desert. How great is the Lord's loving kindness, who reveals himself to such poor blind creatures!"

"As to my own feelings," says Mr. Kicherer, "I cannot express them: I could do nothing but weep or speak broken words of love and praise, when I considered what the Lord had done among these people, and how my eyes now beheld that happy day for which I had longed so much,—for which I had so repeatedly and fervently prayed. Things that once seemed next to impossible, were now realized. I was overwhelmed while we were singing that verse of the 72nd Psalm:

'They in the wilderness that dwell,
Bow down before Him must.'

And I could not help exclaiming, 'Yes! thou art God of truth, this thou hast shown to us, and art still showing to us!'"—Service over, they had all a love-feast together, and in the evening of the same day partook of the Lord's-supper.

Ill health, and other important circumstances, now determined Mr. Kicherer to visit Europe; and on the 1st of January, 1803, he took leave of his beloved flock. The parting was affecting: the poor people wept bitterly—held him by the hands—and would scarcely let him go. They said they would pray to God to bring him back soon; for they thought they should die if he did not quickly return. He gave them the assurance, that, if possible, he would be among them again in little more than a year; and left them,—the settlement consisting of eighty-three baptized heathen, and upwards of five hundred desirous of instruction,—under the charge of Mr. Bosman, a native who had been a farmer, but who had relinquished all to preach the gospel.

CAFFRARIA is the first eastern land beyond the bounds of the colony, and differing in its inhabitants from the Hottentots, to which the benevolent efforts of the European Christians were directed. Some of the natives had visited the Moravian settlements, and some of the Moravian missionaries had visited them; but it was not till Dr. Vanderkemp went to Africa, that any serious attempt was made to bring them within the pale of civilized society. The Doctor's earliest attachment and views were directed to these people; and from him we have derived the most accurate account of them, as they existed in their savage state,—that is, in their state at the time of their discovery to the Europeans. Without supposing Vaillant guilty of any intentional falsehood, it is perfectly evident that, in his circumstances, he was wonderfully exposed to mistake; and he seems indeed to have been fairly hoaxed by the natives, in some instances of a rather ludicrous description. The ladies, in particular, appear to have diverted themselves with the vanity of the traveller. Yet subsequent travellers, who smile at him, have not always themselves been free from error in what they have related of the manners and customs, the morals and religion, of this people.

The name Caffre, said to be derived from an Arabic word signifying an infidel, which the Mahomedans applied to all the inhabitants of South Africa, has been by European writers confined to one tribe, the Koosas, and the land which they inhabit has been alone called Caffraria. To this extensive tribe, estimated at upwards of thirty-five thousand souls, the subsequent description and narrative refers.

The land which they inhabit is mountainous, and rich in water; the soil argillaceous, composed of fine sand, and very fertile. The whole surface, even the tops of the mountains, is covered with woods, shrubs, grass and other vegetables,—never naked or parched, except in uncommonly dry seasons. Winter, which extends from April or May to August, and is the wettest season at the Cape, is the driest in Caffraria. The rains descend in the latter country chiefly in the summer months, and are generally accompanied by thunder storms. These are more frequent and tremendous than in Europe, and exhibit also uncommon phenomena: the flash of the lightning diffuses not such a bright blaze through the air, dazzling the eye, and evanishing in a moment; but appears in continued streams of distinct sparks, elicited by the earth from the clouds,—or by one cloud from another; and these streams, double or treble, sometimes last two, or two seconds and a half. To the plentiful rains are attributed the superior fertility of Caffraria, and to its elevated situation its superior healthiness, as its height above the level of the sea renders it more cool than might have been expected from its nearness to the tropic. There is little difference, with respect to the cold, between summer and winter; and if the leaves of the trees, in the latter season, look not quite so lively, this is owing more to the want of moisture than the want of heat.

The presence of the Caffres is commanding: they are tall and athletic,—their features are in many instances noble,—and their colour a deep brown, approaching to black; but this is frequently not very discernible, as they often paint their face and body with the dust of a red chalk or iron stone. Instead of puncturing themselves, as was the custom of the South Sea Islanders, they form a kind of bass-relief, by thrusting a pointed iron through the skin, and pulling it forcibly up so as to remain prominent through the surface of the body. Men and women, especially the latter, thus adorn their arms, backs, and breasts, with cicatrices of the size of grains of wheat, placed in regular rows, which are commonly double, treble, and somewhat quadruple.

They never put on clothes for the sake of decency, but of ornament; and if the cold do not compel them to use a covering, they go naked. Their heads are always bare, but adorned with a chain of hemispherical brass or copper grains, of about one quarter of an inch diameter, in the form of a diadem, or with a ribbon of an inch broad, composed of small beads, of two or three different colours, put close together. From their ears they suspend chains of beads, buttons, and metal wire, as their fancy prompts. Rings of various metals are their most favourite jewellery; and with these in great profusion they encircle their limbs, and necks, and loins; but a singular decoration of the man is five or six teeth of a tiger standing upright, tied together, and fixed on the right arm, just above the elbow. To protect them against cold, they have a cloak, generally of cow's skin, prepared so as to be remarkably soft; the captains, by way of pre-eminence, wear tiger's.

The women wear a long pyramidical cap, from the point of which are suspended strings of beads; from the lower part four bands of some inches wide hang down, which, when tied, fix the cap in its position. The cloak is fastened to the body by a girdle round the middle. In young women the upper part flows loose; but if a woman have a child, she places the child in the flap, and secures it with a string. Both women and children wear aprons. The women go barefoot. The men carry a sort of sandals in their hands, or upon the end of a stick, which they tie on their feet when the road turns rough.

Marriage is not the mutual contract of two parties. The husband buys his wife from her parents, for some cattle; but he is not permitted to sell her to another. Polygamy is practised. The commoners, however, usually content themselves with one or two; but the captains take four or five, besides concubines; and this not so much as a matter of pleasure as of utility,—the most laborious part of their occupations being performed by the women: they build the houses, till the ground, cut the wood, do all the drudgery in the formation of a kraal, and, in addition, make the agricultural and domestic utensils, and whatever of ornament or utility is connected with their dress. The men's only employments are to fight, hunt, and milk the cows. Circumcision is performed upon boys about twelve or fourteen years old, and is accompanied with ceremonies representing a total renewal of the person. He is painted all white, then driven into a river, and there washed clean, and all his old habiliments taken away, and new ones given him.

Their huts are formed more substantially, but in a manner similar to the Hottentots, of a hemi-spheroidal shape, longer, and supported by stronger poles, the dome thatched with straw, and plastered inside with clay. Their villages are better protected; and the right of private property, as in all other countries approaching to the agricultural state, better understood. The large circular area in the centre of the kraal, where the animals are kept, are fortified by trees, cut down, and laid in the manner of abattis; and hither all the cattle belonging to the village are driven at evening, and milked; and in the morning, after milking again, are led into the field, and watched by a few of their young people.

In the middle of this large court, each family has its individual granery,—a pit digged pretty deep, in which their corn is stowed. It is laid on the bare ground, and covered with its own straw; and then the whole earth that had been previously dug from the pit, is heaped upon it: here it will remain for a long while, till needed, perfectly dry. Every one knows his own pit, although no mark be upon it; and when it is opened for the first time, the proprietor gives a basketful of it to every person in the kraal, and a larger one to the captain. The Caffre corn is a kind of millet, but grows from seven to ten feet high: the stalks are about an inch thick, and when chewed, have a saccharine taste. The corn itself is eaten boiled, or bruised between two stones, and made into unleavened bread. They likewise make a fermented liquor from it. No plough, nor spade, nor manure, is employed in the cultivation of this grain; the seed is merely thrown on the grass, and the grass afterwards shaken, and beaten with a wooden instrument; and from underneath this half dried half rotten grass, the corn springs up. They have another kind, which they call bona, known in Holland by the name of "Turkish corn," the grains of which are very large in this country, not much inferior in size to peas.

Every village has a common garden, and many families private ones. They are fenced nearly as the cattle court of the kraal, but only more wood is used, and that is renewed yearly, the old serving for fuel. In these they sow pumpkins, and a peculiar kind of watermelons; they, besides, have roots and fruits unknown in Europe, of which last, Dr. Vanderkemp mentions one called ingonja, a large tree bearing a kind of olive of a delicious flavour, like sugar acidulated with lemon-juice, of an oval form, about two inches in length. The Caffres also cultivate large quantities of tobacco, which they use with refined eastern luxury; they draw the smoke from a wooden pipe, which is inserted in a cow's horn, half filled with water; and by this simple, yet ingenious process, it is as effectually cooled as by passing through tubes of greater length and varied convolutions.

They subsist chiefly upon their herds and the produce of the chase. They have no flocks either of sheep or goats, nor do they raise poultry. If a man be poor, and has no cattle, he applies to the king and to the captains, who always give him more than a sufficient quantity for a supply, for which they have ready recourse to the fields of the Boers, and never hesitate, in case of necessity, to drive off a few hundreds, which usually gives rise to forays, not very dissimilar to those so frequent in former times upon our own Borders. Their agriculture is a secondary consideration. Fish they never eat, except some very poor kraals, who are despised on that account. When they kill cattle, the breast is appropriated to the king, and sent to him from the most distant part of the district, although it is often quite putrid before it reaches him.

Diseases are but little known among them; the reasons assigned for which are, their temperate mode of living—their moderate exercise—and the care with which they select the situations of their villages, at a distance from marshes or waters. Dr. Vanderkemp, during the time he remained in the country, had never met with any instances of intermitting fevers, consumptions, scorbutic, or hydropic complaints. There was, however, sometimes a great mortality among the people, occasioned by putrid typhi, arising from their diet in dry seasons, when milk was scarce, and from the close confinement of their huts. Their medical practice was chiefly magical, and consisted in the deceptions of their conjurers, who pretended to extract stones, serpents, bones, and even pieces of wood, out of the body of the patient. Sometimes cattle were ordered to be slain, cut in pieces, and laid in a river, as an expiatory offering. Or, if the devil was supposed to have possessed the sufferer, then the conjurer, by a number of fantastic tricks, had first to cast him out, and then catch hold of him and kill him; but this last was an arduous task: the doctor being commonly obliged to pursue his antagonist over mountains and through valleys with an assagai in his hand. In the chase, the evil spirit sometimes showed superior metal, and escaped; at others he was not so lucky, and his conqueror returned in triumph, with the blood of the demon on his spear. In some inflammatory cases, however, they had a more rational method of cure, by cupping the patient, and in others by the use of simples; but even then the effects were attributed to the power of the magician.

If a sick person's case was considered desperate, he was carried to the field, and left to be devoured by the wolves. Should he have been able to return home, he was carried out again a second or third time; and then, should he still have had as much strength left as to return, he was locked up in his house, with a little meat and drink, and the whole kraal broke up, and left him to die. When dead, he was thrown, without farther ceremony, to the wolves—burial was the exclusive privilege of the king and queen.

"It was long," says the Doctor, "before I could trace the real motives of this cruel practice; but since I am a little more acquainted with the character of this people, I think it proceeds from love to self-preservation. They fancy that if they suffer the disease to progress, it will bring on the whole society some great calamity. To prevent this, they know of no other remedy than to destroy the subject of the distemper. Perfectly analogous with this heartless selfishness is their conduct when they see a person in danger of being drowned: instead of attempting to help him, they flee from him, and would rather assist in helping to destroy, than to save. Murder is hardly considered a crime; and, if not revenged by the relatives, is generally commuted by a pecuniary mulct. Cattle are the currency, and part goes to the king, part to the relatives. Adultery is equally slightly thought of, and equally easily compensated; but to commit a nuisance in the water of a river, or in a cattle-court, is a crime always punished by death. Defilement is the most serious offence; and whether accidentally or intentionally contracted, subjects its objects to grievous inconvenience. When a husband or a wife dies, the survivor, considered unclean, must remain in seclusion,—the male for one, the female two months; and their clothes must be destroyed, and even their abodes, before they can again be admitted to society. The times of seclusion, the ablutions and ceremonies necessary for purification in child-birth, and several other instances, bear a striking resemblance to those of the Jewish ritual; but when one has killed a man, he is merely obliged to dress his meat on a fire by himself, made of a bitter wood, and afterwards rub his face with the ashes, which frees him from the pollution of blood; and the small estimation in which human life is held, forms in this, as in every other heathen code, a striking contrast to the law of God. He only who formed man knows the value of his mortal existence."

In their mutual intercourse they observe a peculiar decency in their manners; and, though extremely savage, abstain from whatever might offend delicacy. Dr. Vanderkemp mentions that a little boy, who had inadvertently trespassed in his presence, was immediately turned out of doors. They use no salutations in meeting, except when they come into the king's presence, they prefix the word "An," to his name,—an expression of respect, of which he has not told us the signification. When they wish to honour a person whom they esteem, they give him a new name;—the Doctor himself had three, and was quickly known by them throughout the country.

The government is monarchical; and the king has the right of nominating his successor, who is generally, though not always, of his own family. His power is arbitrary, but he derives all his strength from the good-will and affection of his people. Their attachment to the royal person is very great; they consider him almost as a deity, and swear by no other name than his, or some of his predecessors. He kills or robs any of his subjects, alters their laws and rights according to his pleasure, and they bear all with filial submission. He has, however, his counsellors, pagati, who inform him of the sentiments of the people; and his captains admonish him with great freedom, when he abuses his authority. If the admonition be treated with contempt, the different kraals break up, and remove to distant parts of the country, but seldom rise in insurrection, or appear in arms against him. Their emigrations generally bring him to reason.

Every kraal has a captain. These differ in power, according to the number of people under their direction. Sometimes the people who acknowledge one captain divide into two or three kraals, and then he has a representative in each. This dignity is hereditary; and when the chieftain has no child or heir, another is chosen by the people, or at least confirmed by their approbation. The king does not appoint these rulers, but he sometimes takes vacant kraals under his own protection, and occasionally displaces an obnoxious person. The grand check upon the royal power is the want of a mercenary army! while every Caffre able to bear arms is a voluntary warrior. His revenue consists in contributions or exactions of cattle, with a quantity of corn, all elephants' teeth, panthers' skins, and cranes' feathers. When he travels he is accompanied by his counsellors, and a train of followers; his wives are also followed by a train of women of the lower rank. Wherever he stops, an ox is immediately killed for his entertainment; but neither he nor any of his attendants drink any milk upon their journeys, excepting from their own cows, which they always carry with them.

The wars of the Caffres are either with the colonists, the Bushmen, or the neighbouring tribes; and each chief, attended by his vassals, obeys the summons of his king, who leads them to battle in person, and fights in the centre. Their arms are the assagai formerly described, and the kirri, a short formidable bludgeon. They defend their bodies by a shield of cow's-hide. They are described as a people who formerly disdained to make use of any stratagem in war, but challenged their enemies to meet them openly, and fought them fairly in the open field, relying on their courage, discipline, and strength alone for victory; but the treachery and cruelty which they so frequently experienced from the Boors, have destroyed their chivalrous spirit, and they have learned from their enemies to reckon all advantages honourable in war.

With the arts they are little acquainted, but they have learned to forge arms and other instruments. The fire is lighted by the friction of two pieces of wood. The one is flat, with a cavity in the middle, the other, a round pointed stick, is placed in this cavity and turned rapidly round and pressed down, by which means some powder is rubbed off the two sticks, which gradually grows hot, and at last catches fire. For keeping liquors, and even cooking, they make pots of clay, which are hardened in the sun. Some are very large in their form. They resemble bottles with wide necks. Their works with rushes are exceedingly ingenious, and their baskets for holding milk are remarkably beautiful and tight. The numerals in their language are few; but they contrive by some species of occult arithmetic, peculiarly their own, to keep an exact account of their herds, even when they amount to several hundreds.

As a nation, they have no idea of the existence of a God, nor has their language a word to express a Supreme Being, though there are many individuals who have some indistinct notions, which they have received from their intercourse with other people,—but they are abundantly superstitious. Near the mouth of the river Kieskamma there lies an old anchor, which had belonged to a vessel wrecked on the coast. A king, who governed the country about the year 1786, ordered a piece of this anchor to be cut off. The person who was employed in the work died soon after; and this accident was sufficient to impress the people with the idea, that the anchor had the power of punishing every one who should treat it with disrespect, and also that it had some power over the sea. In order to reconcile it, it has been honoured with a peculiar name, and no Caffre passes without saluting it. They formerly believed too, that within late years, during great thunder-storms, a man dressed in green, and always leaning against the stump of a tree, with his eyes fixed on the ground, makes his appearance in their kraals; when they offer him corn, meat, or milk, or invite him to come into their houses. He never accepts the invitation, and seldom speaks. Once, in a tremendous storm, he was heard to say, "Do not be afraid, I only play with your country." When this personage, whom they called Pezoulo,—"the chief from above,"—is seen in a kraal, the people immediately retire from it, leaving everything behind,—slay some beasts,—and put on new garments. Their belief in the existence of malevolent beings, and of the communication of their sorcerers with them, occasions effects similar to what the belief of witchcraft among our own forefathers occasioned scarcely two centuries ago. When any person of distinction is seized with any unaccountable trouble, a sorceress—for they are generally women—is sent for, and the person who is pointed out by her is immediately put to death. If he be absent, the king sends executioners to the kraal where he lives; and though this be known by the whole inhabitants, the object of this fatal sentence remains entirely ignorant of it till the time of execution, as no one, not even the wife of his bosom, will attempt to warn him of his danger; and the mode of his death is often the most dreadful,—ants being employed, who gradually consume the flesh off the miserable sufferer. The king's mother, when Dr. Vanderkemp was in Caffraria, stood at the head of the magicians; and during his reign, the richest of the subjects were sometimes accused, but they always effected a commutation of their punishment for a fine of so many cattle. Once, the king, when five persons were accused, and he was cited to murder them in order to procure his recovery, replied, with a degree of magnanimity that would have done honour to any monarch,—"If my life can only be saved at the expense of so many of my subjects, let it perish!" But they also pretended to procure rain when wanted, by their sorcery; and Gika, who ranked Dr. Vanderkemp among the "wise men," after a long drought, sent him a present of cattle to procure rain. The Doctor returned the presents, with a message that he could not procure rain, but he would pray to the Lord Jesus, who, if he saw it proper, could send it. A plentiful rain fell the next and two succeeding days, accompanied with a violent thunder-storm;—when the king sent another embassage, to request him, "that the next time he brought them rain, he would thank him to keep away the thunder!" It was somewhat observable, that in Caffraria, as in other countries where the gospel is introduced, the native sorcerers always confess that the power of their enchantments fail them in presence of the Christians. Here the queen-mother declared, that she could never command rain, for the hole was shut up whence it used to come.

The language is totally different from that of the Hottentots—it has none of its clicking noise, and is represented as energetic, yet soft,—wanting some of the rougher sounds of the European, particularly the r. It is easier of attainment.

For the history of this people we are indebted to Vanderkemp, from whom Lichterstein, who copies and amplifies what we mean to abridge, has the most material of his information, though he wishes, ungratefully, to depreciate the missionary, to whose labour he is so deeply indebted. The traditions of the Caffres reach only back to six kings,—Togou, Quonde, Tzio, Tquáreka, Khanta, Gika, Palo, mentioned by Vaillant as king, was only protector under Tquáreka, his brother, against whom he rebelled, but was subdued, pardoned, and restored to office. Khanta, who was his nephew, transferred the royal power to Gika, a great grandson of Palo, in preference to his own sons. Gika, being a child when his benefactor died, was educated by his uncle Tzlambi, who acted as regent. When Gika came of age, he claimed the sovereignty; but his uncle refused to surrender his power, and, joined by eight of his brothers, who were chiefs, and the children of Khanta, raised the standard of rebellion.

A series of engagements ensued, in which Gika was victorious; and in a decisive battle, he not only dispersed the whole of his adversaries, but took his uncle and two of the sons of Khanta prisoners: the eldest of these last he killed, the youngest, Hietnza, he pardoned, as he was but a child, and adopted as his heir. Tzlambi was kept prisoner for two years, and then made a captain by the king, who, when giving him his commission, gave him likewise this wholesome admonition,—"when you were my tutor, you taught me to be a generous king, and since I became your king, I hope I have taught you to be a faithful subject." In consequence of these disputes, several parties of the Caffres withdrew to different and distant parts of the country, who owned nominal subjection to Gika, but in some cases, particularly in their disputes with the colonists, acted independently.

Such was the internal state of Caffraria when the aged missionary set out to reclaim it from the wilds of heathenism. The situation of affairs in that part of the colony through which he had to pass, was at that time extremely critical. The Boors of the interior were many of them dissatisfied with the British government, while the oppressed Hottentots naturally attached themselves to it for protection; in consequence, the farmers treated them with increased cruelty, while the British had not the courage to dare to be just, nor afford them that protection which the letter of the Dutch law had so repeatedly promised. Many of these unfortunate men therefore fled into Caffraria, leaving their families and cattle behind, where, having no means of support, they joined with some of the neighbouring Caffres, who had also suffered from the base violence and injustice of the colonists, to attack their tyrants, and rescue their family and cattle from their withering gripe; and they had successfuly resisted a party of British troops, with a large body of the Boors who had attempted to reduce them; nor was anything wanting but arms and ammunition to have enabled them to have swept their oppressors from the face of the earth. As it was they desolated a fine track of country, and kept the whole border in a constant alarm.

Dr. Vanderkemp and Mr. Edmonds left Cape-Town about the middle of May 1799, with Bruntjee, a Hottentot from Bavian's Kloof,—a famous elephant-hunter, who had formerly visited Caffraria, to act as guide and interpreter,—his two sons, with another young Hottentot, Valentine Hartenberg, also from the Moravian settlement, as attendants. They carried letters of introduction and recommendation from the governor, General Dundas, to the commander of the forces, and from the fiscal, Rynvalt, to the landrost of Graaf Reinet, the last station in the colony, besides various others to different persons on the road. These, with the circumstance of Dr. Vanderkemp being a Dutchman, secured them the greatest kindness everywhere, especially as the Boors did not fully understand the nature of their mission, and did not conceive that they would ever propose instructing the natives within the colony. Yet there were some few pious persons among the colonists who sincerely wished them God speed.

They seized every opportunity on the journey of preaching and were heard "with reverence as apostles," by numbers, who came from very distant quarters. On their way they met a party of Caffres who were wandering towards the Cape, by whom they were regaled with milk; but they declined returning with them to Caffraria, as their chief had been murdered by those of another kraal. The whole intelligence they received upon the route was calculated to deter them from entering that land, which was described as in a state of the utmost distraction. Their journey through the wilderness was disagreeable and dangerous,—it being now in the depth of winter, from the cold and the ravenous animals which constantly prowled around them; but on the penult of June, they arrived in safety at Graaf Reinet, situate on the Sontag River.

Here the landrost and the inhabitants endeavoured to persuade them to give up their plan of going to the Caffres beyond the Great Fish river, representing the risk they ran from the exasperated state of their minds against the whites. But they declared, if they obtained liberty from the king, they would not count their lives dear in obeying the command of the Lord; and from the deliverences they had already experienced, they doubted not but they would still see more of His wonders. On the borders all was confusion. The Boors, whose encroachments upon the fine country of the Caffres was the occasion of a great part of the troubles, were violently against the missionaries entering Caffraria; in particular, one Piet Prinslo, who rudely accosted them— "Dog Hornhutters," i. e. Good day, Moravians; and told them "he should not assist them in converting the savages, nor have anything to do with them at all." They sent forward, however, messengers to king Gika, to request liberty to visit him, and kept advancing, accompanied by several farmers.

During the march they were the unwilling witnesses to some petty, but not bloodless skirmishes, and saw the ravages and plunderings which the Boors, by their overweening ideas of their own superiority, and their brutality to their savage superiors, had entailed upon themselves. To illustrate the character of these Christians, and the heathen, among whom Dr. Vanderkemp was placed as between two opposing elements, the following anecdote may suffice:—A Hottentot named Courage asked him,—"Is it true that God has created us as well as the Christians and the beasts of the field? for you know," added he, "that the Dutch farmers tell us that He never created us, nor taketh any notice of us."

The missionaries paid a visit to some friendly Caffres on the other side of the Great Fish River, and observed their smiths at work. When they told them the object of their mission, they assured Bruntjee that they had nothing to fear; that Gika had been informed of their intention of visiting him; "and we will accompany you, and build houses for them, though we do not exactly understand their intentions." When the missionaries endeavoured to explain their object—"Your masters," said they to the interpreter, "are children of the great King above,"—pointing to heaven. They told them that the Boors had attempted to poison their minds against them, suggesting that they came to betray them. "But," added they, "it would do no good for your masters to turn back, for they would certainly be cut off: let them stay and wait." Six fires on the tops of the mountain next night, alarmed the whole encampment, and the colonists prepared for flight. Prinslo, in a rage, entered Dr. Vanderkemp's tent, and charged him with having stirred up the Caffres to plunder and murder the colonists; and that he had said to the Hottentots, pointing to the cattle—"These you have a right to take freely—they are yours." But when desired to produce the person to whom this had been said, he could not find him—he had absconded; and Prinslo at last said himself, that he believed the accusation false.

Meanwhile, the ambassadors returned from his Caffrarian majesty, with an encouraging and pressing invitation, and the royal tobacco-box as their passport. But next day they were attacked by some hostile Caffres, when a battle ensued, which lasted for an hour. The missionaries chose to be unarmed, as they would not interfere in the hostilities; but Vanderkemp, who had himself been a soldier, was surprised at the coolness and intrepidity of the women and children. A few of the assailants were killed, but the colonists were obliged to leave their cattle a prey to their enemies, to whom many of the Hottentots took the opportunity of deserting. This and other untoward incidents, prevented the missionaries from entering Caffre-land till the month of September 1800.

They were now alone, and left to their own resources; and not unfrequently remarked, that, when destitute, their Heavenly Father cared for them. One evening, when sitting in their tent, and consulting where they might get as much to eat as would preserve them alive, they were surprised to observe some wild onions growing in the tent; and on examination, found they had pitched in the middle of a field full of these roots, of delicious flavour, and which afforded them an excellent breakfast. That day they reached an inhabited country, and three days after, they reached the dwelling of the king.

Immediatly about a hundred Caffres flocked around them, and they asked for his majesty, but nobody answered. After they had waited about ten minutes, he made his appearance, advancing with a slow majestic step, attended on each side by one of his principal chiefs. He was covered with a long robe of panthers' skins, and wore a diadem of copper, and another of beads, round his head. His cheeks and lips were painted red; and he held in his hand an iron kiri. He stopped about twenty paces from them, when one of his captains announced that it was the king. The missionaries then approached, and he, marching up to them, offered them his right hand, but spoke not a word. Vanderkemp then delivered him his snuff-box, which he had filled with buttons, which he graciously accepted, and handed to one of his attendants. Behind his majesty his court was ranged in a semi-circular form; and, at a considerable distance, the people had crowded to see the ceremony. Dr. Vanderkemp then asked, in a loud tone of voice, whether any person could speak Dutch? Nobody answered, only some smiled; but in about a quarter of an hour, Konrad Buys, a rebel colonist, who had sought refuge in Caffraria, arrived, and acted as interpreter. Having seated himself on an ant-hill, Gika asked what was the object of their mission, and what they wished of him? Vanderkemp replied, to instruct him and his people in matters that would make them happy in this life, and after death; and that they only asked leave to settle in his land, under his friendship and protection, with liberty to return to their own country when they judged it expedient. The king, evidently prompted by Buys, said they had come at a very unfavourable period, when the country was all in confusion, though he took no part in the disputes between the English and some of the Caffres. He advised them, therefore, not to stay with him. "Your people," continued he, "look upon me as a great man, but I am not able to entertain you as you ought to be entertained: you look for a settlement, but I have no resting place; nor can I protect you, as I cannot protect myself." The missionary told him, they were only private men, willing to provide for themselves; that they did not suppose he could remove the common calamities of war, but they were willing to bear them with patience; and asked no other protection than what he could give to the meanest of his subjects, or than what Buys enjoyed. He repeated that he would not advise them to stay in his country, as not calculated for their manner of living; but gave them leave to unyoke their oxen and pitch their tent; and asked, if they had brought anything with them? They produced their presents for himself and his uncles, with which he declared himself pleased; and afterwards honouring them with a visit in their tent, he was captivated with a looking-glass, which they also gave him.

The addition of a musket would have sealed their friendship; but their old enemy, Piet Prinslo, had insinuated that they were English spies and assassinators who had enchanted wine, with which they meant to poison him; and advised him to keep them prisoners till he arrived to convict them. Lichterstein says, that Gika repaired to Vanderkemp, and requested from him a glass of wine, when he, with all the ingenuity of innocence, told him he had no wine; and Gika, immediately convinced of the falsity of the accusation, dismissed all suspicion. The doctor's own journal merely mentions, with gratitude to his God and Saviour, that the machinations of his enemies had been frustrated, but does not tell by what means. A gridiron, however, secured his friendship, and four handkerchiefs, that of his mother and his sister Hoby, who, in return, plentifully supplied them with milk.

His majesty still refused to give the missionaries any decisive answer with regard to their settlement. The proverbial fickleness of barbarians rendered Dr. Vanderkemp uneasy at the delay—his attendants were anxious to return home. Mr. Edmond, who never liked the country, had grown sickly and low-spirited. Buys himself began to be doubtful of his own safety; and all the felt or dreaded mischiefs were imputed to the venerable saint, although he had previously warned them, and left it to their own choice to accompany him. "As for me," said the heroic man, "I know when I entered this country, I entered it having the sentence of death in myself, that I should not trust in myself, but in God who raiseth the dead." The psalm which they read in course on the evening when their troubles were at their height, was the thirty-fourth.

Next day, the king, upon being remonstrated with by Buys, candidly confessed that he had acted wrong. He had married a third wife, and the festivals in which he had been engaged had been the cause of the neglect. "But now," said he, "let Tink-hanna, the name he had given Vanderkemp, take the field which is on the other side of the Keisskamma; and let him remain, with free liberty to return to his own country when he pleases,—I shall never attempt to injure him; and should he at any time think himself aggrieved, as I am not free from faults or mistakes, I appoint you to judge between me and Tink-hanna, and by your decision, I promise to abide: all my people hear this." They then partook of some dried apples. The king made them the present of a sheep; after which, they departed for their destination.

Travelling in a barbarous country, along untrodden paths patrolled by beasts of prey, and liable to the accidents a carriage is exposed to in traversing rivers, and woods, and mountains, where there are no formed roads, tries both the courage and the patience of a man. They had scarcely reached the summit of the first mountain, when the shaft of their wagon gave way, and they had all to wait, under a heavy shower of rain, till they got it repaired; but they had not proceeded far, when Valentine drove the fore-wheel against a thorn tree, and again broke the shaft to pieces. They despatched him with a horse to a neighbouring kraal, belonging to an aged woman, Appolonia, who had two wagons, to procure a new shaft; but he absconded with the horse, and they were obliged to mend their shattered pole in the best manner they could. During the following night, they lost five of their oxen, and could not proceed. Bruntjee was therefore dispatched to the king to inquire for the oxen; and Mr. Edmond having gone to take a view of the country, the doctor remained. He remarks in his journal: "Being thus left alone with the wagon, I experienced what a faithful friend and sweet companion Jesus was, and I longed for no other company." When Bruntjee returned, he informed them that Gika would not speak to him without a companion. In the afternoon the doctor went to the nearest kraal, where he engaged an interpreter to go with him. In returning in the evening, by mistaking one stream for another, he entirely lost his way, and wandered about in uncertainty, being able to find neither the road back to the kraal, nor forward to the wagon; so was obliged to give it up, and, commending himself to the Lord, lay down, resolved to sleep there; but the wolves gave him no rest; and as he had nothing, no weapons of defence but a Caffre kiri, he got up, and resolved to go straight westward; but the moment he set out, the barking of dogs, heard at a considerable distance, convinced him that he was wrong, and he then returned, directed by their voices. In proceeding, he had to cross a river, which, as he entered, a large kayman, a kind of crocodile, plunged in; then passing through a thick wood, still directed by the sounds, he arrived at old Appolonia's kraal, who sent two men with him to guide him to his tent.

Bruntjee in the morning went with his companion to the king, but returned in the evening from a fruitless embassage, having been afraid to face his majesty. Vanderkemp therefore resolved himself to try what he could effect. He found Gika at home, who received him in a friendly manner; and, when he was beginning to speak, put a piece of roasted meat into his hand, so that the missionary had to exercise his powers of mastication and oratory at the same time. The king expressed his satisfaction that he had brought his complaints before him, and told him the oxen were found, and should be restored,—that he had heard Valentine had left them and stolen his horse; but if such conduct was left unpunished in their country, it was not so in his; he would also inquire after him, force him to carry back the horse, and deliver him into their hands, or punish him himself. Both which promises he punctually fulfilled.

Perfectly satisfied, the missionaries proceeded to take possession of their premises: they were welcomed by a serenade of wolves. As night fell the concert began: cries like the shrieks of women were succeeded by notes like the wailing of children, and these were drowned in loud shouts of laughter, like the boisterous merriment of intoxicated men. Vanderkemp, who suspectsd that the discordant noise proceeded from some Caffre girls of Appolonia's kraal, insulted by Valentine, ran out to assist them, when a simultaneous yelling, resembling the music of cats in their nightly excursions, convinced him of his mistake, and he retired to security and rest.

The spot Gika had assigned them was a beautiful field of grass, in the middle of an amphitheatre of high mountains, round whose base flowed the river Guakesby, a fine stream of excellent water. The lower acclivity was covered by woods of various trees, some more than one hundred feet high. Beyond these natural plantations, pastures of vast extent and of the richest verdure: the primeval forests crowned their tops. Eleven different kraals of Caffres were situated at no great distance.

Dr. Vanderkemp immediately inspected the ground, to find a proper site for a house and garden; and the very day after halting, he and Mr. Edmond began by cutting trees and other materials to prepare for building. Having procured the assistance of some Caffres, he dug a little ground, sowed lettuce and carrots, and planted red currants and potatoes; he also introduced calabashes, melons, cucumbers, and pumpkins.

While proceeding with these novel improvements, they learned that several of the border colonists had been involved in ruin, had had their houses burned, and all their cattle driven away. Among the rest, Piet Prinslo, who had fled for refuge to Caffraria, and had been seized as a spy by the king,—the very character he had falsely accused the missionaries of assuming. Several deserters also were forced to flee beyond the bounds of the colony, and one of them (Thomas Bently) informed Dr. Vanderkemp, that four had been hired by the colonists to way-lay and assassinate him; —such was their terror lest the Caffres should be enlightened. The Caffres have no great liking for salt; in lieu of this, to us necessary article, they roll their steaks in cow-dung, and thus broil them. Dr. Vanderkemp, who did not much admire this substitute, set out with Thomas, and having explored the coast, fixed upon a spot for erecting salt-pans; but having neither shoes, stockings, nor hat, his head and feet were severely lacerated in the excursion,—a species of voluntary penance, however, which is not to be numbered among this excellent man's virtues.

At his return, he found a letter from Governor Dundas, expressing his fears for his safety, and offering him his choice, either to labour among some other tribes of Caffres on the near side of the river, or to become pastor of a Dutch church within the colony. He could not bear to give up the idea of missionary among the heathen; but as Mr. Edmond, whose primary object had been to labour in India, had an invincible dislike to continue in Caffraria, he proposed accompanying him so far, in order to have an interview with the governor. When he applied, however, to Gika for permission to leave the country, the king allowed Mr. Edmond to depart, but said,—"If the governor wishes to speak to Tinkhanna, he may speak to him when he comes to speak to me." Intrepid as Dr. Vanderkemp was, he could not without tears part from his young friend. They went into a wood together, and there, with weeping and prayers, they had their last interview. The old man recommended him affectionately to the grace of the Lord, gave him his best blessing, and took a final leave never again to meet on earth. The memorandum in his journal is inexpressibly tender:—"I went upon a hill and followed his wagon for about half an hour with my eyes, when it sinking behind the mountains, I lost sight of him to see him no more!"

Left alone, distressed and dejected, he found his comfort in his work, and that very night he had the hope, that when speaking in the fulness of his heart from Eccles. iii. 10., a subject his own case had suggested, that his sermon was blessed to two poor ignorant Hottentot women. He was still further encouraged and strengthened, when within a few days Piet Prinslo came and attended divine worship, and seemed deeply impressed by what had been spoken. The king, too, entered his tent during the time they were at prayer, and after it was finished, said to Buys,—"He imagined one time or other he should be a Christian." In the evening, he supped in the missionary tent, and after he had regaled himself plentifully with the milk and the mutton, he threw himself down at the back of Vanderkemp, and prepared for sleep; but as soon as he perceived them at their evening's devotions, he rose, and with reverence, if not with understanding, joined them.

An appearance of a settlement and an assemblage of people, seems to have attracted the attention of the wolves, who visited the premises in troops and in solitary pairs. Their howlings were less to be dreaded than their silence. In the darkness of night they approached without observation, and sometimes were admitted within the precincts of the cattle fold, without suspicion, as the dogs of the inhabitants. Frequently does Dr. Vanderkemp acknowledge with gratitude his deliverance from these ravenous animals. At one time two came so near, that he had almost caressed them as his own domestics; at another, they carried off a shirt and the leg of an ox from his tent door. The tiger-wolf was very audacious, of which the missionary journal gives several specimens. A huge animal of this species having seized a sucking calf near the missionary tent, the mother ran to its rescue. The ravener resisted, when a number of kine ran to the aid of their friend, and forced the depradator to let go its prey. The thief, when killed, measured five feet from the snout to the tail, which was not above six inches. Another laid hold on a calf by the foot; and when a general turn out was made to retrieve the captive, a second came up as an auxiliary, and the two fought a short battle, and, but for numbers, would have overcome their assailants. Repeatedly the straps and cordage of the tents were destroyed by these beasts, who almost every night contrived to catch hold of at least one sheep.

Yet the savage men were more to be dreaded than the savage animals. Often were their lives in danger; and their safety can be attributed to nothing but the superintending Providence of God. Among many instances of the refugees who fell victims to their treachery, the case of Bota may serve as an example. It must, however, again be repeated, that the villany of the colonists led the way to the descent of the Caffres. Bota, who had wished to return to his home, after much solicitation, received the reluctant acquiescence of Gika, who gave him a guide to conduct him and his family to the border. The party had scarcely proceeded one day's journey, when they were ordered to stop. They did so, and a Caffre requested Bota's knife, which he gave him. This appears to have been the appointed sign; for instantly a number of other Caffres started up from behind the bushes, and threw their assagais at him. The first pierced his side, and was drawn out by Mrs. Bota; the next he pulled out himself; but the savages advancing, thrust him repeatedly through the body, and he sunk lifeless into the arms of his wife. They then burned his wagon, and took possession of his cattle, which they brought to Gika. The king disapproved of the action, but kept the spoil.

Several conspiracies were formed against the life of Vanderkemp, who was advised by Mr. Buys, a Dutch refugee colonist, to quit that part of the country; but he had determined not to leave the station in which he believed Providence had placed him, without a decided necessity. On another occasion, he mentions, that Mr. Buys and his associates, being informed that the Caffres intended to kill them, came to him in great terror; "but I found," he adds, "that God comforted me in a remarkable manner. I viewed Jesus to be the king of the heathens, who were not able to touch me, without his will; in which I was enabled to acquiesce by his grace, and I slept this night in the arms of his love in peace and safety, while they spent it in great fear and trouble."

But perhaps the most dangerous plot was one of the king's against him. Gika had ordered them to break up their settlement,—with which they complied, and approached nearer the Debe, where he said he wished them to remain. Here the king came to them, and about fifty Caffres and Hottentots with him,—having only a single kiri, or assagai, in their hands; but about two hundred more lay round about the place, completely armed, and ready to execute any of his commands. He told Mr. Bays that the Hottentots had induced him to treat them as his enemies, who had formed some mischievous scheme against him; but by their coming to him so readily, he was now convinced this accusation must be untrue. It turned out, however, that this pretext was entirely false, and that he really had intended to destroy them, though for the present he had suspended the execution of his plan; and one of his captains upbraided him openly before Dr. Vanderkemp with his treachery.

A more gratifying circumstance occurred a few days after. In going to Appolonia's kraal, he had the pleasure of hearing Piet Prinslo, his former enemy, engaged in preaching the gospel to some Gonka Hottentots. He had been brought under strong impressions while hearing a sermon of Dr. Vanderkemp, and now requested him to continue the same subject, while he acted as interpreter. His hearers seemed to feel the importance of the truths delivered, and he wished to remain among them, but Gika refused him permission; and, leaving the Debe, he halted at the river Keisskamma.

Here Mr. Buys left, on a journey to the colony, and carried letters from him to his friends; and here he was visited by several Hottentots who understood Dutch, to whom he spoke of the word of life, and prayed with them; and of some he began to have good hopes: in particular, one named Sarah, who, on this account, became an object of contempt to her neighbours, and to whom the following incident relates. She was in great distress for want of food, having killed and eaten her last cow. The missionary, in order that he might relieve her, requested one of the colonists to sell him two sheep; but he, suspecting the purpose for which they were intended, refused to part with one, until he knew how they were to be disposed of. Dr. Vanderkemp then represented to him the miserable condition of the poor woman, when he flatly refused to sell him the sheep; and the Doctor endeavoured to comfort her, by showing the providential care of God for his people. Knowing, however, that her wants were urgent, he next day offered her some old iron, that she might try and obtain from the Caffres some corn or a cow; but she told him that unexpectedly the colonist had sent to let her know that thirteen of his sheep had tumbled over a precipice and were killed, and that she might now go and take them. Thus she received not only a supply of food, but also of skins for covering to herself and her little ones.

Not long after this, some woman told her instructor that she incessantly prayed to Jesus that he might reveal himself to her soul, and teach her what she ought to know. His remarks on this show the intense zeal with which he was inspired: "This filled my heart with joy; and I prayed the Lord that it might please him to accompany the unworthy efforts of his vile servant with the influences of his Spirit. And, Oh! how did my soul rejoice that the Lord had given me, in this wilderness, among tigers and wolves, and at such a distance from Christians, a poor heathen woman, with whom I could converse confidentially of the mysteries of the hidden communion with Christ! Oh! that I may not be deceived! Lo! my winter is passed! The voice of a turtle is already heard in the land!"—A few others, chiefly women, were added.

Some English deserters arrived at Keisskamma, while the Doctor abode there, and afforded an example of the little advantage that is to be gained by a residence among savages, even if escaping from military discipline. They had two horses, which the king desired to buy. To this, after considerable reluctance, they consented; but delaying to deliver them, Gika sent twice, and they at length sent the animals to him. He immediately took the horses from them, robbed one of them of his hat, and cut the buttons from their jackets; and when they asked for two of them back, he showed them a tree to hang them on. At which intimation they were glad to flee for their lives. Yet, about the same time, one of two young Caffres, who were watching cattle during a severe night, having been killed by wolves, Gika ordered the person who had sent out the boy to pay to his parents seven cows and two oxen;—so capricious is barbaric justice.

The colonist refugees who still remained in Caffraria, being tortured by fears, which they did not think Gika's character calculated to remove, informed Dr. Vanderkemp of their intention of returning to the colony, and requested him to accompany them. To this he was very averse. If he were to accompany them, he must give up his mission among Gika's Caffres, who would certainly turn his enemies, should he join the colonists in their flight; yet, if he remained, he must part with the heathen belonging to their families, who earnestly requested that he would not leave them helpless, and among whom the work of God began to appear. In addition, he had just received intelligence, that the two missionaries, who were appointed by lot his assistants in Caffre-land, were prevented by the governor from joining him, on account of the very unsettled state of the country, which presented for the time very formidable obstacles to the pursuits of the missionary. His affection for his young converts prevailed; and at last he agreed to set out with the party. He left Caffraria on the 31st December, 1800, after having spent upwards of sixteen months in the country.

Proceeding northward, on the 1st of January they passed a steep mountain, which forms the boundary between Caffraria and the eastern Bushmen, who are the terror of the Caffres; and next day crossed the Goboussi, when Dr. Vanderkemp had a narrow escape. The bed of the river is full of large stones, and the current rapid. His horse being terrified by the noise of the stream, refused to enter it, when he alighted, and endeavoured to force it, leading him by the bridle, but, slipping from the stones, was immersed to the shoulders. By his fall the horse was pulled forward, and advanced upon him, and had nearly trampled him under his feet, when he was extricated from his perilous situation. The company consisted in all of fifty-nine persons, men, women, and children, of various nations and descriptions, with three wagons and a cart, above three hundred cattle, besides goats and sheep, and about twenty-five horses. The numbers of wild beasts in the country were prodigious; and they were exposed to the attacks of the Bushmen, which rendered their situation exceedingly dangerous, as, through dread of exposing themselves to their arrows, they durst not kindle a fire to keep off the lions.

Entering a wood, they encamped near a stream, and rested; and the missionary resumed his regular labours of preaching and instructing the people,—abattis being formed to protect them and their cattle. Three of their people, two Hottentots and a Caffre, however, departed from their entrenchment, and ran away, carrying five horses with them. They were found next morning, all three, at no great distance, barbarously murdered by the Bushmen, who appeared in great numbers, whistling and shouting. Considering their present unsafe situation, the travellers moved two days' journey across a vast plain, and encamped on the right bank of a large and deep river, in a fertile field of excellent grass, and different eatable roots. Here the doctor baptized two women, with their families, and despatched a letter to the governor, requesting, that if he still considered it improper to suffer the two missionaries to proceed to Caffre-land, he would allow them to come as far as Turka, where he would endeavour to meet them, and consult about their future operations.

Among the causes which contributed to prevent the civilization of Southern Africa, none operated so powerfully as the conduct of the colonists, both to the heathen within and without the colony. This has been attempted to be denied by some writers; but the undoubted testimony of the missionaries remains uninvalidated. It has been among the advantages which has attended missionary labours, that the characters of these men have been wonderfully improved; and many of the opponents of all schemes for ameliorating the condition of the Hottentots, and numbers of their descendents, are now to be numbered among their supporters. But what they were in 1801, will appear from some schemes of depredation which they formed, even under the eye of the missionary. A disease, which is common in the colony, in the decline of summer, among the horses, was discovered among those belonging to the refugee Boors. Five of them had died, and all were sick. As this disease was not known in Caffraria, they sent the sick to a very high mountain in the neighbourhood. And Dr. Vanderkemp found, upon dissection, that the distemper was inflammation of the intestines, and advised bleeding profusely in the beginning of the disease. On the third day, when they sent to the mountain to bleed the animals, they found them all recovered. But they encountered a more dreadful disaster. The Bushmen came upon them. One Hottentot came running down from the mountain, wounded in several parts of the body. He vomited—was vertiginous, and while he spoke, fell down at Dr. Vanderkemp's feet, and expired. Another was also wounded, who dropped dead before he could reach the camp. Their wounds were only superficial, yet death ensued within a quarter of an hour. These desperate men also killed fourteen horses; these died still sooner of their wounds than the men.

"In this," remarks the doctor in his journal, "the hand of the Lord over-ruling their schemes was very visible. They had intended to penetrate to the Tamboockis, and rob them of their cattle; but the very day fixed for their departure, the Lord sent a sudden mortality among their horses, by which they were forced to lay aside this wicked design, till they could procure fresh ones; for which purpose, they proposed to shoot an elephant, and to send one of their number to Gika with its tusks, as a present, while another, with some English deserters, should follow him into Caffre-land, and steal Gika's horses. As soon as this nefarious plan was settled, the Lord sent a handful of Bushmen to frighten them, and kill almost all the remaining horses. This deterred them from remaining in such a dangerous neighbourhood, and determined them to draw nearer the colony."

Those now under instruction, in the midst of such scenes, were one English brother and three Hottentot sisters, two Hottentot women, not yet baptized, two Christian boys, two Bastard boys, and four Bastard girls, one Tambooki boy, one Caffre girl, one Hottentot boy, and three Hottentot girls; in all twenty.

From this place he sent a letter to Mr. Vanderwalt requesting a wagon to convey him and baggage to Turka; and continuing their route, entered the territory of the colony, where he was met by Mr. Buys, who brought him a very friendly letter from Mr. Vanderwalt, and information of the arrival of his two missionary companions at Graaf Reinet. Shortly after, the wagon arrived, which conveyed him in a few days to that station. He speaks with gratitude of the desire of the people by the road to hear, and of the opportunities afforded him for preaching the gospel. At some places, whe e he arrived late in the evening, the people came out of their beds; and he continued till midnight expounding the Scriptures. At Graaf Reinet, to his inexpressible joy, he found his brethren Vanderlingen and Read comfortably lodged in a house belonging to the church of the village, and entertained by the commissioner Maynier, who showed them uncommon civilities; and informed Dr. Vanderkemp that a regard for his safety had alone prevented a body of soldiers being sent to Caffraria to seize the emigrant colonists, as he thought that might have been endangered by so violent a step. And he was told afterwards, by some Caffres, who were sent by Gika to the colony, that Buys, who pretended so much friendship, had endeavoured to stir up the king's mind against him, but that the latter had always resisted his designs, and was sorry he had lost him. He also learned that Buys had not only kept the cows which he had refused as the purchase of rain, but had also extorted more cattle from Gika in his name, telling the king, that he could not give so much rain to the country at so low a price!

Shut out for the present from Caffraria, the missionaries sedulously employed themselves among the inhabitants of Graaf Reinet, the slaves, and the neighbouring Hottentots. But here greater and more imminent perils awaited them. By permission of the commissioner, Mr. Maynier, the Hottentots were invited, by the ringing of the bell, to assemble every evening, in the public church, for worship and instruction. And on the first night, when Dr. Vanderkemp preached, about two hundred were present. Immediately, Mr. Read and he began a school for teaching the Hottentots reading and writing; and numbers flocked to the place, not only to obtain instruction, but to escape from the tyranny of the Boors, whose rage was now greatly increased, by these benevolent attempts to elevate the character of these unfortunate people. The consequence was a threatening insurrection. The Boors were, in general, averse to the British government, because they had shown a disposition to favour the despised Hottentots, and patronize the missionaries,—crimes in their eyes for which no protection afforded to themselves could atone. And their dissatisfaction could now be no longer repressed. A number of them, with about three hundred wagons, left their farms, and assembled in arms at Zwagershoek, murmuring against the instruction of the heathen. All was alarm. The inhabitants of Graaf Reinet were told that they intended to come and burn the village; and many of the nearest inhabitants of the country fled from their homes. When Mr. Jacobs was sent to inquire the reason of their conduct, they alleged some aggressions of the Caffres; but their chief complaints were the treatment of the Hottentots, their admission into the church, their instruction in reading and writing, and religion, which seemed to admit them to an equality in the scale of rational existence with themselves,—an idea not once to be endured. They, at the same time, most unwarrantably charged government with having protected the Hottentots and Caffres, and encouraged them to rob them.

As the insurgents approached, the inhabitants were afraid lest they should fall upon the village while they were at church, and therefore they attended divine service in arms; but several of the whites showed openly their disaffection. The commissioner's whole force consisted of one officer and twenty-one light dragoons, eighty armed Hottentots, nineteen Pandours, four pieces of ordnance, and a few inhabitants to work them. The rebels, whose numbers report had greatly exaggerated, did not much exceed three hundred, advancing on horseback, halted about gunshot from the village, and sent a messenger to the commissioner, whose troops were in array, and prepared to meet them. He ordered them to lay down their arms, and state their complaints, which he was ready to settle with them in a peaceable manner. They refused the first condition; and as for the second, they complained of the admission of the Hottentots into the church, and desired that the seats should be washed, the pavement broken up, the pulpit covered with black cloth, as a demonstration of mourning, and the church-yard fenced by a stone wall. They also demanded that those Hottentots who had murdered their relations, should be delivered into their hands. The missionaries immediately signified their readiness to retire with their heathen from the church, and to meet at another house, where the colonists might have access when they chose; but Dr. Vanderkemp, who had been twice requested to accept of the charge, assured him that he would never preach in a church from which the heathen congregation were excluded. The commissioner then consented to exclude the heathen from the church, which they might purify as they pleased; and that those Hottentots whom they could point out as murderers, should be arrested and tried according to the laws of the country, but not given into the hands of their accusers without any proof of their crime.

Towards evening, Mr. Lyndon, commander of the troops, desired the rebels to withdraw to a certain distance from the village, and send in their resolution next morning. They accordingly withdrew; but in the morning returned to their former ground, whence they returned for answer, that they were not at all satisfied with Mr. Maynier's propositions, but would procure themselves redress by those means which they had in their power. Mr. Lyndon sent them notice, that he agreed to allow them till one o'clock to come to an amicable arrangement with the commissioner; but declared, so soon as that time had elapsed, he would attack them. Upon this, the inhabitants of the village laid down their arms, declaring they would not fight against their countrymen. The Hottentots were resolute for the fight, and marched out with great spirit. The missionaries had resolved to stay at home and unite in prayer; but seeing their Hottentots departing, they followed unarmed. After some hostile demonstrations, the rebels sent, requesting three days to deliberate; but Mr. Lyndon refused, and assured them he would attack at the stipulated time; upon which they moved off, saying they meant to return again, to see if Mr. Maynier had performed his promises.

As the field-commander, Vanderwalt, one of the chiefs of the rebels, had always expressed the greatest friendship for Dr. Vanderkemp, he wrote him a letter, but received no answer; and within three days the rebels again advanced. He therefore, at the request of Mr. Maynier, who wished to avoid bloodshed, went out to the insurgents to try if he could act as mediator. He found them, at half an hour's distance placed behind a hill, on whose summit their advanced guard, of about forty horse, was posted. They received him in a friendly manner, and told him they were not assembled to commit any violence, but only to deliberate on their present circumstances. They said they would be content with the proposals of Mr. Maynier, and signify to him personally, if they could depend upon his promises, and that their former steps should be forgiven. Of this he assured him in the strongest terms: and when they expressed their fears, that if they sent any of their number to Graaf Reinet they would be killed, he offered to remain himself as a hostage for their safety. His magnanimous exertions were crowned with success; the two rebel chiefs, Henry Ronsburg and John Vanderwalt, accompanied him to the commissioners, where, for the present, an amicable arrangement was agreed upon.

Amid this hostile bustle the missionaries pursued unweariedly their peaceful occupations, and had the pleasure to observe that their exertions were not in vain. Inquirers increased; and the children of the school became so numerous that they printed a spelling table for their use, whilst they prepared a more complete introductory book. Their conduct and principles had inspired so much respect, that a chief of the wandering Hottentots, Klaas Stuurman, or Nicolas the Helmsman, famous for his exploits in behalf of his countrymen, sent them a request to come and settle at Zwartkop's river, that he and his people might be told the good news about Christ; but as their hands were at the time sufficiently employed, and they still looked anxiously forward to Caffreland, they declined compliance.

About the end of the year, Gika sent two Caffres to inform commissioner Maynier, that, in compliance with his proposals, he was willing to come into the colony, in order to have a personal intercourse with him, if Tink-hanna would come and conduct him to Graaf Reinet. He, accordingly, accompanied by Mr. Read, immediately set out for Caffraria, on the borders of which Gika had promised to wait for them; but, upon their arrival, they found he had departed and was gone farther into the country, whither they followed. "His majesty" received them kindly, but excused himself from accompanying them to the colony, as his circumstances would not permit him to leave his own land. He said, however, he should be happy if they felt inclined to live again in his country; that he himself was willing to receive instruction, and such of his people as were not disposed to follow his example, might let it alone. He expressed his desire of maintaining peace with the colony; and complained strongly of the conduct of the Boors who had emigrated. Having received several presents, he offered to exchange a cow for a dog belonging to one of the Hottentots;—which being agreed to, Dr. Vanderkemp observed to him, that it was an old dog, without teeth, and good for nothing. He replied, he liked the dog, and would give in return a cow without teeth! He sent, however, a young cow and a calf, with an ox, as a present to the commissioner's son, and a cow for food. They then separated, Gika for his mother's habitation, and the embassy returned to the colony. Thus ended the first attempt to evangelize the Caffres, which, although apparently of no great immediate success, yet prepared the way for future missionaries, and was thus productive of much subsequent advantage.

Four days did they travel through the border district, which before the present disturbance had been reckoned the most fertile and populous part of the colony, but was now a land of desolation, and without inhabitants. When they halted at the farm of a friendly peasant, Gerrit Koetze, they found him also much dejected, and preparing to leave the country. Vanderkemp, whose feeling soul had been torn with anguish, almost from the day he entered the interior, at beholding the degraded state and cruel usage of the Hottentots by the Boors, became their most active and unceasing advocate; and although he fell on the field before the victory was achieved, had the honour of leading the way to the final emancipation of the enslaved aborigines. Upon this occasion, he addressed the farmer and his family with great earnestness and freedom, in a discourse from Rom. xi. 20—22. And told them that he believed firmly the hand of God was heavy upon them for neglecting and opposing the teaching of the heathen living in the midst of them. Next day, he addressed both the family and the heathen, whom he desired to be called in; and before he departed, his friend promised that he would continue with them in family worship.

Calumny and misrepresentation were never more busily employed, than with regard to this good man. While he lived, not only the Boors, but even the best of the people, were strongly prejudiced against him, and represented him to two assistants, who came to labour in the same work, as guilty of the most scandalous enormities, and entirely given over to Satan. The rebels, who were again in arms, seized this opportunity to circulate an address among their countrymen, asserting that his late benevolent visit to Gika was to stir him up against them, and invited them to join the insurrectional troops and march to Graaf Reinet and destroy it; and they made the attempt. At half-past five in the morning, when the venerable missionary went to the water to wash some linen—for even this he had to do for himself—he was surprised to observe a crowd of terrified Hottentot women and children running from their kraals to the barracks; and, looking up, perceived that the rebels had surrounded the village, and were advancing from every quarter. At the same moment, the great guns of the barracks and redoubt opened upon them, and they as briskly returned the fire. A party of them then made their way into the town, and took possession of some houses, but were soon compelled to retire; yet not till a few houses, together with the prison, were involved in flames.

Orders having been given to level one or two others, which formed an obstruction to the operations of the garrison, Dr. Vanderkemp went to the redoubt to obtain their repeal; and both in going and returning, the rebels fired repeatedly at him, but providentially missed. Next morning the rebels returned. Dr. Vanderkemp seized this opportunity of freely expressing his opinion, in a conversation with the commissioner, respecting the state of the Hottentot nation, and urged the injustice of the Hottentots being forced to serve the colonists,—that they should be equally free, and land allotted to them by government, to be held in complete possession,—a poor boon in a country their forefathers called their own. But the possession of the Cape by the British was merely considered as temporary; and, however well inclined, the governors did not deem it proper to venture on this act of justice.

One step, however, and that no unimportant one in its consequences, took place. Dr. Vanderkemp received a letter from Governor Dundas, informing him that he was at liberty to take any piece of ground, in the gift of government, for the erection of a missionary establishment, and expressed a wish to know his opinion on that subject. In name of himself and fellow-witnesses, he replied:—"We were witnesses of the deplorable and wretched condition into which the Hottentot nation is sunk, for want of food, instruction, liberty, useful employments, and a spot which they, under the superintendence of government, might, in some measure call their own home.

"I am speaking of their condition at Graaf Reinet, the very place to which numbers of them, by the present circumstances, are compelled to repair to as an asylum, where they may be nourished at the expense of government, while a still greater number profess to shelter themselves among the Caffres on this side of the great Fish river, against the barbarities of the colonists. Among this number are found the hordes of Klass Stuurman and Ourson, who repeatedly requested me to come to them to instruct them, but constantly refused to settle themselves at or in the proximity of Graaff Reinet. The consequences of such a condition can be no other than idleness, poverty, or enormous expenses to entertain them,—an aversion and actual separation from civilized society,—vices of every kind, which may end in plunder, murder, and irregularities of a different nature, but all tending to reverse the happiness and usefulness of that nation, and the safety of the colony.

"These reflections have induced us to suspend for a while our missionary attempts among the Caffres and Bushmen, and to devote ourselves to the instruction of the Hottentots in this village, that we might be made instrumental to afford them spiritual blessings, till it should please the Lord, by sending us a sufficient number of missionary brethren for our help, to enable us to re-establish the Caffre mission, and for an establishment near the great river, for the use of the Bushmen. And though it was not in our power to alleviate the temporal calamities of the Hottentots, we hoped and trusted that the Lord would, in his own time, open a way to answer also in this respect our ardent wishes.

"This seems, in the way of Providence, to have been reserved for you, sir; and it is with thanksgiving to God, and of acknowledgment of my obligations to your excellency, that I proceed to submit my ideas, and those of my brother Read, (Vanderlingen being absent,) after having consulted Mr. Maynier, to your excellency's decision.

"1st, It appears to us desirable that our missionary settlement should be formed between the Bushmen river and Algoa bay, at a moderate distance from Fort Frederic; and if a proper supply of water may be procured there, which for the present is doubtful, on the banks of the Sundy river.

"2d, The chief object and aim of the missionaries, under whose direction this settlement shall be established, ought to be to promote the knowledge of Christ and the practice of real piety, both by instruction and example, among the Hottentots and other heathen, who shall be admitted and formed into a regular society; and, in the second place, the temporal happiness and usefulness of this society, with respect to the country at large.

"3d, Into this society those only ought to be admitted who will engage themselves to live according to the rules of its institution.

"4th, The actual admission into and expulsion from this society, shall entirely depend upon the judgment of the missionaries; but it seems necessary, that of those who shall have lived in the families of colonists, none shall be considered admissible but such as shall procure a written declaration of their admissibility, signed by the landrost of the district where they have lived.

"5th, As we by no means wish to counteract, but, on the contrary, to promote as much as possible, the labours of our Moravian brethren, we are resolved not to admit any individual belonging to their institution, unless it be with their express permission, and at their request. We hope to be equally cautious in respect to other missionary institutions which may in future times be formed within this colony.

"6th, As we are of opinion, that the rule laid down by Paul,—'That if any man would not work, neither should he eat,' ought to be strictly observed in every Christian society, our intention is to discourage idleness and laziness, and to have the individuals of our institution, as much as circumstances will admit, employed in different useful occupations, for the cultivation of their rational faculties, or exercise of the body, as means of subsistence, and of promoting the welfare of this society, and the colony at large. These occupations may be referred either to agriculture or farming, the management of cattle, or mechanical arts, and little manufactories, e. g. soap-boiling, candle-making, spinning of thread, manufactories of paper, tanning, pot-making, brick-making, turning, &c.

"7th, As the introduction of these employments will involve the European missionary societies in considerable expenses, the workmen should be considered as journeymen in the service of the Society, and be paid weekly for their labour; but the products of their labour should be the property of the Society, and sold for its benefit. The fund, however, arising from the sale of these articles, shall be entirely devoted for charitable institutions of a missionary nature, among the heathen, e. g. the erection of other missionary settlements, an orphan house, in which abandoned and fatherless children may be educated, or the subsistence of the sick, old, or poor. By these measures we intend not to preclude any one who, by his industry and diligence shall be enabled to elevate himself above the class of journeyman, from becoming a master and proprietor in his own business.

"8th, Should the settlement, which is to be put under the direction of two missionaries and a school-master, increase to a greater number than can be directed by three missionaries and two school-masters, it appears better to divide it into two distinct settlements, to be placed in different parts of the country, than to extend it beyond the limits mentioned.

"9th, Good order and domestic discipline is to be maintained by the missionaries themselves. The settlers are to be divided as Christians, catechumens, and hearers. By the last we understand heathen, who will flock to us to hear the word of God. By catechumens, heathen who are more particularly under our inspection and care, instructed in the doctrines of the gospel, and submit to ecclesiastical discipline. Christians are those who bring forth fruits of conversion, and be by baptism instituted as members of the church.

"10th, We have no severer punishment than excommunication from the church, and expulsion from the society. If we shall be compelled to proceed to this last step, we shall think it our duty to acquaint the landrost of the district with the case. Should any of the settlers be accused of a crime against the laws of the country, we shall think it likewise our duty to inform the landrost of the fact, that justice may be administered by the court to whose cognizance the crime belongs; and no malefactor shall find a shelter within our walls.

"11th, As your excellency cannot be indifferent with respect to the state and progress of the institution, we suppose that it will please your excellency to accept at least once a year a report of its state in detail, by a list, pointing out the number, names, qualities, occupations, and other circumstances of the members, according to a model which shall be approved by your excellency.

"12th, Our ideas respecting the polygamy of the heathen exactly correspond with those of the Moravian brethren.

"13th, As to the protection which we may expect from your excellency, we entirely trust to your excellency's declared resolution to favour our missionary exertions, and request that we may enjoy the same protection and privileges which are granted to the brethren in the Bavian's Kloof. The state of our congregation, formed out of Hottentots, and a few of other nations at Graaf Reinet, is such that it shall be necessary to leave an individual missionary in that village, for the instruction of those who shall, by their circumstances, be constrained to reside at this place. The number of children in our reading school amounts to one hundred and twelve, of whom, however, seldom more than seventy are present. We have been obliged to print a spelling-book for their use, and we hope that your excellency will permit us to print and to sell little school-books, for the benefit of the future establishment, and to educate some of our young men in the art of printing, as a peculiar branch of their employment.

"The commissioner Maynier favours our undertaking here with all his power, and has given us a place to build an hall upon, which may serve for a meeting-house, school-room, and a dwelling-place for the missionary."

General Dundas, whose liberal and enlightened views accorded with those of the missionaries, immediately transmitted the following letter of approval.

"Sir,—I have only time, by the present opportunity, to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, dated Nov. 11, containing some heads of a plan of a Hottentot establishment, which I am desirous to encourage, seeing the necessity of endeavouring to ameliorate the spiritual and temporal condition of those unhappy people, whom, upon every principle of humanity and justice, government is bound to protect.

"I have only to add, that in my opinion the banks of Loeric, or Van Slade's river, is the preferable situation for their establishment, thinking it by no means advisable to place them in the vicinity of the Caffres.

"The secretary of the colony has this day received my directions to acquaint the landrost with my wishes upon this subject, being extremely anxious that this plan should be carried into effect as soon as possible, and the Hottentots moved towards their proposed establishment without delay, where every reasonable assistance at the outset, to enable them hereafter to provide themselves with provisions and other necessaries, it is my intention to afford them at the expense of the colony.

"In expectation of hearing again from you upon the subject of this praiseworthy and benevolent undertaking, together with such particulars relative to it as you may think it necessary to give, I have, &c. (Signed) Francis Dundas."

Not content, however, with one letter, his excellency, fully sensible of the vast importance, repeatedly, within the short space of a month, urged the immediate commencement of the undertaking; and he even anticipated the proposals of the missionaries, by sending a ship laden with rice and other necessary articles to Algoa bay. Neither were they, on their part, slack in the business. Mr. Read was immediately sent to Algoa bay, to inspect the country, and to choose a proper spot for the settlement, while Dr. Vanderkemp remained to make the final arrangements for quitting Graaf Reinet. By the laws or customs of the Cape, slaves could not be baptized without the permission of their masters, who were not permitted to sell any Christian; in consequence of which, the missionaries had not been allowed to baptize some of whose belief of the gospel they had no doubt, particularly two, Cupido, who had already shown himself a zealous preacher among his fellows, and Susanna, whose conduct and knowledge were worthy of her profession. With these Dr. Vanderkemp, before leaving, partook of the Lord's-supper, against which there was no law. Before they left, however, they had an opportunity of contrasting the liberality of some of the professing Christians there with the generosity of British soldiers. The church-council gave the missionaries notice to quit a house they had hired of the church, as soon as possible; which, when Major Sherlock and some of a detachment which had come to reinforce the garrison, heard, they waited upon Dr. Vanderkemp, and said—"These men have ordered you to give up the house, because they are embittered against you on account of the heathen; they know that you will not find in all this place a room convenient for keeping meetings and a school for the Hottentots; and by that means they suppose you will be forced to give up instructing them. We will hire the house for one quarter, but will make no other use of it than to beg you to stay and keep school in it as long as you think proper, and we will pay the rent." He thanked the gentlemen for their extraordinary kindness, but as they were badly lodged, and he had procured a place which could answer his purpose, declined their handsome offer.

Their preparations being completed, the missionaries, Vanderkemp and Read, departed from Graaf Reinet on the 20th of February, with one hundred and nine Hottentots, leaving Mr. Vanderlingen at the place, with forty under his care. During the four first days of their march, their number increased to two hundred and twenty-one, but when about half way. Captain Weddeman, with forty of his Hottentots left them. This loss was partly repaired by sixteen wanderers, whom they found among the mountains: but on their arrival at Zwartkop's river, Klaas Stuurman induced a hundred of their people to follow him, by reporting that there was an assemblage of Boors at a farm they had to pass, wanting to intercept and destroy them. This farm was the only one between Gamtoo's river and Zwartkop which had escaped the vengeance of that formidable captain; and it he was advancing to attack. When reasoned with by the missionaries, he replied he was determined to revenge himself on the Boors for their barbarous treatment of his people, till government could or would do him justice: adding, "We are blind heathens and know nothing, and in this state the Boors wish to keep us."

Of the whole number who set out with them, only seventy-eight arrived at Algoa bay, March 7. The officer commanding Fort Frederick, who had only general instructions, put them in possession of Bota's farm, seven miles west from the fort, and three miles from the bay. "Whether we shall stay here," say they in their journal, "or have another place given us, is quite uncertain, though the former appears the most probable. We have requested it, as its vicinity to the bay is the only objection we have: but this has its advantages. Want of water seemed at first a great obstacle, but by digging wells we find this want amply supplied. The number of people, from those who have joined us at the bay, now amounts to about one hundred and sixty; but we have every reason to expect a great increase. The governor has engaged to supply us with provisions for the first year, after which he hopes they will be able, from industry, to provide for themselves."

Besides abundance of grass, timber, and limestone, the missionaries found on the farm a dwelling-house of three rooms, another fit for a church and school, and a third, which they turned into a printing office. To each of the settlers they gave eight hundred square paces of land, to build a house and make a kitchen garden. Their mode of instruction, which they immediately began, was—Every morning and evening a meeting in the school for worship, in which a chapter of the Scriptures was read and explained. Twice a day they met for lessons in reading and writing. On Wednesdays and Saturdays the natives were catechised, afternoon and evening. They had not, however, long resided in their new situation, till they found a very important drawback from their advantages. The people became subject to intermittent agues, and other diseases,—the effects of stagnated water in their neighbourhood. Dr. Vanderkemp was among the sufferers; and an ague was followed by severe rheumatism, which confined him to bed for eleven months. But the energies of his mind were not weakened; and in circumstances the most trying, he showed that the spirit of a man could sustain his infirmities.

Employed in promoting the spiritual benefit of the colonists, he was unwearied in likewise seeking their temporal advantage; and, had his counsels been followed, the interior would soon have assumed the lively appearance of a well cultivated field, and a happy and peaceful population. He stood high in the estimation of the heathen: the Boors expressed their respect for his talents, by the unrelenting hatred they bore him. General Dundas, who was fully aware of his importance, employed him to negotiate with the hostile tribes; and he persuaded Klaas Stuurman to declare for peace, and accept of the advantageous offers made him by government; which offended some of the other chiefs of the plundering Hottentots so much, that they not only attacked Klaas, deprived him of his people, cattle, and arms, but also threatened the missionaries, as the authors of his desertion. Stuurman fled to Conga, a chief of the Caffres, on this side of the Great Fish river, who gave him shelter, and informed Dr. Vanderkemp that he approved of the captain's conduct.

Meanwhile, the governor had caused a strong detachment of colonists, commanded by the famous Tjaard Vanderwalt, to be marched into this region against the plundering Caffres and Hottentots,—after he had issued a proclamation, that those who would leave the plundering tribes and go to Graaf-Reinet, Fort Frederick, or into the institution at Bota, should have protection and freedom. The detachment, however, attacked promiscuously the Caffres and Hottentots on this side of the Great Fish river. Looking upon this as pernicious to the rest of the colony, Dr. Vanderkemp gave his sentiments upon it with boldness; and wrote both to governor Dundas and the fiscal, Van Ryneveldt, that, according to his opinion, if the detachment proceeded in that manner, and were not recalled in time, it would occasion its own destruction, and that of all the colony. He urged also that Klaas Stuurman should be protected, and the promises made to him in the name of government fulfilled.

But it appeared from the answers he received from the governor, that he was prejudiced against that chief by his enemies, and suspected him of falsehood and fraud. The missionaries were also described by the colonist as men who favoured the plundering Hottentots and Caffres—maintained a connexion with them which was dangerous to the good inhabitants—and caused their institution to be a place of refuge for robbers and murderers. "The truth was," say the missionaries, "we never had had a connexion with any of the plundering hordes; but that we took into our institution those who separated themselves from these herdes, and who, from aversion to their former behaviour, came daily to us to hear the word of God, and to conduct themselves peaceably, according to our rules."

The consequence, however, of these misrepresentations was, that they received an order from government, prohibiting them from receiving more Hottentots, or entering into any connexion with the tribes at the Sondag river. By this order they were, to their great sorrow, forced to refuse many of these unfortunate people shelter, principally women and children, who yet chose rather to maintain themselves in the woods, among the brutes, than to return to their tribes.

Notwithstanding the manner in which their benevolent efforts were repaid, they did not remit them. They admonished Klaas Stuurman not to take any part in the hostilities between the farmers and Hottentots, and to convince the governor and his own enemies of his good faith by such behaviour. His reply was noble: he declared, "He would rather suffer injustice than break his word!" Barrow had an interview with this chief, and he represents him in a light equally favourable. On meeting a band of wandering Hottentots, he inquired the cause of their hostile appearance, when "one of them, named Klaas Stuurman, or Nicolas the Helmsman, whom they had selected for their chief, stepped forward, and after humbly entreating us to hear him out without interruption, began a long oration, which contained a history of their calamities and sufferings under the yoke of the Boors: their injustice in first depriving them of their country, and then forcing their offspring into a state of slavery: their cruel treatment on every slight occasion, which it became impossible for them to bear any longer: and the resolution they had therefore taken, to apply for redress before the Englsh troops should leave the country: that their employers, suspecting their intention, had endeavoured to prevent such application, by confining some to the house, threatening to shoot others if they attempted to escape, or to punish their wives and children in their absence. And in proof of what he advanced, he called out a young Hottentot, whose thigh had been pierced through with a large musket ball, but two days before, which had been fired at him by his master, for having attempted to leave his service. 'This act,' continued he, 'among many others equally cruel, resolved us at once to collect a sufficient force to deprive the Boors of their arms, at which we have succeeded at every house which fell in our way. We have taken their superfluous cloths in lieu of the wages due for our services; but we have stripped none, nor injured the persons of any, though,' added he, shaking his head, 'we have yet a great deal of our blood to avenge!'"

Mr. Barrow proposed that Stuurman and his people should enter the British service, but stated a difficulty respecting the manner in which provision must be made for the aged the women, and the children. "Restore us," said the chief, "the country of which our fathers have been despoiled by the Dutch, and we have nothing more to ask." "I endeavoured," continues Barrow, "to convince him how little advantage they were likely to derive from the possession of a country, without any other property, or the means of deriving a subsistence from it; but he had the better of the argument. 'We lived very contentedly,' said he, 'before the Dutch plunderers molested us, and why should we not do so again, if left to ourselves? Has not the Groot Baas (Great Master) given plenty of grass, roots, and berries, and grasshoppers for our use; and, till the Dutch destroyed them, abundance of wild animals to hunt? and will not they return and multiply when these destroyers are gone?" We prevailed upon Klaas to deliver up their arms, and, in the meantime to follow the troops until some arrangement could be made for their future welfare."

When Mr. Barrow and his military escort arrived at Algoa bay, he found the Boors with their families, amounting to one hundred and fifty, under the protection of the Fort; and their opponents, the Hottentots, to the number of five hundred, encamped on the open plain. His attempt to reconcile them was rendered abortive by the rebel Boors, who caused a report to be circulated among them, that the English intended to put them on board ship, and carry them to Cape-Town. Alarmed at which, many of the Hottentots fled, and sought refuge among the Caffres; and, uniting with that body who had renounced the authority of Gika, and were already exasperated against the Boors, they soon overran the whole district of Graaf Reinet, seizing the cattle, and burning the houses of the colonists,—many of whom paid the forfeit of their former brutality with their lives. Having defeated the Boors in the district of Uitenhage, and chased them to the Chamtoos River, they were met at Lochenberg's place by another body of colonists, commanded by Vanderwalt, where they obtained another victory, killed the leader, and dispersed his troops. Their progress to Cape-Town was only stopped by a body of British troops in conjunction with the colonists of Swellendam, who drove them back towards Algoa bay, where they seem to have separated into predatory bands.

In the midst of these distractions, the situation of the missionaries at Bota was extremely critical, as, besides the hatred of the farmers, they had now incurred the suspicions of the plundering Hottentots, who, averse to peace with the colonists, thought those their enemies who advised conciliation. Governor Dundas assisted them as much as in his power—he not only took care that they should not want for provisions, but supplied them with seed, corn, farming utensils, and whatever he thought would be necessary to forward the institution. But news had reached the Cape of the Peace of Amiens, and he was now preparing to leave the country.

Before doing so, he paid a visit to Algoa bay; and Dr. Vanderkemp being confined to bed, he kindly went to see him at Bota's place, to inquire what he could do to ensure their safety, as circumstances compelled him to transport the garrison from Fort Frederick to the Cape. He expressed his approbation of their proceedings, and promised to recommend them to the Dutch governor, who was soon expected. A few days after, he sent to the missionaries, expressing his wish to see Dr. Vanderkemp once more, or if he was unable to come, Mr. Read; but the Doctor caused himself to be carried on his bed, and had a parting interview with the governor. His excellency pressed them to remove with their institution into the fortress; but this they found themselves constrained to refuse: on which he urged them to go with him to the Cape, and defer their labours among the Hottentots till more favourable times. To this Vanderkemp replied, "That he hoped to remain faithful to the calling to which God had called him: that even if he knew he could save his life by leaving his flock, he would not fear to offer it for the least child among them;" and mentioned also what a powerful preserver God had already been to them. Mr. Read was equally devoted, and the governor desisted from further repeating the subject; but he left them as a present six thousand pounds of rice, six casks of salt beef, two hundred sheep, fifty-nine labouring oxen, eleven milch cows, ninety-six horned cattle, three wagons, a fish-net, a corn-mill, two corn-sieves, and a pair of smith's bellows, besides several agricultural implements.

Hardly eight days elapsed after the departure of the British, when a troop of plundering Hottentots attacked Bota's place at midnight, fired about fifty shots into the settlement, and drove away the whole of their cattle. To every friendly advance they replied by firing; and when one of the Hottentots spoke kindly to them, they cried,—"There comes a peace-maker—kill him—shoot him!" and he received a ball through his leg. Not content with their cattle, they meditated the murder of the inhabitants; and for this purpose assaulted their dwellings in Caffrarian method, by driving their oxen in front. But, fortunately, Mr. Read had laid some newly sawed plank in the passage between the houses, at which the animals took fright, and turned aside, leaving their drivers exposed. Compelled by self-defence, the Hottentots of the institution fired, but at random in the dark. One ball, however, directed by an unerring hand, wounded the chief in the thigh, and cut the artery through. The violent effusion of blood put an end to his life in a few minutes, and the assailants fled, leaving behind them all the cattle, except eighteen which had been driven away in the beginning of the attack. In the morning, the dead body was found, and recognized as that of Andrus Stuurman, the brother of Klaas. Such, however, was the general regard the Caffres had for Dr. Vanderkemp and the missionaries, that when Stuurman's troop returned, they put three of them to death for their conduct; and it was with difficulty Klaas escaped, although he had no hand in the business.

Next night, the institution was again surrounded by the plunderers, who, finding the cattle secured, and the place barricaded, withdrew; but, two days after, having got a reinforcement of Caffres, they attacked them openly in the middle of the day, as part of the cattle was driven to the pasture,—stabbed one of their wood-cutters,—and drove away the whole. Observing this, the Hottentots of the institution rushed upon them with fury,—put the assailants to flight,—and brought back all the cattle, except eight that had been wounded. The missionaries had always instructed their people that it was not the duty of a Christian to save his goods at the expense of his neighbour's life—that nothing but his own safety, or that of a third person, could authorize killing any one. They could not, however, understand this doctrine; and as their teachers saw that remaining in the open country in its then unsettled state, would lead to bloodshed and the defeat of their object, which was to gain the savages by soft and amiable behaviour, they withdrew the institution into Fort Frederick, till the government should be re-established. In this resolution they were encouraged and assisted by the colonists, who thought they would now make common cause with themselves; but when they found their mistake on this point, and that nothing could induce them to aid or even sanction their conduct towards the Hottentots, they did everything to render their situation uncomfortable, and their labours abortive. Unfortunately, the efforts of their enemies were too successful; and when they could not resort to force, they played a more mischievous game, by seducing the poor natives to the perpetration of vices which, however tolerated among men who call themselves Christians, could not be endured in a missionary establishment. The consequence was, that owing to these and other causes, the number of Hottentots, with their wives and children, which on the 18th of September, 1802, while they remained at Bota's place, amounted to three hundred and one, considerably diminished during their residence in Fort Frederick. But the missionaries add in their journal, that the preaching of the word was accompanied with the power of God's Spirit, and his holy arm revealed itself more and more in the conversion of many; they perceived a more general conviction of sin, and a sincere desire for Jesus Christ, chiefly among the children. "The number of the enlightened increasing," they continue, "we held every Sunday afternoon a particular meeting with them, in which we inquired after the proceedings of the work of grace in their hearts, by familiar conversation. We are, however, obliged to mention, that many who seemed in the beginning very zealous, afterwards returned to a state of indolence and insensibility." Although the Cape had been for some time delivered up to the Dutch, they did not occupy Fort Frederick till April 1803; and till that time, the missionaries remained in it, pursuing as they could their ordinary occupations.

Cruelties of the Boors—their hatred to Dr. Vanderkemp—Cape transferred to the Dutch—General Jansen arrives as governor—Treats the missionaries with kindness—Outrageous proposal of the colonists—Visits Dr. Vanderkemp—Gives him ground for the missionary institution—Has a conference with Klaas Stuurman—Receives ambassadors from the Caffre rebel chiefs—Description of a savage chieftain—Has an interview with the chiefs—Peace concluded between them and the colonists—King Gika, Lichstenstein's account of his appearance and manners—Receives rich presents from the Dutch—Concludes a peace—Conditions—Dr Mist's exertions to regulate the colony, and secure the freedom of the Hottentots—Renewal of the war—De Mist's journeying to Bavian's Kloof, now called Gnadenthal—To other missionary establishments—Accounts of these—His return to Cape-Town.

ANTICIPATING the restoration of the Cape to the Dutch, the Boors in the interior were guilty of the most cruel excesses:

they kidnapped the children of the poor Hottentots, and murdered their parents, and rejoiced in the prospect of soon having them reduced to a state of more abject slavery than ever. They had felt that when roused, or properly disciplined and led, they were not a people to be despised; but the lesson, instead of teaching them wisdom, had only inspired them with revenge. Enraged at all missionary attempts, that under Dr. Vanderkemp was the object of their most peculiar hatred. This philanthropic missionary they persecuted with an almost prophetic virulence, as if they had foreseen that he was mining the bulwarks of their tyranny, and shaking the most stable of its towers. But it so happened that he possessed every qualification that was calculated to render those attempts abortive, under which any ordinary missionary, without a miracle, would have sunk. In addition to his being a man of great superiority of talent, he had been the schoolfellow and the fellow-soldier of General Jansen, who was now appointed the governor of the Cape; and one of the General's first visits was to Algoa bay. As a precursor, he sent a Major Van Gilten with a detachment of the Waldeck Jaggers, to take possession of Fort Frederick. The major's first steps convinced the colonists that they were at least premature in their exultation. He put those who had been most turbulent under arrest, while he treated the venerable Vanderkemp and his brother Read with the utmost politeness. Next to its antipode, oriental despotism, anarchy is perhaps the worst of all tyrannies; and under this, the south-eastern part of the colony had groaned for nearly a twelvemonth. The governor was therefore earnestly pressed to visit it personally, and endeavour to restore something like order. But it so happened in this, as in many other cases, that those who were the authors of the mischief were the first to complain. Scarcely had the new governor arrived, when a deputation of colonists from the disturbed districts appeared, to give him information, and to propose what, were it not placed beyond a doubt, would appear incredible,—that all the Hottentots should be seized,—that every individual among them should have a chain put upon his legs, and that they be distributed among them as slaves! The proposal of course was never listened to, but the representations of the farmers made an unfavourable impression with regard to the Hottentots on Jansen's mind, which never seems to have been wholly effaced. He, however, determined to examine for himself; and as soon as business would permit, he left the Cape on a tour of inspection.

When he arrived at the bay, Mr. Read immediately waited upon him, and apologized for Dr. Vanderkemp, who was confined by sickness; but his excellency waived all ceremony, and visited the missionary in his lowly cottage—reminded him of the scenes of their youthful days—and treated him with mingled tenderness and respect. But notwithstanding the personal esteem General Jansen had for his old friend, when they entered upon the subject of missions, it was soon apparent that the mind of the general had been pre-occupied by the false representations of the enemies of missions. It had been insinuated that a mission to evangelize the Hottentots conducted by Englishmen, was pregnant with danger to the Dutch government of the colony. But Dr. Vanderkemp, in a letter to the directors of the London Missionary Society, says, that he found it an easy matter to convince the brave and philanthropic governor Jansen of the futility of the objection, and to show that the undertaking was entirely separated from all national views and concerns; and that the direction being entirely fixed to spiritual purposes, did not even in the least degree affect, much less relax, the authority which government has a right to exercise over all its subjects, any more than the filial obedience due to a father or tutor infringes the rights of a sovereign over a son, or a pupil residing in his dominions. "But it was not so easy," he adds, "to eradicate the inveterate prejudices against our work among the heathen, out of the stony hearts of more barbarous inhabitants; and it was evident that our relation to English benefactors was only a pretext to give vent to a deeper rooted enmity against God, his Christ, and the extension of his kingdom of love and grace among the heathen." The general was satisfied, and at the same time convinced of the utility of missionary labours; but to avoid offence to the colonists as much as possible, it was agreed that in future Dr. Vanderkemp should correspond with the London Society through the medium of the Dutch Missionary Society.

As it was now necessary for the institution to remove from Fort Frederick, the next object was to procure another place for the establishment. The only spot of ground not in possession of the farmers, was about seven miles north of Fort Frederick, near a small rivet, at the entrance of a glen, between high mountains,—a situation by no means desirable, but which, as there was no alternative, he was obliged for the present to accept, under an understanding, however, that it was only for one year, or till a more suitable situation could be procured. After the site had been fixed upon, the governor requested Dr. Vanderkemp to give it a name, observing, that as he had no fondness for scriptural names, he hoped it would not be from the Bible. Pausing a moment, and recollecting that he had preached, on the preceding Sabbath, from Gen. xxxv. 2, 3., the doctor proposed "Bethels-dorp,"—the village of Bethel; which sounding well enough, Jansen assented. Next day, when he discovered the derivation of the word, and found out the hoax, he joined in the laugh against himself. He owned that it was perfectly fair.

While he remained at Algoa bay, he had a conference with Klaas Stuurman, who reiterated his complaints against the colonists, but renewed his promise of remaining quiet; and the governor assured him that a new code of laws was to be framed for the Hottentots, by which the enjoyment of perfect freedom would be secured to them, together with good treatment in the service of the Christians,—while robberies would be severely resented.

Ambassadors also arrived from the Caffre chiefs, Zlambi, Conga, and others, who were in a state of rebellion to Gika, and were at war with the colonists, in order to treat about peace. Among these, Nacabaneh, first minister to Conga, afforded a fine specimen of a savage chieftain. He appeared about middle aged,—was tall in stature,—had a martial air,—and a very keen eye. He said he had four wives, but the purchase of them had cost him so much, that he scarcely had any cattle remaining. He wore a mantle of tiger's skin, the point of which was fastened to the right shoulder, so that the arm remained at liberty. On his breast he had a copperplate, engraved with the arms of General Dundas. As he stood in presence of the governor, he took care to throw back his mantle over his left shoulder; when on his left arm, above the elbow, eight beautiful bracelets were displayed, each cut out of a single piece of ivory. On both wrists he had copper bracelets; and round his waist he had a girdle, ornamented with a double row of plates of copper. His head was decorated with a sort of diadem, consisting of a strip of leather, about an inch wide, on which were sewed beads of all colours, in symmetical figures; and on the top of his head was a large bunch of quagga's hair, standing upright, intermixed also with beads and pieces of copper. He was struck with astonishment at all that he beheld. As he went over the barracks, the soldiers were at dinner, and he expressed his admiration at the order that reigned among them. He said, the Caffres had a great many warriors, who were never suffered to want; but that he must be a great man, indeed, who had so many rich men under him. If every one of the soldiers did but give him "a button," what a rich man he should be,—and yet they would still have enough left for themselves! At the going off of a piece of artillery, he gave tokens of terror; but his amazement exceeded; he sprang forward, with his eyes staring, and holding both his ears; and after drawing his breath very deep, whistled out a long protracted tone. He then inquired how far such a shot would hit, and how many men it would kill at once; but declined having the experiment repeated. The gold epaulettes of the officers, a watch, and several other articles, attracted his attention much; and when permitted to feel them, or take them into his hands, he uniformly expressed his wonder by whistling.

With these envoys, nothing definite could be settled; and the governor proceeded to Sondag's river, to hold an interview with the chiefs. On the road he was met by upwards of a hundred colonists, who drew up on horseback on a plain near the river,—received him with a salute of musketry; and Rensburg expressed, in a short speech, the joy they all felt at the return of the Dutch government, and made tender of their obedience. The general gave them many assurances of his paternal care, and ascribed the misfortunes they had experienced partly to their own misconduct—to disunion among themselves, and to the intrigues of some evil spirits by whom they had been led astray; but hoped he should now receive their cordial assistance in restoring tranquillity both among themselves and with their neighbours. A common camp was formed; and this pleasant but sequestered spot presented all the bustle and show of civilized life.

The general visited Klaas Stuurman, who had moved near the Caffres, in his kraal, and heard from him a declaration similar to what he had made to Mr. Barrow. Within a few days the chiefs arrived, and peace was concluded between them and the colonists,—the leading terms of which were, that the Caffres should deliver up all the slaves who remained with them, and the colonists should restore all the children they had stolen from the Caffres,—that the Fish river was to be the boundary,—that no Caffre should come into the colony without permission, and no colonist should enter Caffraria without an order from the governor, or the landrost,—that if a colonist offend a Caffre, he should not avenge himself, but give notice to the nearest landrost,—and that if a Caffre offend a colonist, he shall give notice to his chief.

Having concluded a peace between the Caffre chiefs and the colonists, the general was not less desirous to effect a reconciliation between them and king Gika After much manœuvering, he induced his majesty to come to the Dutch camp. The royal train, women included, in number was about a hundred and fifty persons. Lichtenstein thus describes him :—"Gika is one of the handsomest men that can be seen, even among the Caffres, uncommonly tall, with strong limbs, and very fine features. His countenance is expressive of the utmost benevolence and self-confidence, united with great animation. There is, in his whole appearance, something that at once speaks the king, although there was nothing in his dress to distinguish him, except some rows of white beads, which he wore round his neck. It is not hazarding too much to say, that among the savages all over the globe, a handsomer man could scarcely be found. Nay, one might go farther, and say, that among the sovereigns of the cultivated nations, it would perhaps be difficult to find so many qualities united, worthy of their dignity. His fine, tall, well proportioned form, at the perfect age of six-and-twenty,—his open, benevolent, confiding countenance,—the simplicity, yet dignity, of his deportment,—the striking readiness of his judgment, and of his answers,—his frankness, and the rational view he took of things ; all these properties combined are not often to be found among those who, according to our commonly received opinions, have had infinitely greater advantages in forming their persons [persons?] and minds." His majesty, with his mother and two wives, were invited to dine with the general ; and although a perfect stranger to most of the dishes, and to the European manners, he easily caught them. When any of the meats particularly pleased his palate, he immediately handed a piece over his shoulder to some of his attendants who were standing without. He drunk wine with pleasure, but drank little : the ladies were more ample in their libations. Among the presents was an European dress, which, although much too small, he got himself squeezed into, and strutted about with great complacency in his new apparel, notwithstanding the inconvenience of the unusual casement. In these straitened circumstances, he cast an anxious eye on the general's military cloak ; but as this was indispensable, he was promised that one should afterwards be sent him. This was punctually fulfilled, and with the cloak was sent a complete hussar uniform, richly trimmed with gold-lace, and a horse superbly caparisoned with embroidered housings. Alberti gives a characteristic account of the manner in which they were received. "The uniform fitted him extremely well, and was very becoming. He mounted the horse with his usual address ; and his pleasure seemed to reach its highest possible point when a looking-glass, about six feet high, was produced, and set before him. He was so astonished, that it was some minutes before he could recover himself. His vanity was now fully displayed by galloping to a certain distance backward and forward before the people for a considerable time, while they contemplated him with the utmost admiration, uttering all the time loud shouts of applause. I observed he was more particularly delighted with the applauses he received from the women."

When the governor had soothed him with his presents, he introduced the subject of peace with the rebels ; and with great difficulty obtained his promise, that if they supplicated peace, he would throw no obstacles in the way. He next proposed, that if peace should be made, and the revolted tribes reduced to obedience, that implements of husbandry and tools for mechanical work should from time to time be sent to the Caffres, to enable them to acquire greater wealth and a more abundant portion of the comforts and enjoyments of life : and that a commissary should reside in the country, to see the articles of peace fairly observed on both sides. Respecting peace between the colony and himself, Gika expressed his utmost readiness to enter into all or any terms the governor chose ; and he showed at least an equal adroitness with the Dutch negotiator, when he secured for himself what were objects of the first moment—the presents ; and gave the governor, what polititions in all ages have considered of very secondary import—the most unbounded promises. He concluded a peace, and the conditions were such as do honour to the good intentions of the governor, whatever idea his supposition that they would be observed may convey of his discernment. Among a variety of articles, the principal one was the stipulation which prevented the Caffres coming into the colony, or remaining there, without leave. This, which had most probably been inserted at the suggestion of the colonists, was calculated, if not designed, to break up all connection between that nation and the venerable Vanderkemp, for whom, the colonists well know, that the men, less savage than themselves, had an esteem not less ardent than their own hatred. Had the Dutch retained the Cape, it must have been injurious in no common degree to the cause of civilization ; and even during the short time they retained it, it operated so as to render the progress retrograde.

While General Jansen was thus endeavouring to secure the peace of the extremities, M. Von de Mist, commissary-general, was laudably engaged in attempting to settle the government upon a just and permanent basis. To repair the damage which years of confusion had occasioned to the finances, and to enact such laws and regulations as, while they gave to the colonists every advantage, would prevent the continuance of the enormous evils under which the aborigines groaned. He procured the enactment of a statute, declaring the complete freedom of the Hottentots, which, although it for some time proved merely a verbal notice, was, notwithstanding, afterwards, of immense advantage, when the battle for the final emancipation of that people was combated for and obtained. Accounts of a renewal of war with Britain recalled General Jansen to the defence of the Cape ; but commissioner de Mist, whose presence was not necessary for military arrangements, seized the opportunity to make a journey through the colony, to complete, if possible, the internal regulations which he thought necessary for its prosperity.

It were useless and unnecessary to follow the travellings of constituted authorities through colonial possessions, when we attempt to trace the history of civilization : they are in their very nature not liable only, but almost so constituted as to invite imposition. Their route is published weeks before they set out,—avant-couriers are sent to announce their approach,—all is prepared for their reception,—whatever might offend is removed into the back-ground,—and as with the oppression there is power, in ninety-nine cases in the hundred, so far from seeing the real state of an enslaved people, they are amused with the holiday smile of wretches, to whom it were death to look sad. We may, however, glean some important particulars from inadvertent admissions, or from the narrative of circumstances which their journalists think may entertain, and see no use in concealing, although they do not perceive the extent of the legitimate deductions from the facts they narrate. Such are some of the incidental notices in Lichtenstein's account of De Mist's tour.

Various incidents and delays prevented the Dutch governor from entering upon his office at the Cape, till February, 1803. As soon as the Moravian brethren were apprized of this circumstance, Rose and Marsveldt repaired to Cape-Town to congratulate his excellency, who gave them a very kind reception, and also paid them a visit at Bavian's-Kloof, when he repeated his expressions of respect. The appearance of the settlement pleased him much, and, as a mark of approbation, he requested to give it a new name, as he thought the old one, Bavian's-Kloof, "baboon's glen," no longer applicable ; and suggested Guadenthal, "grace vale," which was adopted. When he returned, the commissary De Mist with a large retinue set out upon his expedition. In his progress, he visited the brethren's settlement, of which Dr. Lichtenstein has given the following account, and it is the more valuable, as he is no friend to missionary institutions.—"In the year 1799, at the request of the three original missionaries, two others, of the names of Rose and Korhammer, were sent from Germany to join them. The former has now in Marsveldt's place the direction of the whole institution. Both brought their wives with them, and brought over also wives for the brethren already established,—women of their own persuasion, who made no hesitation in crossing the seas to unite themselves in wedlock with persons wholly unknown to them. Since that time, the society has increased exceedingly, both in numbers and importance. The same year the brethren built a very neat church, and the number of their disciples now amounts to nearly eleven hundred. Two hundred houses and huts, with gardens annexed to them, and built in regular rows, give this place the appearance of an European village,—a sight which surprised me exceedingly, and for the first time brought in a lively manner to my mind the idea of my native country. Excepting this place, I never saw anything in the whole colony bearing the least resemblance to a German village.

"The five brethren, with their wives, received us at the door of a house where they live all together. One of them made a short speech to welcome us; after which, a chorus of perhaps a hundred Hottentots, men and women, ranged in two rows before the door,—the women on the right hand, the men on the left,—sung a hymn, which was truly affecting and elevating to the heart. At first, the whole number of voices sang the simple melody in slow time; then the verses were sung three voices together, by the men and the women alternately; after which, the melody was sung by two voices only, till the last verse, when again they all joined in chorus.

"After we had rested a short time in the house, we were carried to a table extremely well set out, and all prepared by the good wives themselves,—every one in her different department. Instead of a prayer before the meal, the five couple sung a verse of a hymn, and then, with the utmost cheerfulness, and in a style equally removed from studied seriousness and from frivolity, entered into conversation with us. This was carried on in a manner which showed so much correctness of thinking, and soundness of understanding, that our good opinion of them increased at every moment. We were so well entertained, that we did not break up the party till near midnight.

"Next morning every different part of the institution was shown to us; the church, in the first place, is a simple neat quadrangular edifice; but the roof is too steep, and carried up to too sharp a ridge. This was done to give height to the building, and render it more conspicuous. Within are two rows of benches, and a simple pulpit. The utmost simplicity is observable, indeed, in every part of the building; but, at the same time, the due proportions are exceedingly well observed, and the workmanship is extremely neat. The timbers are all of Sumach wood, the yellow tint and polish of which gives a sort of simple elegance to the appearance of the whole.

"By the side of the church is the garden of the pastors, in the midst of which stands the large old pear tree planted by Schmidt himself, the original founder of the institution; benches are standing under its shade; and this is a favourite place of resort among the brethren. The garden is two hundred paces long, and about a hundred and fifty broad; it is well stored with all kinds of kitchen vegetables and pulse, and intersected all over with little channels, by which it is constantly well watered. Brother Schwin, who is an excellent gardener, has the management of it. The church-yard is directly behind it, and is laid out exactly in the manner of the Hernhutters in Germany. A walk divides it in two,—on the right hand of which lie the men, on the left, the women. The graves follow each other in regular rows; and the greatest care is taken of them; each has over it a little wooden cross, on which is inscribed the name of the deceased, his age, and the day of his death. The graves of two children of the brethren have tomb-stones; and those of the Hottentots that have been baptized are distinguished from the rest.

"The house inhabited by the brethren has, besides the hall in which they assemble, and where they take their meals, two chambers for two of the couples, and various household conveniences. The other three couple lodge in small houses close by. Another house is appropriated to the manufacture of knives, of which Kuhnel is the director, and which begins already to be very profitable. Four Hottentots were employed in it, who, when first they began learning, had no pay. They are now paid wages by the day; and when they are perfect in their work, are to be paid by the piece. The knives are strong and well made, and are much sought after at the Cape-Town, though they are dear. Pocket-knives sell from a dollar to a dollar and a half. Kuhnel complained much of the want of tools, and the difficulty of getting them from Europe, so that he is obliged to make them almost all himself. Marsveldt is the miller, and has built a water-mill, after the European manner, in which he grinds not only all the corn for the household and the Hottentots, but a great deal for the neighbouring colonists. The church, with the nearest houses, lie in the deepest recess of the valley, at the foot of the Bavian's-Kloof, from which, in winter, the water sometimes rushes with great force, so that it has more than once overflowed the whole valley. The channel has therefore been lately enclosed between two strong walls, and several bridges have been made over it; a work of no small labour, and affording an additional proof of the industry and activity of these people. The brethren proposed carrying this canal on as a benefit to the lands lying without the valley; and when, two years after, I visited this spot, for the last time, it was already extended six hundred paces farther.

"But in order to form a just estimate of the worth of these excellent men, their manner of conducting themselves towards the Hottentots must be seen:—The mildness, yet dignity with which they instruct them, and the effect which has already been produced in improving the condition of their uncivilized brethren, is truly admirable. It is the more astonishing, since all has been accomplished by persuasion and exhortation. No violence, or even harshness, has ever been employed. No other punishment is known but being prohibited from attending divine service, or being banished the Society; but it is very rarely they are obliged to have recourse to these things,—only when repeated exhortations and remonstrances have failed, and a determined perverseness of disposition appears, which cannot otherwise be subdued. The highest reward of industry and good behaviour is to be baptized and received into the society. Of this, however, they are so sparing, that the whole number of the baptized scarcely yet amounts to fifty. To the most distinguished among them, the still higher honours are granted of being appointed to little offices in the church, such as elders and deacons. The latter are also, very naturally, from their diligence and industry, in the best circumstances of any of the community, and have houses built by themselves, not at all inferior to any of those of the colonists on the borders. The men are clothed, like the peasants, in linen jackets, leather small-clothes, and wear hats; the women have woollen petticoats, cotton jackets, with long sleeves, and caps. The lower class are still clothed with skins; but they are made to keep themselves and their clothing clean; and no nakedness is permitted.

"Every family of Hottentots has a garden behind the house, planted with vegetables, pulse, and fruit trees, with a portion of land, according to the number of persons to be fed from it. This they cultivate themselves, under the direction of the father, as he is called; and they have the implements of agriculture and seed-corn given them. Industry is rewarded by an occasional addition to the portion of land; negligence is punished by being deprived of a part. But the brethren still find a disposition to indolence, the greatest subject of complaint they have against their disciples. Many of them will only gain their slender sustenance by the same occasional labours to which they have been accustomed in the service of the colonists, by assisting in the harvest, for example, by attending upon their cattle, or jobbing on their buildings. The women and children are left behind when they go out to work in this way,—a burden upon the community, and are not without difficulty incited to gain a trifle, by working in the gardens of the brethren, or of their more substantial fellow-countrymen."

In comparing this statement with these formerly given from the journals of the missionaries themselves, it will be observed, that the Doctor has mistaken entirely the terms of admission to baptism; though, certainly, the want of good behaviour would form a very proper ground of exclusion from that ordinance. Neither is it, in general, either from indolence or choice, that the Hottentots, located at any missionary settlement, go to reside again among the farmers.

In pursuing his route, the commissary-general visited the institution at Bethelsdorp, but found it in a very different situation. Instead of having arrived at maturity, like the settlement of Gnadenthal, it was merely displaying the first rudiments of civilization, and these under every possible disadvantage. On the day after Governor Jansen left them they took possession of their new allotment. They were obliged at first to supply themselves with the tilts of their wagons for houses, which they set upon the ground, under protection of bushes, against the prevailing south-west winds. They found the situation preferable to Bota, being much healthier, having better pasturage both for sheep and larger cattle, and excellent pot-clay and lime, but no timber, nor such a quantity of fire-wood or of water as was desirable; for which reasons, it was agreed only to make trial of it for one year; consequently, all the erections were merely temporary. The season for sowing elapsing fast, their first work was to get the plough into the ground; but, through the poverty of the soil, the want of manure and of seed-corn, their harvest turned out but very poor. Their next operation was to trace out the ground for a village; and in a few days Mr. Read formed a square two hundred and forty paces in length, and in breadth one hundred and forty-four, which they divided into portions, agreeably to the size of each family. Through this space ran a rivulet, which they named Bethel Fountain, dividing the square into two. To one section they gave the name of Jansen, to the other that of Dundas. Nearly in the middle of Jansen's square they built the church, with walls and roof of reed. It was made in the form of a cross, four wings extending from the centre; at the end of one were two rooms for Dr. Vanderkemp; at the other was Mr. Read's residence; at the end of the third was a kitchen and small dining-room; the fourth was the front and entrance to the place where the people met for worship, and which was also used as a school. In the course of the third month, Dr. Vanderkemp planted, in the missionaries' garden, fig, peach, and pomegranate trees. Mr. Read sowed, in a large garden, Caffre corn, Indian corn, beans, pease, cabbages, cucumbers, lettuce, and other vegetables. The people, also, many of them made gardens.

But the month following, they had very heavy rains, which flowed in torrents through their reed walls, and consequently through their houses, by which many of their articles were spoiled. Several of their fences too were carried away by the floods. This was succeeded by the loss of a vessel from the Cape, in which were a great number of necessaries they expected, as likewise the goods that had been sent from England for the use of the mission. The corn the governor had promised to send for seed did not arrive till too late to be sown; but by this means they were provided with bread, of which they had not tasted for three months. These accidents, which tended greatly to retard the progress of the settlement, the missionaries could neither foresee nor provide against. The number of Hottentots who assembled around the station was considerable, but they were in a state of great poverty, which obliged many to go to the Boors, as the missionaries, who had received no money from the Cape for upwards of a year, had not the means of employing more than their own people. Others chose to lie in the bushes, and live upon the roots of the field, rather than be subject to the discipline of civilized life. Like the Moravian brethren, they complained of the laziness even of their own people, which subjected them to the greatest distress.

Surrounded by so many difficulties, which would have appalled settlers from a civilized country, the missionaries had only laboured six months, when the commissary De Mist, accompanied by Dr. Lichtenstein, arrived at the settlement. The following is Lichtenstein's account of the visit.—"On the day of our arrival at Algoa bay, the commissary-general received a visit from Vanderkemp. In the very hottest part of the morning, we saw a wagon, such as is used in husbandry, drawn by four meagre oxen, coming slowly along the sandy downs. Vanderkemp sat upon a plank laid across it, without a hat,—his venerable bald head exposed to the burning rays of the sun. He was dressed in a threadbare black coat, waistcoat, and breeches, without shirt, neckcloth, or stockings, and leather sandals bound upon his feet, the same as are worn by the Hottentots. The commissary-general hastened to meet and receive him, with the utmost kindness. He descended from his car, and approached with slow and measured step, presenting to our view a tall, meagre, yet venerable figure. In his serene countenance might be traced remains of former beauty, and in his eye, still full of fire, was plainly to be discerned the powers of mind which had distinguished his early years. Instead of the usual salutations, he uttered a short prayer, in which he begged a blessing upon our chief and his company, and the protection of Heaven during the remainder of our journey. He then accompanied us into the house, when he entered into conversation freely upon many subjects, without any superciliousness or affected solemnity.

"The commissary-general reminded him that they had known each other thirty-six years before at Leyden. He was then himself studying the law, and Vanderkemp was in garrison as a lieutenant of dragoons. He named to him the coffee-house where they had often met, and talked over many occurrences that had happened jointly to them. The missionary remembered these things very distinctly, observing, that he led then a very dissolute life; but he hoped it was expiated by his subsequent conversion and present course."—[This remark must have been totally misunderstood—it was in direct opposition to Vanderkemp's creed, as the reader must have observed.]—"He related many things worthy of remark during the time he lived among the Caffres, and elucidated several circumstances that happened in the late unfortunate war with them. Before we sat down to table, he again ejaculated a long prayer. He ate very little—drank no wine—had after dinner a private conference with the commissary-general—and in the evening returned to Bethelsdorp. His colleague, Read, who accompanied him, seemed a good-hearted man, but, like most of the missionaries, extremely ignorant.

"Two days after, we returned Vanderkemp's visit. It is scarcely possible to describe the wretched situation in which this establishment appeared to us, especially after having seen that of Bavian's Kloof. On a wide plain, without a tree, almost without water fit to drink, are scattered forty or fifty little huts, in the form of hemispheres, but so low that a man cannot stand upright in them. In the midst is a small clay hut, thatched with straw, which goes by the name of a church, and, close by, some smaller huts of the same materials, for the missionaries. All are so wretchedly built, and are kept with so little care and attention, that they have a perfectly ruinous appearance. For a great way round, not a bush is to be seen; for what there might have been originally have long ago been used for fire-wood. The ground all about is perfectly naked, and hard trodden down, nowhere the least trace of human industry: wherever the eye is cast, nothing is presented but lean, ragged, or naked figures, with indolent sleepy countenances. The support of the missionary institution in England and Holland, the favour of the government, the chase, and the keeping a few cattle, the produce of which is scarcely worth mentioning;—these are the means to which two hundred and fifty men have to look for their support.

"It cannot be matter of astonishment to any body, that they are found wholly insufficient: and Vanderkemp complained bitterly that he had already been forced to sacrifice the greatest part of his own property. So much the more extraordinary does it appear, that he had never turned his thoughts seriously to instilling habits of industry into his disciples; but all idea of their temporal welfare appears with him to be wholly lost in his anxiety for their eternal salvation. His own hut is totally destitute of all comfort,—even of any approach to neatness, and is perfectly consistent with the negligence of earthly cares which he preaches. He remarked, not without great self-satisfaction, how little was necessary to the support of life. But he surely would have done much better, when he drew these Hottentots around him, to have inspired them with some sort of taste for the refinements of civilization, rather than to have levelled himself with them, and adopted their habits of negligence and filth. It appears to me, that Vanderkemp is of little value as a missionary, partly because he is a mere enthusiast, and too much absorbed in the idea of conversion; partly because he is too learned—that is to say—too little acquainted with the common concerns of life—to turn the attention even of a raw Hottentot to them. Thence comes his total neglect of husbandry, and all mechanical employments, though these are the arts in which his disciples must be instructed, if he would make them really happy. Thence also the perverted view he takes of the conduct which the colonists ought to observe with regard to his institution, since he considers them as bound to assist in its support."

Such appeared the rude elements of Bethelsdorp! Could the doctor see it now, with its cultivated grounds, its manufactories, its printing-presses, its free and enlightened population, what a different account would he write! unless the dislike which he evinces to a religion without show, should incline him to give a caricature of its subjects, through which those only acquainted with the original could detect the resemblance, though violently outraged. This he has done in giving a view of the religious character of the inhabitants of the institution.—"It is true," he says, "that these Hottentots were now nominally quiet, and kept in some order; yet often, under pretence of the chase, they wandered about armed;—the government (then English) not merely having allowed them a small quantity of powder and shot to kill game for the purpose of food, but having supplied them with it very abundantly,—a favour, if favour it is to be called, which was too often misused. They were certainly daily instructed for some hours in the Christian religion; but these instructions made much more impression upon their memory than their understanding. They could sing and pray, and be heartily penitent for their sins, and talk of the Lamb of Atonement; but none were really the better for all this specious appearance. No attention was paid to giving them proper occupation, and, excepting in the hours of prayer, they might be as indolent as they chose.

"This convenient mode of life attracted many of the most worthless and idle among these people, and all who applied were received indiscriminately into the establishment. The consequence was, the colonists soon made heavy complaints of the want of servants, since the Hottentots were much better pleased with leading an indolent life in Vanderkemp's school, than with gaining their bread by labour."

It has been well remarked, that the prejudice such statements have a tendency to excite against missions, is perhaps one of the least evils to which they ordinarily give rise. The tendency of indiscriminate censure, unqualified abuse, and studied misrepresentation, is to render such as are friendly to missions incredulous as it respects all statements made by strangers, which give an unfavourable view of particular missions; and under the shade of a scepticism, generated in this way, abuse and corruption will in many cases creep in, and produce irreparable injury, before their supporters will allow themselves to suppose them in any danger, or that unfavourable reports are anything else than calumnies propagated against them by their enemies; while unfaithful or incompetent missionaries will never be at a loss for an excuse, when they can ascribe all that is said against them to the enmity of the human heart against the gospel.

In contrast with this representation, an instance or two of what the missionaries considered conversion, may be mentioned.—Cupido, (noticed page 328) was, before he believed the truth, notorious as a sinner, even among the heathen, famous for swearing, lying, fighting, but especially drunkenness, which often brought him upon a sick-bed, being naturally weak. At such times, he always resolved to be sober; but when health returned, his resolutions were forgot. A secret dread of God, although he knew him not, tormented him; and he anxiously inquired how he might get rid of this vice, for he thought if he could overcome it, the conquest of the rest would be easy. He was directed to witches and wizards, but they proved miserable comforters; till at length his feet were directed to Graaf Reinet, where he heard Vanderlingen declare, that Jesus Christ the Son of God could save sinners from all their sins. Then cried he out to himself—"That is what I want! that is what I want!" His convictions of sin were deepened under a discourse by Dr. Vanderkemp. This at first had only the effect of irritating him against an old woman who he imagined had exposed his character; but as he attended the means of grace, the secrets of his heart were farther laid open, and he was constrained to confess "This is not of man, but of God." He became one of the most zealous fellow-labourers of the missionaries, who, in their report, say, "It is no small pleasure to hear him recommend Christ to others as the only remedy for sin,—who can destroy it, as he had experienced, both root and branch."

Another character, eminent for his proficiency in vice, Boezak, after his conversion, became an ornament to the church of Christ, not only in the settlement but among his old connexions and the world at large, with whom he was often called to mingle, being a great buffalo and elephant hunter. He was amazingly intrepid, and often had wonderful escapes. On one occasion, when, assisted by two others, he had killed a female elephant, and they were engaged in cutting her up, the male approached, but so secretly, through the bushes, that they did not observe him before he had got within the distance of twenty paces. Boezak then fired at him, and wounded him in the breast. The animal thus rendered furious, ran with a dreadful shriek upon him, and his fate seemed inevitable; when, in this critical moment, the two others, who had fled under the first impulse of terror, turned, and fired, and the elephant fell. In all his journeys, he spoke freely to the colonists and Hottentots on the subject of their eternal interests; and as his courage was indisputable, and his conduct as a Christian irreproachable, his exhortations made deep, and in some cases, indelible impressions.

Hannes Trompleton, the captain of a horde of plundering Hottentots, who, with his father and sisters, became all obedient to the faith, and, from murderers, and plunderers, and thieves, have proved humble and diligent members of the church,—may be added to the roll. Examples might be multiplied, but what unequivocally shows that Lichtenstein's allegations were ill-founded, is the testimony of General Jansen, who, in a letter to Dr. Vanderkemp, bore strong evidence to the superiority of the Hottentots from Bethelsdorp above their untrained brethren. He signified that such of them as had voluntarily engaged to serve in the armed corps of that nation, "were to be highly commended for their exemplary conduct, and excelled the rest of their countrymen." The commissary-general, after leaving Algoa bay, visited Graaf Reinet, and made some arrangements with the Caffres; but the news of war having again broken out in Europe, and the possibility of the Cape once more changing masters, hastened his return to the capital of the colony, whence he soon after departed for Europe.

CHAP. IX.

HOTTENTOT CORPS.

Hottentot corps raises the native charater—Recruited from the Moravian settlement—Brother Rose and his wife visit the camp—Commandant's testimony to their good conduct—Government invites a missionary to remain with the soldiers—Conference—they consent—Brother Korhammer goes to the station—Reformation among the troops—Commences a school—Method of preaching—The camp broken up—Soldier's wives remove to Gnadenthal—Their reception—Followed by the missionaries—Their parting address to the Hottentots—Increase of the settlement—Hottentots move to the vineyards—Missionaries recalled—State of the mission—Severe drought—Scarcity—Remarkable incidents—Escape from a tiger—Heroism of a Farmer's wife—Impositions of stranger Hottentots—Death and burial of Brother Rose—Korhammer's labours among the troops—Annoyed by their disputes—The violin player—The soldier's wife—Attention of the officers—Solemn festivals—Close of the year—the Cape taken by Sir David Baird.

Among the subsidiary causes which have tended to promote the civilization of South Africa, the formations of Hottentot corps is not to be overlooked. They gave an elevation to this degraded race which they had not heretofore known,—and the first step to make a man be respected by others, is to teach him to respect himself. From the time when they had ceased to be possessors of the soil, they had been taught to consider themselves as a distinct inferior species of beings; and even when Christian instruction had raised them to their proper level in moral existence, they were not allowed by the uncultivated Boors to hold any rank in civil society; till, marshalled as defenders of their country, they were treated by the government as citizens and as men. It is true, the government was ungrateful for the assistance they had received in the hour of danger, but they had unwittingly conferred a favour which even their ingratitude could not efface.

When general Jansen returned from his journey, and was called upon, by the renewal of the war in Europe, to put the Cape in a state of defence, the troops in the colony were wholly inadequate, and as the British had possession of the sea, their reinforcement was very doubtful. He therefore set himself to re-organize Hottentot regiments, and in doing so, he showed a respect and tenderness for that people, in providing for their religious instruction as well as personal comfort, which entitle his conduct to the highest praise. The governor preferred Christian Hottentots, or Hottentots resident in missionary establishments; and he sent captain Lesueur to Gnadenthal with an order to enlist a corps of volunteer Hottentots in that establishment, to serve along with the regular military, and requesting the missionaries to give him all the assistance in their power, assuring them that care should be taken to preserve their people in the doctrines and Christian practices to which they had been directed in the settlement. In consequence, all the Hottentot men were required to appear in the church, when brother Rose explained to them the aim of the meeting; after which, captain Lesueur read the order of government, explaining each sentence particularly. Being asked whether they perfectly understood what was said, and having answered in the affirmative, the captain desired them to take the matter into consideration, and come individually and give him their answers. Next day, they were called and asked what was their determination, when twenty-two volunteered; but requested that during their absence, provision might be made for their wives and children. Before they set out, the missionaries exhorted them earnestly to approve themselves faithful to the doctrines they had heard, in every situation in which they might be placed; and they parted with much affection and many tears on both sides. "This affair, however," say the missionaries, "brought us into no small dilemma, for we could neither encourage our Hottentots to engage in a business from which great danger might accrue to their souls, nor could we do anything to oppose the wishes of our rulers, who, because they place more especial confidence in the honesty and faithfulness of our people, wish to have as many of them as possible in the army, and employ them chiefly as sergeants and corporals."

Another requisition was made shortly after, for the young unmarried men to enlist as volunteers. They all declared their unwillingness to leave the settlement, but their readiness to turn out at a moment's notice in case of attack. As the Hottentots, however, who had enlisted, were occasionally permitted to visit Gnadenthal, they succeeded in persuading, from time to time, several of their companions to follow their example.

About half a year after, brother Rose, with his wife, and brother Kuhnel paid a visit to Cape-Town, for the purpose of obtaining surgical aid for Mrs. Rose, who was troubled with an excrescence on her head. Immediately on their arrival, they waited upon M. Von Mist and the governor, who received them with great politeness, and after inquiring minutely into the progress of the mission, requested them to pay a visit to the Hottentot camp; which they gladly complied with, as they were anxious to see such of their own people as were engaged in military service, and had, besides, received a friendly invitation from Captain Lesueur the commandant of the whole Hottentot corps. The camp had the appearance of a regular village, consisting of twenty-two well built cottages. After going over it, the missionaries met with the greater part of the Hottentots from Gnadenthal, who, with the exception of a few absent on duty, were drawn up in front of the Captain's house. They addressed them in a short discourse, reminding them of what they had heard and learned at Bavian's Kloof, and what the Lord had done for them; and they, in turn, expressed their joy and thankfulness, for their teachers' visit, with tears of gratitude. Captain Lesueur bore testimony to their good conduct, and said, that while others employed their leisure in idleness and folly, they assembled themselves to speak of spiritual things and to sing hyms. He added,—being once desired by their officers to declare if they were satisfied with their treatment, they answered in the affirmative, and observed there was only one thing which they found hard to bear, which was their being obliged to hear the continual cursing and swearing of the soldiers,—a thing they had never been accustomed to before.

When the missionaries were preparing to return home, they received an invitation to a conference with the governor and M. Von Mist, in which they told them that they intended to augment the Hottentot corps to one thousand men, and wished much that one of the missionaries from Gnadenthal would accept the office of Chaplain to the corps,—live in the camp, and instruct the Hottentots in the Christian religion,—that he should have a dwelling and a proper salary provided by government, and that, in due time, a church should be built, for it was their intention, even in the event of peace, to retain this body of Hottentots. They added, that they conceived such a proposal could not but be agreeable to their wishes, as they should thereby obtain an opportunity of preaching the gospel to a considerable number of heathen, which was the object of their residence in that country. They, at the same time, expressed their apprehensions, lest by a long absence from the means of grace, their own people, now in camp, might, by degrees, forget what they had learned, and the weeds choke the good seed sown in their heart. The baptized Hottentots also had frequently declared to their officers, that they could not live without hearing the word of God. Brother Rose thanked the governor and commissary for the many favours they had received, especially for the confidence placed in them and their missionary labours, and granted that the whole aim of their living in that country was the instruction of the Hottentots in the knowledge of their Creator and Redeemer, and in the way of salvation, and that, therefore, the proposal was quite consistent with their calling. But then the age and infirmities of the missionaries at Gnadenthal, each of whom had full employment in that settlement, would render the execution of the plan very difficult; besides which, they could not well undertake anything new without a direction from the bishops and elders of the church in Europe; and therefore begged them to have patience till they should write home and obtain such advice and assistance as might enable them to comply with their wishes.

The commissary-general, taking the missionary affectionately by the hand, replied,—"My dear father Rose, all you say is true; but if even your letters reach your friends soon, and they immediately find the men you wish, yet a year and more will elapse before the assistance you speak of can arrive; and we are very intent upon immediately making such regulations that the Hottentots be instructed in the word of God, and become partakers of the blessings of civilization, which cannot be obtained but by their becoming Christians in truth, as is sufficiently exemplified at Gnadenthal. And as this plan is meant for the benefit of the whole colony, and of vast importance to the state, I have acquainted all the gentlemen in government with it, and it has received their most cordial approbation. We, therefore, wish that you would help us to execute it, by immediately consulting with your brethren at Gnadenthal." They promised to do so, and were dismissed with expressions of much friendship.

On consulting with their brethren, they unanimously agreed that it was their duty not to refuse complying with the wishes of government, especially as they were expressly called to improve every opportunity of instructing the Hottentots, and preaching the gospel to them. Brother Rose was, in consequence, empowered to write to the commissary-general, and express the willingness of the brethren to comply with the desire of government, and to appoint a missionary to attend the Hottentot settlers, and preach the gospel to them; but requesting that the name of chaplain might not be given him, and that he might be considered only as a missionary of the Unitas Fratrum, with permission to regulate his pastoral labours according to the manner usual in their church, and to be subject to their own rules, so as to be called home in case the plan did not answer the proposed end; with all which the government agreed; and brother Korhammer having received and accepted this call, committed the care of the school to brother Kuhnel, and with his wife set out for the station, —which is remarked by Dr. Vanderkemp, in his journal, as a very providential interference, the Batavian republic having determined to send two Roman Catholic ecclesiastics, at the public expense, to preach in the Cape army.

The first text he preached from in camp was the one which occurred in the Word-Book for the day—"And it shall come to pass, that in that place where it was said unto them, ye are not my people, there they shall be called the children of the living God." At half-past nine, the drums beat, and the whole corps assembled at the missionary's dwelling, where they were ranged in three divisions, and at ten marched off to the place where the service was to be performed; the officers and several ladies and gentlemen sat under an awning, and the Hottentot corps stood around in military order. The greatest silence prevailed during the whole time; and after the service was concluded, many of the strangers came up to the preacher and wished him God's blessing. The commandant, in a conversation which he held with him, pointed out a disposition to get drunk as the besetting sin of the Hottentots, and wished him particularly to direct his efforts against a vice so destructive to soul and body. This he willingly promised, but observed, that he thought the best method was to speak against this evil in private meetings, to which the captain assented. The missionary gave notice, that all those who wished to attend the particular meetings for Christian instruction, should come to him, that he might write down their names. Next evening, sixty more met, with whom, kneeling down, he commended the host of heathen then assembled, in fervent prayer, unto the Lord, and entreated that he would have mercy upon them, and convert their hearts. He then delivered the salutations of the brethren, and of their countrymen at Bavian's-Kloof, and explained the aim of their coming thither. As soon as the meeting closed, most of those who were present came forward and expressed their thankfulness for the favour to be instructed in the word of God. On the day following, forty-six women came to their separate meeting; and almost every day afterwards numbers desired their names to be written down. And such were the happy effects of these private conferences, that on next pay-day the commandant reported, greatly to the satisfaction of the missionaries, that not one of the Hottentots had been confined for drunkenness.

Korhammer and his wife also commenced a school with the children, which promised well; but what gave them the greatest pleasure was, that the preaching of the gospel appeared to create much concern in the hearts of some of the Hottentots, for their soul's salvation. They visited them of their own accord,—spoke confidentially about the state of their minds, and confessed that they were yet under the power of sin, by which their hearts were chained and bound to evil. Some, who in former years had heard something of God and his word, expressed their regret that they had paid so little attention to it. "During the whole of our stay," says the missionaries, "we endeavoured to omit no opportunity of extolling the great mercy of God our Saviour, 'who desireth not the death of a sinner, but rather that he should turn from his way and live;' and for this purpose visited the Hottentots in their dwellings." But their residence in military quarters was shortened by preparations for active hostilities. The Dutch government had received intelligence that a large British fleet lay at St. Helena; and an order arrived, (October 1,) for the whole Hottentot corps to leave their cantonments at the vineyards, and march to a camp nearer the shore. And as the missionaries were averse to making a campaign, they obtained leave from General Jansen to retire.

With a laudable anxiety for the improvement of the Hottentots, the governor was desirous to provide a safe retreat for the women and children belonging to the corps, where they might be comfortably lodged and provided for; and, at the same time, be under the means of instruction. He therefore proposed to the brethren that they should be accommodated at Gnadenthal, and government would defray the expense, and gratefully acknowledge the kind service done to these forsaken people. The brethren, although aware that their compliance would be attended with much inconvenience, and were also afraid that much moral evil might ensue by the admission of so many people, who were chiefly in a wild unconverted state, into a missionary settlement, willingly complied with the request; and on the day the camp broke up nearly two hundred women and children set out for Gnadenthal,—the mothers, many of them, besides four days' provisions, being obliged to carry their young infants on their backs. They arrived at the settlement in rags, and half starved. The good folk received them with Christian hospitality. Being seated in rows before their dwellings, each of them, young and old, received a good slice of bread, previously baked in prospect of their arrival, which they seized and eat with all the greediness of hunger. After this meal and suitable exhortations, they were distributed partly in the empty houses, and partly among the Hottentot families. "We felt great support, was the missionaries' remark, "under all the inconveniences occasioned by such an unusual number of guests, from the enlivening consideration, that perhaps, through the Lord's blessing, many of these people may hear the Gospel, in this place, for their everlasting salvation." It was likewise a new and a pleasant trait in the Hottentot character, to perceive their absent relatives did not forget them,—captain Leusneur having sent twenty dollars, collected by the soldiers for the use of their wives.

Room was made for the reception of the new comers, by a fresh draught upon the regular inhabitants. All those men who had promised to come forward in defence of the country, in case of actual danger, were required to make ready, and join the army by degrees, as it was the intention of government that they should be completely drilled before the enemy made their appearance. Several officers therefore called, and carried with them the most able-bodied of the young men, to the amount of thirty, besides ten appointed to the service of the powder magazine in Zoete Melks valley. They parted with sorrow from their teachers, who blessed and sent them away, not without some painful apprehensions lest the good word they had heard, and which in the hearts of many seemed to promise good seed, should be forgotten amid the hurry and dissipation of a military life.

Brother Korhammer and his wife remained at the vineyards for some days, till wagons arrived from Gnadenthal to fetch them home. As the commandant had desired them to pay him a visit, they took the new camp in their way. He was much occupied himself, so that they could have little conversation; but he requested Korhammer to deliver a discourse to the Hottentots, with which he gladly complied. The corps were just returning from exercise when he met them, and their officers immediately ordered them to halt, and attend to their minister. He exhorted them to keep in their hearts what they had heard of the word of God, and particularly to consider what our Saviour had done to redeem their poor souls, by the shedding of his precious blood: that they were therefore bound to surrender themselves up to Him, and to obey his Holy Spirit: that if they followed this advice, it would appear in their outward conduct,—they would obey their rulers and officers,—be faithful in their calling; and that he should rejoice exceedingly to hear so good an account of them. When he had closed they all took off their hats and exclaimed,—"We thank our teacher! God preserve our teacher in health!" Being dismissed, they all came up and took leave; many shook hands with them, and "thanked them because they had come to them out of pure love!" and this they continued to do till they got into the wagon. "All stood around and wept," add the affectionate missionaries, "and our own hearts were so penetrated with concern and love for these dear people, that we were obliged to give full vent to our tears." After a journey of three days and two nights they arrived safe at Gnadenthal.

Notwithstanding all these changes, the settlement continued to increase; and at the close of 1804, the congregation consisted of two hundred and forty-five baptized adults, of whom ninety-four were communicants, one hundred and twenty-nine baptized children, and ninety-nine candidates for baptism,—four hundred and seventy-three persons; besides inhabitants in two hundred and seventeen houses,—one hundred and eighty-six men, three hundred and six women, sixty children—total, one thousand and ninety-five, exclusive of the missionaries.

When the Hottentots had moved back to the vineyards, Governor Jansen sent a pressing invitation to the brethren, to allow one of their number to come again, and attend to the religious instructions of the native soldiers. The infirm state of brother Rose's health rendered this extremely inconvenient; yet the importance of the station, and the urgency of the governor and commandant, induced them to submit to the personal sacrifice, and brother Korhammer and his wife agreed to repair to their former post. The internal condition of the mission proceeded gradually in a kind of equal course, increasing in numbers, though several of their old members were removed by death; and, in general, upon their festival days, they gratefully commemorate the grace their Lord had bestowed upon them. Repeatedly they remark, that, in speaking with their communicants, they found, to the praise of our Saviour, most of them in a state of mind which proved their faith and love to him, and their dependence on him for every good; and in all they could discern an earnest desire to live to him, and be delivered from the power of sin. The missionaries also entered into cordial conversations among themselves, about their own disposition of heart and devotion to the Saviour, and united in prayer to him, that he would pardon all he saw amiss, strengthen their faith and love, and bless them with a comfortable sense of his presence.

Owing to their having had long droughts, their temporal affairs were not equally prosperous: a general scarcity prevailed throughout the colony, and they were not exempted from the common calamity, which was heightened by the necessity of providing government stores in the present emergency; and it was with difficulty they were suffered to retain a few sacks of corn for bread, besides the quantity necessary for seed. Their garden, likewise, was over-run with a vast number of slugs and vermin, which destroyed their young plants as soon as ever they appeared above ground, owing to their having had two mild winters in succession. Many of their people who went to the farmers in hopes of getting work and food, were disappointed. In former years, they got part of their wages in corn, which helped them on to the next harvest; but, according to the regulations in force, for first supplying the army and the capital, they might earn money, but corn was not to be had. Added to which, the wild roots, to which they used to have recourse in times of scarcity, had failed, as had also the wild almonds. The cold, too, set in intensely, which with the floods, interrupted their communication with the Cape; and to add to their disasters, a musk-cat got into their dove-cot, and destroyed almost the whole of their pigeons.

There were not, however, wanting instances of the providential care of the Lord towards these people in the midst of their distresses. A party had gone to hunt wild boars, but saw none. One of them, however, espying an antelope, was crawling towards it on his belly, dragging his gun after him, till he could get near enough to take aim unobserved; but just as he was going to fire, the animal began to run, and at that moment a tiger sprung out of the thicket and seized the poor fugitive. The Hottentot jumped up, fired, and the tiger, quitting his prey, fled into the wood;—a circumstance quite contrary to the custom of these savage animals, who, if not shot dead immediately, generally turn and attack the huntsman, springing at his face with the agility of a cat, and soon destroying him, which makes even the most expert marksman hesitate before he fires at a tiger, lest he should not kill him with the first shot. One of these animals having thus sprung upon a white man, in the neighbourhood of Gnadenthal, and knocked him down, his wife, who was at no great distance, when she saw it, seized an assagai, and killed the monster on the body of her husband.

Inhabitants of the Moravian settlement beginning now to be properly appreciated, were sought after by the farmers, in preference to any of the other Hottentots, which gave rise to frequent imposition. Field-cornet Peter Ditoy, brought the missionaries a letter from the landrost, desiring that they would give certificates to all their people when they went into any farmer's service; for it had become a practice with many Hottentots, to give themselves out as inmates of Bavian's Kloof, although they had never seen the place. The missionaries had anticipated the wish of government, and, with prudent caution, had for more than a year previous, furnished certificates to all men, women, and children, who were often reminded never to leave the place without them. But perhaps a stronger reason still may be assigned for the many impositions,—the inhabitants of missionary institutions had peculiar protections, and were not liable to be so forcibly detained and cruelly used as their other countrymen.

On the 12th of October, the mission suffered a severe loss in the death of brother Rose. He had been ill for about a year, but as he had frequently recovered so far as to be able to take an airing on horseback, or visit the Hottentots, his brethren expected that he might still survive the present attack. When they came to him on the morning of that day, they found him seized with one fainting fit after another, yet still he spoke with apparent strength. At eleven o'clock, he conversed with one of the missionaries in a lively manner; but while they were at dinner at twelve, they were unexpectedly called, and found him in the agonies of death. They kneeled down around his bed, and commended his departing spirit to his Creator and Redeemer,—thanked our Saviour for the labours of his faithful servant, now about to be concluded,—and fervently entreated him to comfort and strengthen those who were left behind, especially sister Rose; and soon to supply the place of their brother in the mission. Some verses were then sung, and the blessing of the Lord pronounced over him; shortly after which, his breath ceased. They immediately announced a public meeting in the church in the evening, in which they informed the mourning congregation of the peaceful departure of their faithful friend and teacher. On the third day, the corpse being put into the coffin, the Hottentots were indulged in their wish to see it once more. They came in companies into the room, and placing themselves around the body, sung hymns descriptive of the happiness of those who are with the Lord for ever. Those who stood without joined in the singing, and were admitted in small companies as the others retired. This lasted for about an hour and a half, and was a very affecting scene. A number of the particular friends of the mission were invited to the funeral, which took place two days after. The corpse was carried into the church, and placed in the middle, when a suitable discourse was delivered, after which they went in procession to the burying-ground, the congregation singing verses all the way. The silence and order prevailing among the large number of people assembled, rendered the service very solemn, and greatly surprised many strangers.

Brother Korhammer's labours at the camp were unwearied, and were attended with an evident blessing. He kept a school for children four times a week; and as often as the military exercises allowed, he met with the grown-up people on the evenings of the week-days, to instruct them in the Christian doctrine. On Lord's-days, he had regular public worship; and the remainder of his time was employed in visiting the people in their huts and attending the sick. The regularity of his engagements was, however, sometimes broken in upon by the people, who applied to him respecting their disputes and other unpleasant occurrences. On one occasion, a corporal came and complained to him, that he could get no rest in his hut for "an everlasting fiddling." A man, he said, had procured an old violin, on which he kept scraping day and night, and no sooner did he lay it down but another took it up, till he could bear it no longer, and would positively put a stop to it. The missionary asked him, if he had never calmly expostulated with the man, and endeavoured to silence him by fair speaking? He replied, he had done so frequently, and now he was determined to try some other method, and went away. In about an hour he returned with another corporal, and the obnoxious instrument, and they sat down together in Korhammer's cottage. After remaining some little time, he asked his comrade whether the violin belonged to him; and being answered in the affirmative, he snatched it up, then threw it violently down, and stamped it to pieces. The missionary was afraid of mischievous consequences from this disagreeable interview, but it passed over without more harm.

His temper, too, was occasionally tried by those who came to him under the pretext of mental distress. A soldier's wife, who, as she said, wished to disclose to him the state of her soul, complained of her sinfulness: but for every evil propensity she lamented, she made some sort of excuse; and after every part of her report, always found some apology for herself, till the missionary was forced to interrupt her, and tell her that this conduct was a plain proof she was still in bondage to sin and Satan, and she seemed to love and excuse the practice of sin; and thus dismissed her.

But it was a most encouraging circumstance, that the commandant, Lesueur, and his lady, and several of the superior officers, gave the best example to their inferiors, never allowing themselves to be absent on the Sunday meetings, nor, if possible, on the week days. Perhaps the neighbourhood of the British fleet might quicken their devotions: but whatever was the secondary cause, their solemn festivals, at the close of the year 1805, were attended with uncommon seriousness. Christmas-day, a large company assembled for worship, when the preacher discoursed on the angel's song. While he was speaking, a young man rose, and seizing his hand, whispered in his ear—"I have nothing of the peace you mention, and yet you say the angels proclaimed peace!" Undisturbed, the speaker stopped for a moment, and replied softly—"Go, then, my son, and seek peace with that Jesus whom I now preach unto you!" After the service, the missionary visited all the huts, and spoke with the people concerning the end of our Lord's incarnation, sufferings, and death, and that peace which he thereby procured for men. On the Lord's-day, the weather not permitting them to meet out of doors, Mr. Korhammer now cleared out the whole of his cottage, which was crowded with hearers, many of whom, probably, ere that day twice returned, were in internity. He spoke of the inexpressible happiness of seeing Jesus with the eye of faith, and knowing him as their salvation; and all listened with deep attention. Next day being the last of the year, he again visited all the huts, and endeavoured to explain to the heathen, that as they were now on the eve of entering into a new year, they, as well as he, ought to examine themselves, as to how they had spent the time past, and how they were prepared to leave the world. At eight in the evening, a large company of men, women and children, assembled in his cottage. The officers having commanded that strict order should be observed, all was silence, while their teacher addressed them from the words of our Saviour—"Be ye like unto men that wait for their Lord,"—expatiating on the happiness of those who love him and wait for his glorious appearing, and describing the misery of all who know him not. They then fell on their knees, and entreated him to pardon all their numerous sins, known and unknown, commending themselves, and all his people everywhere, among Christians and heathen, to his mercy and protection. During this prayer he was obliged to stop more than once, on account of the loud weeping of the people, and to give vent to his own feelings. "Thus," adds the journal, "we entered into the new year with prayer and praise, in reliance upon the pardon, love, and support of God our Saviour, to whom be glory for ever and ever."

A general review took place on the 2d January, 1806, at which the report was current, that a British fleet was in sight, which was fully confirmed next day, when sixty sail came into the roads. Alarm-guns were immediately fired over the whole country: and the Hottentot corps marched, leaving only a few sick, which, together with the colonel's house, and his most valuable effects, were given in charge to the missionaries, under a small guard of a lieutenant-corporal and six men. On the 7th, the invading troops landed, under a heavy cannonade, and on the 8th the battle was fought, which decided the fate of the Cape. Towards evening, the deserted camp was threatened by some of the fugitives, who entered and plundered, in an unruly manner, and were proposing to set it on fire, when the arrival of a detachment of the British dispersed them.

"We spent," say the missionaries, "the day in terror and dread of these wicked men, and kept on the watch till ten at night, when sleep overpowered us, and we went, though under great apprehensions for our safety, to bed, only keeping a candle burning. Between eleven and twelve there came a thundering rap at the door. A Hottentot maid wakened us, crying out—'Get up immediately, for there is a terrible host of people descending from the mountain towards us, and they are certainly the English.' We were somewhat frightened, rose, and dressed in some haste, and commended ourselves in prayer to God. We said,—'O Lord, we wait with resignation to see what is thy will concerning us poor helpless sheep. We are in thy hands.' We then placed two lighted candles upon the table, and set our door wide open. In a short time, about five hundred men arrived; and having occupied all the streets, began, by two and two, to enter the huts, and make prisoners of whoever they found in them. A corporal and a private stepped into the missionaries' dwelling, who bade them good evening, in English, which the corporal answered by a shake of the hand. Mr. Korhammer informed him, that he was one of the brethren from Bavian's Kloof, and that the mission had enjoyed the favour and protection of both the English and Dutch governments; on which the corporal said—'That's well. I know something of your people.' The missionary asked whether he came as an enemy or a friend, and he replied—'We come as friends. The Cape-Town and colony have this night surrendered, and therefore you are now British subjects, and our friends. And as you were not afraid, but kept your doors open to receive us, we consider you as an honest man and you have nothing to fear.' But he inquired whether they had any Frenchmen, or others, with them; and being told there were no other persons in the cottage, besides himself, his wife, and servant, he replied—'Your word is enough. I will not search.' He now asked for some bread, which they set before him, with meat and wine, for which he offered to pay; and it was with difficulty they could prevail upon him to take back the money he had put down. He then withdrew, and the party left the camp, which was again taken possession of by vagabonds; and the missionaries left it for the house of a friend, where they remained till they heard that General Jansen had accepted of the capitulation proposed by General Sir David Baird, and the colony reverted to the dominion of his Britannic majesty. They then returned to Gnadenthal, where, through the good hand of God upon them, the labours of the brethren had continued to prosper, unchequered by any very remarkable occurrence.

Placed in circumstances of peculiar difficulty, by the renewal of the war, the Dutch government of the Cape had all their efforts for ameliorating the condition of the aborigines paralyzed, by the necessity they were placed under of preparing against an expected attack, with very inadequate means of defence. There can be little doubt but that Governor Jansen, at one time at least, was sincerely desirous of promoting the cause of missions as a means of civilization; but there appears to be as little doubt that he did not understand it. When he saw the industry and regularity of Gnadenthal, and felt its beneficial effects in the brave and docile members it could furnish for the defence of the country, he looked upon the religion taught there as an excellent political system, and as highly conducive to the temporal prosperity of its professors: but he knew not the secret springs which moved the missionaries, directed and sustained their unwearied efforts, and rendered them the efficient mediums of communicating to the savage an energy similar to their own. He therefore thought that their movements, like any other part of state machinery, were to be regulated and controlled by the proclamations and edicts of the magistrates.

This erroneous opinion he had commenced to act upon, when the reins of government were snatched from his hands. Mr. Kicherer having returned from Europe, with a number of additional labourers, the governor took that opportunity of promulgating his orders upon the subject, in the following important ordinance, which shows how much a residence in the country, and the constant misrepresentations of the Boors, had altered his judgment.

The return of the commissary-general De Mist, to Europe, was an unfortunate circumstance, as both his habits and the general turn of his mind, would have led him to inquire more minutely into the civil state of the community, and perhaps enabled him to correct these misstatements, although it is doubtful, whether, when the defence of the colony required the unanimous efforts of all the colonists, either of them would have ventured to displease the Boors, by protecting the Hottentots.

Having noticed the arrival of Mr. Kicherer and the other missionaries, he states, that in order to protect the interests of the colony, and promote the object of the mission—

"1st, All missionaries, who are upon a legal authority, shall have freedom to proceed into the interior of the Cape, for the purpose of teaching and promoting religion and cultivation among the heathen nations. 2d, That this, however, be done at such a distance beyond the boundaries of the colony, that their schools have no communication with the inhabitants upon these boundaries, much less with those that live within them, Christians or Hottentots. 3d, That in the schools and meetings to be formed by the missionaries, for the natives, no person who has residence within the colony, and belonging to the common population, be permitted, unless he has obtained express leave for it from the governor; which leave can never be obtained but in the case of absolute necessity. 4th, That all missionaries, before they proceed to the interior of the country, make themselves known to the governor and commander-in-chief, and also mention the place where they intend to settle themselves; in which case they shall obtain a certificate from him, in which the name of the place or district is expressed, that government may know at all times where the missionaries are labouring. 5th, That missionaries shall be obliged to send to government, at every convenient opportunity, a written account of the state of their schools, in order to show what effect has been produced in the cultivation of the natives under their care,—from what they get their subsistence,—what cattle and other things they possess,—the nature of the soil they occupy,—if fit for agriculture,—the climate. 6th, That the limits of the colony be provisionally established for this purpose; thus—The utmost point of the colony shall be, to the north, the west coast at the mouth of the Coussie river, about 29° 30′ north latitude; the course of this river, to its springs at the commencement of the Copper mountains, shall be the northern limit. This limit shall go farther south, eastwardly, in a straight line, following, however, the natural course of the mountains, and including the utmost habitations of the colonists, to that part of the Zak river, where it unites itself with the Reed river. The Zak river, from hence to its sources, and the mountains of the Newfields, shall be the further limit, which shall continue the course of the mountains, along the north part of the great Karroo, due east and west, to the foot of the Snow mountains. The limit to the north shall include the great mountain called Tafelberg, and continue to the Sea-Cow river, where the beacon of Plettenberg is placed, further proceeding along the west part of the Bamboo mountains, including the whole Tarka Hoek. Finally, the Tarka and Kaka mountains, to the confluence of the Bareaans and great Fish river; and this river, continuing to the mouth, shall separate the colony from the country of the Caffres. 7th, That the missionaries who proceed to the places of their destination, or return from them, as well regularly ordained ministers as others, be prohibited to officiate within the colony, without having leave from the governor and commander-in-chief, or from the vestry of the district in which they intend to officiate.

"8th, That Mr. Kicherer one of the missionaries, having established a school for the natives on this side of the Zak river, shall be permitted to continue his institution upon the following terms:—That the landrost of Talbach be directed to show him the circumference in which the school must be confined,—that, concerning this circumference, the same arrangements must take place, respecting the surrounding inhabitants of the colony, as are established in the 2d, 3d, and 5th articles of this proclamation, respecting those that are beyond the limits of the colony.

"The Moravian establishment at the Bavian's Kloof, which has endeavoured to act in all respects according to the intention of the government, may continue there also, with the recommendation to impress upon the natives, as much as possible, industry, and to convince them of the bad consequences proceeding from idleness. The Moravians, however, must take care not to seduce any native or Bastard, from the service of their masters, to their instruction.

"The institution of Dr. Vanderkemp, established upon legal authority, at Bethelsdorp, shall be also permitted to remain within the foregoing limits, but upon the following conditions:—That neither the missionary Vanderkemp, nor any of his fellow-missionaries belonging to the institution of Bethelsdorp, shall be permitted to go, without a special consent from the governor, commander-in-chief, or landrost of Wittenhage, out of the limits of the colony: that only wandering Hottentots, or others, who from this institution have gone into the service of the inhabitants, shall be permitted to receive instruction; but no Hottentots who are actually serving the inhabitants, or have served them in the course of the preceding year, be permitted to be received within it."

"11th. No instruction in writing, as this is not absolutely necessary in the commencement of cultivation, shall be permitted in the schools already established, or that may be established hereafter; but this instruction shall be postponed till express license from the governor, or the commander-in-chief, be obtained for it.

"12th. As far as the capacity of the natives is fit for comprehending the first ideas of social order, such as exists in the mother-country, and in this colony, the missionaries shall be obliged to teach them. The missionaries are prohibited to pray openly in the institutions already established, or that may be established hereafter, for any other power or government, than for that of the Batavian republic, and the colony of the Cape.

"Upon these conditions, which the present state of the colony has made necessary to establish, and are only established as having a tendency to promote the intention of the missionary institution, all possible aid and assistance shall be given to the missionaries in the colony; and," it was added, "we expect that each of them will endeavour to act accordingly, because a conduct contrary to these regulations would compel government to take serious measures to enforce them."

This edict, which was in a great measure calculated to destroy the efforts making for the civilization of South Africa, was quietly acquiesced in by all the missionary establishments, except that of Dr. Vanderkemp. Mr. Kicherer, accompanied by Mr. Voss, prepared, under every restriction, to proceed to Zak river; but during his absence, a variety of untoward incidents, together with the depredations of the Bushmen, had reduced the settlement to a very low ebb, although Mr. Botma, who supplied his place, had expended considerable sums from his private fortune for its support. A deputation from Government visited it in the end of 1805, and their report was extremely unfavourable. The number of pupils amounted to forty; but the majority of these consisted of Bastard Hottentots,—the Bushmen having mostly left the settlement: their stock of cattle and sheep was greatly reduced, and was always decreasing: the kraals where they lodged at night, were fallen into ruins: the cattle lay among the huts, or were left to run about at pleasure; in consequence of which, the garden which Kicherer had formed, was trodden down, the springs fouled, and everything bore the marks of dilapidation. Mr. Botma had made some attempts to correct these abuses, by setting a good example himself. He had enclosed a piece of land, about an acre and a half, with a hedge, for growing corn and vegetables for the kitchen; but more than once, a whole side of his hedge had been carried away by his pupils to save themselves the trouble of going farther for firewood.

Although greatly overcharged, this description had some foundation, from the causes mentioned, which eventually obliged the station to be removed. Indeed, Mr. Kicherer, after he had laboured there some time, finding the difficulties of the mission increase, either from the obstructions of government, or the wretchedness of the situation, accepted of the charge of a church at Graaf-Reinet, but without withdrawing from the superintendence of the mission.

Government, in consequence of the bad report respecting the institution at Zak river, instructed their commission to inspect that among the Corrannas. They found it in a much more satisfactory state. Mr. Anderson having experienced the bad effects of journeying from place to place, resolved to form an establishment which might serve as a centre for the operations among the surrounding tribes. Having found a convenient situation near an excellent spring, Klaar Fontein, about thirty-one days' distance from Cape-Town, he intimated his intention to the people, assuring them, that unless called away in the providence of God, he determined to remain where he then was; and if any did not approve of his design, they were at liberty to leave him. To his agreeable surprise, they all consented to his proposal. He then proceeded to fix them at their different stations, where they should abide and work; and also disposed of their cattle and sheep on suitable grounds. Their husbandry, owing to the climate, was very limited. In the winter and spring they have little or no rain; and at the latter end of summer, the showers, accompanied with thunder, were partial. The agricultural produce, in consequence, depended on the strength of the spring, and was very precarious. They reared, however, corn for their own use; but their chief reliance was upon their gardens for vegetables, and their only profit arose from breeding cattle and sheep. The difficulties he had to encounter, in introducing anything like habits of settled industry among them, may be judged of from the following trait which he gives us of their carelessness:—A number of them having bought horses, rode about as if they had been mad, regarding nothing but their diversion. The missionary, Kramer being at that time absent, represented to them their folly, assuring them it was all the result of their pride, which was sin, and would, with their ingratitude, sooner or later, be punished, as most of them were scarcely able to maintain themselves and their families. But the more he reproved them, both privately and publicly, the more they appeared to be hardened and disobedient. Anxiety and fatigue brought on the missionary weakness and indisposition of body, which increased daily, and his appetite failed. "Still," he remarks, "my Lord enabled me to go through the different parts of my missionary work with delight, as his work, and with much desire to be made useful to their souls, although it appeared at present as if it were in vain."

About the beginning of March, 1805, one person died of the small-pox, which, being attributed to his going abroad too soon, occasioned little alarm, especially as several others, who had been attacked, recovered. In April, the disease began to assume a very alarming appearance: every other day there was a burial, and it appeared as if the Lord were about to visit them in anger, and sweep them away from the face of the earth. Mr. Anderson, although his indisposition had increased, was unceasingly employed in visiting the abodes of the sick—the wretchedness of which was beyond description—administering to them all the help he could, and speaking to them about the things concerning their peace. One woman he heard praying, and her husband said that she had exhorted them to attend to the preached word, and told them, —"What I have heard, I know that it is the truth." Another departed under circumstances of horror: she had lived a most licentious life, and had often disregarded the faithful warnings of the missionaries, and of her brother, who, it was hoped, had been made a partaker of grace. Her body was noisome; her mind was distracted; she appeared to have no hope, but rather a foretaste of eternal misery; she screamed and groaned, and was unwilling to die. The scene was appalling.

Now there sat a gloom upon every countenance,—each began to fear the approach of death; they attended diligently to the preacher, who endeavoured to impress upon their minds the importance of the visitation, and the effect that it ought to have upon them, if they wished or expected that God would in mercy return. About the middle of May, the distemper had greatly abated, and, along with it, that great solemnity and concern among the people respecting their souls; and the most of them began again to neglect attending on the worship of God. Grieved at this sad indifference, Mr. Anderson, himself now exceedingly weak, and looking forward to his own speedy dissolution, invited them particularly to attend a meeting in his house, which they did, when he addressed them from Amos iv. 6, to the end—"I have sent among you the pestilence, after the manner of Egypt, and I have made the stink of your camps to come up into your nostrils; yet have ye not returned unto me, saith the Lord;" and this was apparently attended with a divine blessing.

Soon after, he was attacked with a bilious fever, and could neither eat nor sleep. As he did not know the nature of his disease, nor the method of treatment, nor could receive the smallest assistance from any person around him, he despaired of life; but having an emetic lying beside him, he took it, and it produced the desired effect, so that he became able to take a little milk, which had for some time been his principal support. Relapsing, however, he became delirious, and was found in this state by some of his missionary brethren, with their wives, who providentially came to see him. One of them being a medical man, took charge of him, and by the blessing of God on his prescriptions, and the tender nursing of the sisters, he was restored, though not rapidly, to health.

Ere he was yet quite convalescent, when the commission visited him, his appearance was peculiarly interesting. "We were now," says Lichtenstein, who was with the landrost, "at the dwelling-place of the missionary Anderson in the largest of the villages, which contained between three and four hundred inhabitants. We paid our visit to the patriarch, who was very ill, and so weak that he could not quit his hut. His habitation was a Coran hut, only somewhat larger than the usual size. It was very poor within, but kept perfectly clean. The bed was shut up from the rest of the room by a curtain; in the middle was a table, and round about some chests and coffers, instead of chairs. Some small English prints were hanging about the roof, such as the apotheosis of a child's soul, with portraits of Vanderkemp and other celebrated missionaries. We found in Anderson an amiable appearing man, about thirty years of age, with great serenity and piety in his whole deportment. His features were fine, and his eye beamed with a spirit of religion and resignation: this, combined with the evident traces of a long standing sickness, gave him wholly the aspect of a saint, and could not fail, at the first glance, to win the heart of every one who approached him. He spoke the Dutch language tolerably well,—sufficiently so to make himself perfectly intelligible to the Hottentots; but he was not a little rejoiced in being able to talk with us in his mother-tongue. He assured us, our arrival was most gratifying to him, for he had long wished to see the attention of the government turned towards his institution, that he might with the greater confidence address his petitions to them for support. He was sensible, many obstacles must exist to this assistance being granted, and his penetration did not go far enough to meet all that might be urged by evil-minded persons against the interests of the government and of the institution.

"Our missionary had already been four years in the country, yet he complained, notwithstanding his most strenuous exertions in his vocation, he had accomplished but little. This, he thought, was partly to be ascribed to the successive years of drought which had intervened, and which obliged them perpetually to move from one place to another, and partly also to the high degree of indocility which unfortunately characterized most of his pupils. It was only since their being permanently fixed in that spot that he could see any prospect of his efforts being attended with the happy consequences which his wishes had anticipated. Since that time, he could perceive among them an increasing spirit of industry, of docility, and of desire of improvement. The example of the best among the Bastard Hottentots seemed to make some impression on their wholly savage brethren. His great object at present was to keep the institution fixed; and for this purpose he was endeavouring by all possible means to excite a spirit of attention to agriculture, and wean them from their attachment to the nomade life. He had already persuaded some of his people to build themselves permanent houses, instead of movable huts. He was even occupied with having a large building erected, partly as a habitation for himself, and partly as a place of assemblage for divine worship. He had canals dug in some of the low grounds to drain them, they being too marshy for use; and he hoped by this means that they would next year be fit for cultivation; he hoped also by such exertion to increase the spirit of agriculture, as one of the best means of rendering the people stationary. For this purpose he divided the whole population into six parts, who were distributed in the like number of villages; and persons of the most distinction among the Bastard Hottentots were appointed magistrates, to inspect and take care of the rest.

"The Leeuwenkuil,—where the Klaar water is situated—is a long valley between two ridges of flat-topped hills. At the upper end of the valley is a copious spring, which renders the whole a sort of morass. Further down, the waters are collected into a bed, and the slopes on both sides are amazingly fertile. This part has been particularly devoted to agricultural purposes. Equal shares, from five to six acres, are portioned out and allotted to those who have industry to cultivate them. On the slopes of the hills which border the great valley, some small stone houses are already erected; and somewhat lower down is a very neat house, built of wood and bricks, with a kitchen garden adjoining, which belongs to the most distinguished among the Bastards, by name Moses. The greatest industry and spirit of order reigned in this household,—more than is often to be found in African farms. Maize and tobacco were cultivated in the garden, with the usual vegetables for culinary purposes. Not far from the spring was the half-finished building designed for a church."

Mr. Anderson in his journal, acknowledges gratefully the respect paid him by these gentlemen; he considered it as a great honour conferred upon him in the sight of the heathen. The people from this time became more obedient; and his health daily advancing, his outward situation became as life from the dead. His missionary labours were also blessed, and he was successfully engaged in instructing his people, when a copy of General Jansen's proclamation reached him, forbidding him to teach his pupils to write, without express permission. And some time after, he received a summons to repair to the Cape, as the governor wished to have a personal interview with him. This order he obeyed; but when he arrived at Cape-Town, he found it in possession of the British, and Sir David Baird at the head of the government. The station at that time was in a flourishing situation; the number of inhabitants, men, women, and children, was seven hundred and eighty-four, of whom eighty could read. All expressed a great desire to hear the word of life, and many were brought to a saving knowledge of divine things.

Whatever tended to elevate the character or rank of the aborigines, was an object of hatred and dread to the Boors. Their dislike to General Dundas arose from his being an uniform friend to their improvement, and a steady and determined enemy to their oppression. This dislike extended to the whole system of British government during the time he was at the head of it; and by keeping a number of farmers at a distance from their rulers, allowed the situation of the poor Hottentots to be more freely represented, and more fairly, than if these gentlemen had been upon friendly terms with the governor. To him, therefore, any proposal for obstructing the progress of knowledge among the natives would have been hopeless. But with the Dutch governor their conduct was entirely different; they surrounded him the moment he landed; and, having first gained his ear, succeeded in exciting his prejudices against all missionary attempts, but particularly those of Dr. Vanderkemp, because, while he endeavoured to instruct the Hottentots in the principles of religion, he could not be a silent spectator of their enormous wrongs. Whether the Doctor was equally well fitted with the Moravian brethren for founding a missionary settlement, or whether his previous habits, his highly cultivated mind, and great literary talents did not in some degree tend to hinder his practical efforts in teaching a savage nation the first rudiments of arts and manufactures, as the Dutch Governor and his advisers appear to have imagined, we shall not stop to inquire; but his unconquerable love of justice, and his unmitigated abhorrence of oppression, rendered him exactly the person calculated to open the road for obtaining a redress of those grievances under which the Hottentots groaned. In addition to this unpardonable offence, he had early begun to teach his pupils writing; and as the Boors knew no way of rivalling the race they abused and despised, but by keeping them still in ignorance, they deprecated strongly this outrage against their established superiority. By what method of reasoning they contrived to bend General Jansen to their purpose, it is not easy to conceive: but he appears early to have imbibed their antipathy to Hottentot penmanship; for in his very first interview with Dr. Vanderkemp, he endeavoured to persuade the Doctor that it was unnecessary, if not improper, to teach persons just emerging from barbarism, the art of writing. The missionary could not see the subject in the same light—he considered it an advantage which he could not conscientiously withhold without a positive prohibition; and that the governor did not at that time think it proper to impose.

Not only did these savages, the colonists, wish to keep the Hottentots in the grossest ignorance and the most debasing degradation, but they treated them with a cruelty beyond what they would have exercised towards their slaves, or even their cattle. Among the articles in the charter granted to the institution at Bethelsdorp, was one requiring the missionaries to promote their entering into the service of the farmers; but, familiar as Vanderkemp was with the treatment they experienced, his soul revolted at such an injunction, and in 1804, he repeatedly remonstrated against it. "We thought it our duty," says the journal, "to declare, in a letter written April — to the governor, by brother Vanderkemp, that our consciences would not permit us longer to observe that hard article of the settlement granted to our institution, by which we were recommended to encourage the voluntary engagement of the Hottentots into the service of the colonists, on account of the cruelty and injustice with which those who entered into their service were treated, without any justice being done to them by the magistrates. In answer to this, the governor ordered the landrost of this district to take the necessary steps. This not being done, and the oppression of these inhuman wretches, who call themselves Christians, for the greatest part continuing unpunished, we find ourselves constrained to persist in our declaration, trusting that the Lord, to whose tribunal we have appealed, will do what is right and consistent with the honour of his name, as he has in some respects visibly shown. These Christians we have mentioned, seem equally devoid of common sense and humanity. One of them out of our neighbourhood went lately to the Cape, where he, without any ceremony, applied to the governor to destroy us; to which the governor replied by asking him whether he had not seen the gallows since he arrived at the Cape? Reiterated applications, however, and slanders frequently repeated, had their usual effect. The righteous complaints of the missionary were neglected; but he was not so readily forgiven for having made them."

For the concurrence of the Dutch government in the means proposed by the farmers to rivet the bonds of ignorance, and vassalage upon the Hottentots, some apology, or shadow of apology, may be sought in the supposed necessity that existed in their then critical situation of cultivating their friendship, though at the expense of their own interest, and the true and permanent interest of the colony. But what object they could propose by obstructing the civilization of the Caffres and neighbouring tribes, and joining the wicked and foolish plans of the Boors, to shut out knowledge from them, exceeds all rational comprehension. Yet were the missionaries in the most peremptory manner forbid to enter the bounds of Caffraria. The Caffres, however, still retained a strong veneration for the character of Tinkhanna, and parties of them frequently visited Bethelsdorp. At the commencement of the year, two of the rebel chiefs, Slambi and Conga, having quarrelled among themselves, had recourse to hostile operations against each other, when the latter being worsted, was pursued pretty far into the colony, and many of his adherents, among whom were an uncle and sister, took refuge in the institution;—Slambi did not follow, but he sent a white ox as a present to Dr. Vanderkemp, with a request that he would procure rain, of which he stood greatly in need. The ox was sent back, with an answer suitable to the foolish demand, and he soon after left the place. But some of his people stole one of the cows belonging to the establishment. They were traced by their footsteps to the horde of Kamma, one of his subordinate captains, to whom some Hottentots were sent to reclaim the cow, or demand another in its stead. The cow was slaughtered and eaten, but the horde was condemned to pay as many head of cattle as would satisfy the claimants. Upon which the Hottentots contented themselves with taking five beasts, and were assured that the thieves, if taken, would be exemplarily punished. Kamma likewise sent his staff to brother Vanderkemp, with a message purporting how sorry he was that he could not write to express the feelings of his heart towards them.

Within one short month the rebel chiefs were reconciled and joined in confederacy against Gika. The visit, however, of Conga's people to the institution was attended by most important consequences: Tzjaatzoe, a brave chieftain belonging to that tribe, requested the missionaries to take charge of the education of his son, which they cheerfully agreed to, and not long after, Conga himself paid them a visit, and after staying some days, committed two of his sons to their care. Thus unexpectedly, by these occurrences, was the hand of God defeating the machinations of his enemies, and preparing the way for the entrance of the gospel of the kingdom into the heart of Caffraria, and raising up missionaries from among the people themselves, with whom the colonists could have no pretext for interfering, to proclaim to their countrymen the glad tidings of salvation.

These proceedings raised such a clamour against Dr. Vanderkemp, that in April 1805 he was summoned to the Cape to answer for his conduct. During the first quarter of the year the hearts of the missionaries had been gladdened by the apparent manifestation of the Redeemer's grace to some poor heathens, so that from the 1st of January to the day they left the institution, eight adults were baptized, besides five young children. Five or six others, among whom was a Caffre women, gave pleasing evidence of sincere conversion. They also experienced an increasing blessing attending the ordinances, and it happened more than once that Mr. Read's voice was drowned while preaching, by the crying of the people: their emotion was especially perceptible at the love-feasts and at the Lord's-supper, which they partook of every Sabbath. Mr. Ulbricht, who had arrived from Europe with Mr. Kicherer, joined the institution on the 3d of March, to the great joy of the previous labourers, who received him as a third missionary. He was followed by Mr. Tromp, with his wife, and Tetje Bakker, who had laboured for some time before at the Cape, and at Wagon-maker's valley, where, from the new regulations adopted by the government, he had met with many difficulties, which had often induced Dr. Vanderkemp to invite him to come to Bethelsdorp, where he might reside till another way should open to him; and now the effect of the late proclamation was to oblige him to comply. These brethren immediately commenced assisting the seniors. Mrs. Tromp was a most valuable acquisition, both by discoursing experimentally with the women, and by erecting a knitting-school for the young girls.

Scarcely had these been initiated into the duties of the place, when it became evident that they had been providentially directed thither, to supply to the Hottentots the loss of their teachers, of whom they were about to be bereaved. Three days after their arrival, Dr. Vanderkemp received an order from the governor to repair to the Cape without delay, —Mr. Reid to accompany him. The direction of the institution was then committed to Mr. Ulbricht, with the assistance of the other missionaries; and the two brethren prepared to obey the summons. The day before their departure, Dr. Vanderkemp baptized a Hottentot sister, and spoke, at the last love-feast they held together, from 2 Sam. xv. 25.—"If I shall find favour in the eyes of the Lord, he will bring me again, and show me both it and his habitation; but if he thus say, I have no delight in thee; behold here am I, let him do to me as seemeth good unto him." Mr. Read spoke to the people on the same evening from Rev. xxi. 6.—"It is done. I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end." The impression that was made upon both these occasions is not easy to describe. Next morning, 29th April, they departed, after Mr. Tromp had recommended them to God in prayer; in a heart-breaking manner taking leave of those who, to use their own expression, "were dearer to them than the light of their eyes." The greater part followed as long as they could; and when all of them had returned, one after another, a little girl stopped, and refused to depart: her they took with them. They had likewise the son of the Caffre chief who had been intrusted to their care. On their way to the Cape they met another missionary, Smith, who had obtained leave to reside at Bethelsdorp: and thanked the Lord who had cared for their dear congregation, now provided with three missionaries. They completed their journey in five weeks, and arrived at their ultimate destination on the 2d of June.

While they were detained at the Cape, soliciting either a trial or a release, they were greatly encouraged and strengthened by Mrs. Smith, a widow, now in the fifty-fifth year of her age, and in a weak state of health, whose life had been devoted to useful and philanthropic objects. Apprehensive that the missionaries might not be permitted to resume their labours, this heroic woman disposed of her property, and relinquished the comforts of civilized life, that she might supply their lack of service. The importance she attached to the education of youth, the success which had attended her labours in Cape-Town in that department, the talents for which she was distinguished, the high respectability of her character, and her affectionate zeal, qualified her in an eminent degree for the duties of her new station. Her efforts succeeded in bringing together many of the children of the people, with their parents, to the reading school. She formed a school of industry; both which she constantly superintended. And while she was exerting her influence to impart to the minds of the people a taste for instruction, reviving and improving the reading school, and conducting the school of industry, she was no less assiduous in visiting them in their houses, and teaching them the decencies of life; conversing with the females apart; and endeavouring to impress their minds with the power of religion, assembling with them in their social meetings, and expounding to them the word of God. And she had the satisfaction of seeing several females under her tuition, receive the first principles of the Christian character, who afterwards became members of the mission church.

Worn out by eight months' detention in Cape-Town, and finding all their applications for permission to return to Bethelsdorp, or to continue their missionary work in any other district of the colony, or to traverse it, in order to undertake an exploratory excursion into the adjacent countries beyond its limits, the brethren Vanderkemp and Read began to revolve in their minds the propriety of attempting a new mission beyond the reach of their persecutors, and turned their eyes to Madagascar and the coast of Mozambique. Besides, as they saw no prospect of the violent opposition to their labours within the colony ceasing, but rather, owing to the harmony established between the governor and the Boors, that it would extend to every missionary establishment, the Doctor proposed that the London Society should send to Africa, two companies of well-chosen and resolved missionaries, of at least five or six each; the one to be disembarked on the western shore, out of the reach of the colony, between the Orange river and the tropic; the other on the east coast, N.E. of Caffraria, among the Tambookies; with a view of forming, through time, intermediate missionary settlements from the one extremity to the other, by means of which a communication between the two coasts might be opened, and a chain of missionary posts formed, encircling the colony, at a convenient distance: That the Dutch Society, in concert with the Asiatic Council in Holland, should arrange a regular plan, according to which their missionaries in the colony might be admitted and protected, which, if approved by the Asiatic Council, would be sufficient to give them a claim to the protection of government, which would then find missionary settlements within the colony necessary to prevent emigrations, of the natives towards the settlements without. Should these proposals have been acceded to, it was the intention of the two missionaries to proceed to Madagascar, whence they could easily have joined either of the settlements; but the time of their deliverance was drawing near, when they were to be allowed to return to their beloved Bethelsdorp. In less than a month after the above the plan was sent off, the British obtained possession of the Cape, and they were restored to their affectionate people.

CHAPTER XI.

THE NAMAQUAS

Description of the Namaqua country—Great decrease of the inhabitants—Their cruel treatment by the Boors and the Dutch Government—Their own cruelty to their parents and women—The first missionaries arrive among them—Begin a station at the Happy Deliverance—Numbers of natives flock to them—Extraordinary spirit of inquiry among them—British obtain possession of the Cape—Concluding recapitulation of what had been done for civilizing the savage tribes, and the obstacles opposed at that time to their improvement.

The last attempt for civilizing the aborigines, which took place while the Dutch held the Cape, was that to the Naquama people—a Hottentot tribe, divided into the Great and Little Naquamas. The country they inhabit stretches along the south-western coast from the boundaries of the colony to about 27° south latitude. The Orange river runs through part of the southern quarter, and further North it is watered by several streams; yet owing to the sandy nature of the soil, the district is in general barren, and even the lofty mountains are sterile and bare. Some scattered, but not very considerable fountains yield a supply of water during the whole year, but few of these are sweet, the others being brackish, mineralogic, or warm. Here there are no regular succession of seasons, nor can rainy months be calculated upon, as in other parts of the colony,—their only dependence being the thunder storms, by which the land is occasionally watered. There are no large trees or timber, and even the mimosa are scarce,—a few roots and bulbs are the only edible vegetables,—of wild fruit there is none. There is, however, wild honey in the mountains, and plenty of game. The antelope species is abundant.

Barrow thus describes this people, when the British first took possessisn of the Cape—"In that part of the Namaqua country lying between the Khamies and the Groote or Orange river, water is rarely to be met with, except in the periodical streams that flow from the mountains, under beds of sand, in which the natives, when such existed, used to dig deep wells, and cover them over to prevent evaporation. These plains are now desolate and uninhabited. All those numerous tribes of Namaquas, once possessed of vast herds of cattle, are, in the course of a century, dwindled away to four hordes, which are not very numerous, and in a great measure are subservient to the Dutch peasantry who dwell among them. The latter, who have seized upon the choicest part of their country, allow them to erect their huts in the neighbourhood of their farms, on condition of their furnishing a certain number of people to protect their cattle against the attacks of Bushmen or wild beasts of prey. A dozen years more, and probably a shorter period, will see the remains of the Naquama nation in a state of entire servitude." Such are the effects of an encroaching peasantry, sanctioned by the low policy of a government, that could descend to employ agents to effect the purchase of whole herds of cattle for a cask of brandy. To this government was so little a concern of such great magnitude, that it authorized these agents, for the greater convenience of transporting their brandy, to make an expensive road across a point of the Kamies-berg, which still bears the honourable name of the Company's Road. The government having fixed no limits to their colony, nor their subjects to their avarice, the latter found it still more convenient to settle themselves in the midst of the harmless Namaquas, who considered them as the most acceptable neighbours in the world. For a bottle of brandy, which cost sixpence, they willingly exchanged an ox; and such is the infatuation of this people for the noxious liquor, that they will even now exchange a sheep for the same quantity of it. Yet they produced among themselves a strong and intoxicating liquor from honey. Their language and customs are similar to those of the Hottentots already described; and notwithstanding the epithet of "harmless" bestowed upon them by this traveller, their cruelty to their parents and to their women was unnatural and barbarous.

On the arrival of a missionary at one of their kraals, he observed a young man, about sixteen years of age, dragging his mother along by the hair of her head.—the people all the while looking on with the utmost indifference; and when asked how they could witness such a scene, replied with the greatest coolness—"It is no more than our common practice."

When another, after two years' residence among them, was about to take a temporary leave, the women, who had felt the beneficial effects of his instructions in ameliorating their condition, and entreating him to remain, thus portrayed their former state: "Before you came among us, we were in the most wretched condition; we were treated by the men as brutes, and worse than they treated brutes. When we were at home we had all our houses to build and keep in repair; we had every day to go abroad to seek for roots and honey, and firewood. During the time we were employed in this kind of labour, the men were generally idle. When we returned at night with what we had gathered for their subsistence and our own, we dared not sit down in their presence, without their permission; and if we had been unsuccessful, as was often the case, we were generally beaten. When they went to hunt, in addition to our cooking utensils and our young children, we were compelled to carry what they wanted for their own use, while they walked before us, and left us to follow, as if we had been beasts of burden. When they had killed their game, we had to cook for them, and we were not allowed to taste a morsel till they had satisfied themselves: and when they had eaten, we were obliged to retire from their presence, to consume the offals given to us. Should you depart, we shall be worse than if you had never come among us."

The first missionaries who visited the great Namaquas did not estimate that tribe at more than five thousand souls, and their accounts of the circumstances in which they were, agree pretty nearly with that above quoted. These missionaries were three in number, Messrs. C. and A. Ulbricht, and M. Sydenfaden, who had been sent by the Netherland Society. They left Cape-Town in May, and after encountering the hunger, thirst, weariness, and alarm that a few defenceless, and not very experienced travellers were naturally exposed to in crossing a desert, whose only inhabitants were the wild beasts, and hardly less wild men, they reached the Orange river, where they remained three months. By means of the youngest son of Cornelius Kok, who acted as interpreter, they were enabled to preach to the Little Namaquas; and it was matter of joy that this youth not only understood, but himself preached the gospel to the heathen. At the recommendation of the old man, they removed further east, visited another of his sons, Adam Kok, with whom they remained for some time, cultivating the acquaintance of the natives on the opposite side of the river; while one of the brethren, C. Ulbricht, made an excursion into the great Namaqua country, to spy out the land. In the beginning of November, he returned with intelligence that he had found two large fountains,—one he named "the Silent Hope," and the other "the Happy Deliverance:" near which he thought a settlement might be formed. Messengers from different quarters followed, earnestly entreating the missionaries to come among them, and instruct them in the way of salvation.

Cheered by these exhilarating prospects, they left Kok's on the 31st of January, and about midnight reached the Silent Hope. Next day, the heathen who had assembled requested him to perform divine service, with which they readily complied,—thanking God for having preserved them during their journey, and brought them safely to this people; and prayed that he would qualify them for their work and make them useful: that He himself would open the hearts of the heathen, and that his Word might find entrance. At noon, departing thence, they arrived at the Happy Deliverance, four miles distant, where they proposed to fix their abode. Here they immediately began to prepare houses and to lay out their gardens; and had the happiness of being soon surrounded by numbers of Namaquas who understood Dutch, and to whom they could at once announce the glad tidings they brought. At first they had been discouraged from settling on this spot, because Africaner had his kraal at no great distance, and his son frequently resided at "the Silent Hope;" but there was no other part in that district that afforded any promise of supporting an establishment except where they were; they therefore committed themselves to God, and went forward; and at no distant date they had the pleasure of seeing many of his people, and even the dreaded "monster" himself, come to hear the word of God. Of the faith and courage displayed by the missionaries upon this occasion, some idea may be formed by reverting to the character of Africaner, the terror not only of the natives, but of the colonists,—proscribed, desperate, and stained with the most atrocious crimes. Besides these, upwards of three hundred Hottentots, Oorlams, i. e. those who had resided among the Christians, and River Hottentots, i. e. those who inhabited the banks of the Orange river,—had an opportunity of being instructed in the truths of the Gospel, and showed every inclination to settle and improve their advantages. Sometimes the wandering Bushmen visited them, and listened to "the good words." "It appears to us," say they in their letters, "that the heathen have a desire to be acquainted with the word of salvation; and we, though we suffer poverty and are in want of all earthly comforts, which we could have enjoyed in our native country, yet we are satisfied if we perceive that our feeble endeavours are not without a blessing from on high."

Indeed, throughout the whole of South Africa, there seemed to be an extraordinary spirit of inquiry and desire for instruction excited; and over these desert regions, so long without the showers of heaven which water the earth and make it fruitful, there now hung a little cloud like a man's hand, while others seemed gathering on the distant horizon. The hope of the missionaries accepted the sign, and their souls were cheered by anticipating the sound of abundance of rain.

When the British again obtained possession of the Cape, their arrival was hailed as a new era, and the friends of the aborigines greeted them as the deliverers of the oppressed. How they fulfilled these high and honourable expectations, forms a section not the least interesting in the history of the civilization of South Africa, which we hope shortly to lay before our readers. But in bringing the present to a close, we shall briefly recapitulate what had been previously accomplished, and the obstacles that had to be overcome. Before the Moravians attempted the civilization of the natives, it had been given up in despair; and when they had shown what was practicable, they had to encounter the violent opposition of the Boors, which acquired strength from the imbecility of the Dutch government in revolutionary times. While the colony remained in the possession of their East India Company, though the cruel selfishness of the colonists making daily aggressions on the property and liberty of the Hottentots, and although the colonial government winked at, and even partook of the unhallowed spoliations, yet there was no public recognition of the right of the farmers to oppress; and if any complaint reached the mother-country, the charges were evaded, not met; while the freedom of the natives and their property in the soil were fully acknowledged. The opposition, therefore, which was raised to the instruction of the heathen, appeared to proceed entirely from the hatred which the world has ever shown to the progress of the gospel. It was not till the scattered remnants of the original possessors of the soil began to be treated with common justice; and the formation of one village of industrious inhabitants showed, not only the possibility but the probability that they might again obtain a status in their own land, and enjoy in fact, what they had in name—personal liberty,—perhaps political freedom. It was not till then, that the indignation of the farmer declared the interest he had in maintaining the thraldom of the natives, and opposing their civilization.

The Dutch Company's government had, greatly to their credit, protected and encouraged the rising settlement of Bavian's Kloof, till it attained a degree of internal strength, and exhibited an example of order, utility, and beauty, which would have rendered its open destruction a dishonourable, if not a dangerous attempt, by any of their servants, especially in the face of their reiterated professions of regard for the welfare and religious instruction of the heathen. Self-interest, however, is a wonderfully acute casuist, and corporations are almost uniformly insensible to shame: the Company had greatly declined, and, although never remarkably scrupulous in their dealings with their uncultivated neighbours, their agents had latterly become more extensively rapacious; the missionary settlement was a powerful check upon them, and there were strong symptoms that they would have joined in getting it gradually removed, when the British first obtained possession of the country, and was providentially the means of preserving, at that time, this precious germ of civilization among a degraded race.

Most happily, during the few years the British had possession of the Cape, its government was intrusted to men who had no common feeling with the Boors, and no interest in the country beyond its welfare. The names of Craig, Macartney, and Dundas, will ever be held in grateful remembrance, for the humanity, equity, and wisdom, of their rule,—the attention they paid to the rights of the aborigines, and the regard they showed for their moral elevation. The restrictions which, during the last years of the late government, had been laid upon the "free" Hottentots, were suspended; and the missionary establishment of the United Brethren was not only not checked, but received every encouragement which a religious society ought to receive from the civil power,—protection in the unfettered exercise of their duty, and occasional assistance to aid them in their distress. Impressed with the importance of missionary labours, none of the British governors ever dreamed of prohibiting their extension among the savages without the bounds of the colony, while Governor Dundas promoted and excited their exertions within it.

The dissatisfaction of the Boors with the British was favourable to the civilization of the Hottentots. Rough, uncultivated, lazy, and tyrannical, these men, little removed from the first stage of barbarous society, were miserable agriculturists, and led, in general, a kind of nomade life, subsisting almost entirely upon the produce of their herds and flocks; to support which, immense tracks of country were necessary, for, unacquainted with the production of artificial grasses, they trusted to the spontaneous and natural herbage; and when one pasture-field was exhausted, they removed their cattle to another, till the periodical rains had called into life a new vegetation. To them, unfeeling, unthinking, and injudicious governors, granted thousands of acres,* including often the ground on which native kraals were situated, and the only springs within a district. As a peasant himself was incapable, had he been even inclined, to manage his herds, the first settlers procured slaves; but this required capital, and many of them had nothing. The Hottentots, in this case, presented an easy and cheap substitute; such, therefore, as were not driven off the lands, or did not flee to the deserts, became serfs of the soil, and were compelled to act as herdsmen to the usurpers of their own ground. In consequence, the Boors endeavoured, by every method of intimidation and cruelty, to prevent their receiving the first elements of civilization; and a general combination was raised against Christianity and its missionaries.

This the British governors did something to counteract; but their time was so short, and the tenure by which the colony was held so uncertain, that they did not attempt so much as they ought. The insurrectional movements of the Boors in part supplied this deficiency, and drove the oppressed Hottentots to seek refuge under the British, against whom the peasants wished them to fight. Numbers thus came under instruction; and numbers were formed into corps to aid in crushing the rebellion; while all who wished it were at liberty to join any Christian missionary station. Of this many availed themselves. And when the colony was restored to the Dutch, Bavian's Kloof was in a flourishing condition. There was a promising station at Graaf-Reinet; and Dr. Vanderkemp had collected around him a number of inquirers. There were also stations without the colony among the Bushmen, the Corrannas, and the Bastard tribes.

Civilization had advanced considerably, while the British retained possession, both without and within the bounds of the colony; but unfortunately nothing was done to secure the advantages already gained, or to assist its progress. There were no decisive steps taken to repress the tyranny of the Boors,—to punish their cruelties and their crimes against the aborigines, nor to establish the supremacy of the laws. It is true, the overflowings of oppression were suspended, and the damage they had done partially repaired, but no mounds were raised to prevent their recurrence, and save the fields that were beginning to blossom from their future ravages. The sullen stream was suffered to roll darkly in its rugged channel, while the British, like temporary tenants, did not think themselves warranted to expend much treasure in cultivating a country on an uncertain lease.

* One insatiable landrost had upwards of 70,000 acres granted him.

When the Dutch received the colony in 1802–3, they found it in a state of disorganization. The finances were deranged; and although our countrymen had expended immense sums. (about fifteen millions, it is said,) yet the people, except the traders in Cape-Town, were discontented, and the wrongs of the Hottentots were yet to be redressed. The commissary-general, De Mist, instantly commenced the arduous task of reducing to order the internal affairs, and drew up regulations for their management, which would probably have led to the amelioration of the condition of the natives within the boundary line, had time been allowed for consolidating the system. And Governor Jansen, acting in a similar spirit of equity, settled a peace with the Caffres and Bushmen, on terms which, if observed, would have preserved their territories inviolate, and their persons secure; but these amicable adjustments were also deranged, by the renewal of hostilities in Europe, which deprived the colonial government of power to enforce obedience, and threw it once more into the arms of the farmers.

Had De Mist remained, he might have seen and checked the evils of the colonial system, for he uniformly acted upon the acknowledgment of the Hottentots as a free people, and upon the principle that religion alone could reclaim from the wilds of barbarism a savage population.* But Jansen was a soldier,—the country required to be defended,—and he needed the assistance of the Boors. They thus obtained an undue influence, and it was exerted to retard civilization. The consequences were, retrograde movements on the part of the government,—a prohibition to instruct the Caffres,—and restrictions and limitations upon all missionary exertions. The Moravians were the most favoured; that is to say, they suffered least. Their institution, from the longer time it had been in existence, and its excellent situation, presented an appearance of civilization equal to the villages of Europe, while the unfortunate circumstances in which Dr. Vanderkemp was placed, retarded the progress of his people. The governor most unfairly comparing and contrasting the two together,—and imagining that the brethren had first induced the heathen to be laborious and diligent, before they communicated to them the doctrines of the Gospel,—conceived a prejudice against the other, as being but little calculated for training the people to industrious habits; and, without examining the subject, hastily concluded that the Doctor misunderstood the process, and had commenced where he should have ended, by teaching the doctrines of Christianity, when he ought to have been teaching the arts of life.

Jansen was too well acquainted with the world to use his old friend impolitely, and allowed him the frank liberty of former acquaintanceship; but he had no sympathy in his philanthropic exertions, and never encouraged or entered fully into his views. He condescended, however, to argue the matter in a private correspondence, which afforded the missionary the fairest opportunity for displaying the warmth of his feeling, and the risings of his heart, in the cause of oppressed humanity. "You acknowledge," says the venerable man in one of his letters, "the great wrong that the colonists, perhaps here and there, do to the Hottentots. This expression, governor, shows that you are still uninformed of the true situation of things in this country, or at least in the Wittenhage district. Not perhaps here and there, but very certainly, and pretty nearly in all parts, does this oppression prevail. Nor is it only particular inhabitants, but the landrosts themselves,—from whom the oppressed ought to find protection,—who make themselves guilty in this respect. The landrost Alberti has thought it fit to oblige the Hottentots who were free, and settled here [Bethelsdorp] with their wives and children, to hire themselves to the inhabitants; and with the violence of corporeal punishment, by an armed force, to drag away out of their houses at Bethelsdorp others who had declared themselves not inclined to the military service: Hottentots, who, according to your own words, are free-born, and on the ground which originally belonged to them, should be able to find freedom, security, and the means of subsistence. This freedom, violated in both instances, I reclaim with that confidence which your own hand-writing gives me, for those who, without your interference, are in danger of losing it; and when complaints can in no other way reach your ear of their wrongs and cruelties,—the account of which, in case I might bring to light a history of my time, would fill a middling book,—I will not here speak.

"I readily acknowledge the duty which I lie under as their teacher, as much as possible, to bind the Hottentots to the government of the land. All the reciprocal duties between rulers and subjects are grounded in religion; and the disowning and neglecting this truth is just what makes our befooled mother-country unhappy. It is one part of a Christian subject's duty, in subordination to God and in all that is not contrary to his command, to obey and love the government. Christ having brought me into these parts of the world to promote his religion among the heathen, I hope in enforcing his duty I have not been wanting. But with all this, no one possessing a sound understanding, and who is acquainted with the human heart, can expect among the Hottentots, who are yet deaf to the voice of the Gospel, that there should be brought about by the persuasion of missionaries alone, an attachment to the welfare of the government, so long as these Hottentots are deprived of the priviliges of citizens, which the colonists enjoy,—particularly while the government of the country, by treating them worse than Pharoah did the children of Israel in Egypt, appears to set everything to work, which are sure to break this attachment."

Plain dealing is usually very unpalatable to people in power: what answer the general returned in private to this noble and manly expostulation, we know not,—his public answer was the summons to the Cape, which has been already noticed. Yet this very circumstance accelerated the process it was intended to retard, by causing the care of the rude but rising institution to be committed to Mrs. Smith, who introduced among the females the occupations becoming their sex, with an effect which no other person upon the spot at the time possessed the requisite talents for producing.

As the Batavian republic had the Cape under their management so short a time, it were needless to expatiate upon what would have been the consequence had they retained possession; but of one serious evil they were sufficiently aware,—an evil which threatened alike the colony and the natives,—the one with demoralizing ruin, the other with extermination, or a more dreadful and horrid savagism than that from which the missionaries were destined to rescue them,—the illimited extension of the boundaries of the colony. Since the portentous epoch when the revolution of France shook the world to its basis, no nation ever possessed the power that was committed into the hands of Britain for doing good; but till lately they had done little for the poor Africans, and much yet remains for them to do.

---

* It is strange that this principle should be denied by "philosophers," when we have no record of any savage race being ever reduced to civilization but by the influence of that bond which, borrowing the word from their first conquerors, the natives of our island have termed "religion." Lycurgus, Solon, Numa, asked its aid.

CHRISTIAN REMEMBRANCER;

OR,

SHORT REFLECTIONS UPON THE FAITH, LIFE, AND CONDUCT, OF A REAL CHRISTIAN.

BY AMBROSE SERLE.

OF THESE THINGS PUT THEM IN REMEMBRANCE.—2. TIM. II. 14.

PART I.

CHAP. I.

ON THE ENTRANCE INTO SPIRITUAL LIFE.

"WHEREWITH shall I come before the Lord, and bow myself before the high God?" How shall I, a sinner, approach the eyes of that Majesty, which cannot look upon sin without abhorrence? My iniquities are more in number than the hairs of my head; and my heart sinks within me on their remembrance. My affections are naturally all inclined to the world, and worldly things. My judgment is depraved; my will is perverse; my understanding is darkened; my knowledge vain; and I see nothing within me, or about me, but what by guilt is altogether defiled. I have sore proof of that Scripture, "that every imagination of the thoughts of man's heart is only evil continually," and that "from the sole of the foot, even to the head, there is no soundness" in my nature; but only "the wounds, and bruises, and putrefying sores" of sin.

How then can I please God? How shall such a worm, such a lump of perverse ungodliness, obtain his favour? Shall I seek to deserve it by my own good thoughts? Alas! I am not sufficient of myself to think even one. Shall I by excellency of words approach my offended Maker? He regards not words, but the spirit and the heart; and my spirit and heart are wholly defiled. Shall I then by good works attempt to render him propitious? O my God, where shall I find them? How can I begin to act, before I have begun to think, what is right? How can the exercises of the body be pure and free, when the soul is unholy, and enslaved by sin? And if, from this day, I could cease from evil, and do perfectly what is just and right, which the experience of all men tells me is impossible; yet what will become of the long black catalogue of iniquities, both in heart and life, which are already written against me? How shall I wipe off the sins of my nature and my life, respecting the times that are past?

O Lord, thou hast revealed thyself, as a holy God, and a just. Thou hast declared, that thou wilt not spare the guilty. And I have offended thy righteous law in every hour, and every action of my life. How then can I be saved? How is it possible for me to escape the wrath to come? My anxieties, like my sins, might justly overwhelm me; and I ought to tremble at the righteous judgment, which I know I deserve. There are but a few days, at the most, for me to live upon earth; and I am not sure of one. O, how shall I flee from the wrath to come? how shall I avoid eternal burnings, in which no man can dwell but with misery, and of which no man can think strictly without horror? Lord, can such a sinner as I escape? Canst thou have mercy upon me?

Such are the breathings of the heart when it first begins to awake, and live, and feel that there is an evil, and a curse in sin, and that sin, with all its evils, lieth at the door.

CHAP. II.

THE METHOD OF MERCY.

SUCH a flowing from the heart, as that just mentioned, gladdens all heaven. It is the motion of the divine Spirit upon the troubled deep, and will ere long produce both life and peace.

Soul, dost thou feel the power of thy own corruption? Are these thy meek, yet bitter cries? O hear, and may thy God enable thee to believe, the glad tidings of his own salvation!

Thou art a sinner, it is true; and thy mercy it is, to see, in due measure, how great a sinner thou art. It is the first line in the large book of humiliation, which thou must be reading all thy life long. But Christ died for sinners such as thee; for all sinners that come unto God by him; for the vilest of sinners, that see the vileness of sin, and bemoan it, as thou dost. He saved Mary Magdalene the harlot, Matthew the publican, Paul the persecutor, Peter the swearer, liar, and denier of his Master, the malefactor on the cross, who had been a thief and a murderer, and ten thousand more like thee; and he hath just the same power, means, and mercy to save thy soul, even thine.

He saves graciously, that is, freely; because no wisdom nor worth of man could have contrived or obtained his greatness of salvation. It was planned in grace, and performed by grace. It is all of grace, and bounty, and love, from beginning to end.

For this purpose he came into the world, and took our nature upon him. He took it in its meanest and humblest form; and was content to be born in a stable, to be brought up by a labouring man, to labour with him too, to suffer the worst evils of human life, and the sorest pains of human death, that so he might be an oblation or sacrifice in the stead of his people, and render an atonement to the justice of God for them. These sufferings, and this atonement, are the debt due to the law and holiness of God, without which, consistently with his attributes, he could not spare the sinner; but by which he can be both "just," and yet "the Justifier" of him who taketh refuge in Jesus. Yea, this dear Saviour having paid the penalty due to his transgressions, God is now faithful and just to forgive him his sins; or rather more faithful and just to forgive them, than he could be in laying on the punishment again, which Christ endured in that behalf.

Christ also lived upon earth to fulfil all righteousness; and he fulfilled it completely for his redeemed. He makes himself over to them; and all he hath is theirs, through faith in him. Thus they have a right to call him, what he is, "The Lord our righteousness." God is well pleased for his righteousness' sake, and beholds every poor sinner who trusts in Christ, and lives in him, as unblamable and unreprovable in his own most piercing sight; yea, without spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing. This righteousness is that garment of salvation, which covers them wholly, and fits them perfectly for the kingdom of heaven.

Contrite soul, believest thou this? Is this good news, the very gospel, or good news of God? Search and see. Read and pray over thy Bible, and thou wilt find, that it is the very voice and will of thy Lord. O that the fallow, the hard and barren ground of thy heart, may be so broken up by his power, as to welcome this joyful news, like the thirsty soil receiving the showers from the skies!

CHAP. III.

THE SOUL'S DIFFICULTY IN EMBRACING MERCY.

These are glad tidings indeed (the soul may say) to one weary and heavy laden with sin as I am, could they be apprehended rightly, and maintained constantly, in the strivings of sin, and the doubtings of nature. I am, therefore, earnest to know these two things: 1. How shall I embrace this mercy of Christ proposed in the gospel? And, 2. How shall I keep up the spirit and intentions of it in my heart and life, so as to endure to the end, and be saved?

I know not how it is with others, but I find myself very unable, nay, most unable when I have the greatest occasion, to lay hold upon this mighty mercy of God; to rest upon it, and make it my own; and to use it for my consolation and support. I long for this with the full purpose of my heart; and my groans and tears in secret are well known unto God. But I have also an evil heart of unbelief, which suggests a thousand doubts and fears, sometimes of God's willingness to save me particularly, who am so very vile and faithless; and, sometimes of my own reality of desire towards him, which is often dreadfully mixed with the desire of other things, and overwhelmed with cares and sorrows, difficulties and temptations. O what great troubles and adversities hath God shown me! How shall I be delivered from the body of this death? How shall I lay hold on eternal life? How shall I know that I have fast hold; or be assured, that none shall be able to pluck me from it? O Lord, to be assured of this thy favour, is, both in life and death, of more worth to me than a thousand times ten thousand worlds. For I might have these, and be wretched; but, with thee, I can have nothing but life and peace for evermore.

CHAP. IV.

THE NATURE AND EXERCISE OF FAITH.

Faith is the gift and the operation of God. It comes by the Holy Spirit's power, moving and strengthening the sublimest faculties of the soul, and is really a regeneration, a re-begetting, a revival of life from the dead. Thus the believer is said to be "born of the Spirit;" because it is the Spirit's office in the covenant of grace to regenerate, and because it is the promise concerning the Spirit to "all, even as many as God shall call." And thus also the Christian is said to be "born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God."

When this principle of divine life and light is given to the soul, it enables that soul to feel its own loss and misery, and to see its own sin and darkness. A man can have no true sight of the nature of sin, but by this grace. He is, therefore, in some sense, a believer, before he knows himself to be one. Faith acts in him, before he can be sensible of the reflex act of faith. He first lives; then he feels his misery; and cries for mercy. He is then enabled to see the way of mercy in the word of mercy. He is next enlightened to behold the free welcome and rich bounty of his mercy to all returning sinners, and is enabled to view the fitness of God's mercy for him, and his fitness, as a convinced sinner, for it. He is then strengthened to embrace it, like a poor creature who must perish without it, but who shall never perish with it. And, at length, God seals it upon the soul, by giving a true taste of joy and peace in believing; insomuch that the broken drooping heart revives, and is able to say, "I do humbly venture to believe, that Christ died for me, and will save me for evermore."

Now, through all the course of this gracious work, which, according to the will of God, is slower in some than in other's, there is often much doubting and disputing in the man's own conscience. It is a sore struggle, at times, to quell the clamours of unbelief, and the suggestions of Satan; and at last, perhaps, the soul embraces the reality of God's love in Christ, with a trembling kind of hopeless hope and doubting believing. These things often puzzle the understanding, and perplex the whole will and affections. A true believer is like Rebecca labouring with twins, a faithless Esau and a trusting Jacob; and so, like her, he cries out, "If it be so, why am I thus?" Whereas, if it were not so, if he were not of God, it could not be thus. Nature alone would not struggle; nor can what is dead strive against the stream. The whole bent of nature is against grace. So again, if he were all grace and no sin, he would feel no trouble; for the opposition of grace is made to nature, and to the sin which is in it. And it is a good sign, though not a pleasant feeling, that there is this conflict: It demonstrates the life of God to be within.

In this way, the Christian embraces the gospel. He is enabled in hope against hope, to believe it, as the grand charter of his salvation. And this very act of believing is the evidence within, concurring with the evidence of the written word without, that his name is enrolled in the charter, and that he is consequently entitled to all its blessings.

Take heart, therefore, thou child of God, and fear not. Thou hast the promise, the power, the mercy, and the truth of Jehovah on thy side; and who can prevail against him? If thou dost not wholly believe, or art not perfectly cleared from all doubts, be not however dismayed. The faithfulness of thy Lord is not grounded upon the perfect exercise of thy faith, but upon his own sovereign grace and love. Thou desirest to trust him with thy whole heart; but thou never couldest have desired this, if he had not wrought that disposition within thee. He was the Author, and he will be the Finisher, of all in thee, as well as of all for thee. If God did not spare his own son for thy sake, what will he spare beside? Who shall, or who can, lay anything to the charge of God's elect?—It is God himself, with whom there is neither evil nor folly, that justifieth thee from both. Who can condemn thee?—It is Christ, who blotteth out thy sins by his precious blood, or rather is risen again to present thee faultless in his righteousness before the throne, and to plead for thee as that advocate who never lost a cause. Who shall separate thee from the love of Christ? Shall the evils of life, all the distresses of time, and all the rage of the devil? Nay, in all these things thine Almighty Saviour will render thee a conqueror, and more than a conqueror, because he hath loved thee. Oh divine words that follow! From thine inmost affections, from the very ardour and spirit of faith, mayest thou breathe them forth! "I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate me from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus my Lord."

CHAP. V.

ON COMMUNION WITH THE DIVINE PERSONS IN JEHOVAH.

Curious speculations upon the Trinity profit not. There is a sort of knowledge in this, as in other things, which betrays its own falsehood by puffing up the soul. Much time hath been lost, and many hurtful disputes have been raised, concerning the mode of the Son's generation from the Father, and the manner of the Spirit's procession from both; points which have not been revealed, and which therefore are not necessary to faith. It is sufficient for us to apprehend, that there are three Persons in one Jehovah, or self-existent Godhead, and that this Godhead is one; that we are privileged to have communion with these divine Persons in their several offices of salvation; and that, by the unction of the Spirit, we come into the grace of the Son, and possess the love of the Father, now and for evermore. "Through Christ," says the apostle, "we both (i. e. Jews and Gentiles) have an access, by one Spirit unto the Father. And thus the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, are with all true believers in every age of the world." He therefore that doth not thus apprehend the doctrine of the Trinity, only apprehendeth the phantom of his own imagination, and is never the better for his speculation, be it ever so abstruse or refined.

Of what avail to my soul are all the nicest disquisitions of men? I want food and light, reality and enjoyment. These do thy word. O Lord, afford in plentiful measure, when thy grace opens the well-spring to my heart. I am there taught to pray for that anointing of the Holy One, which shall lead and guide me into all thy saving truth. By him I am both instructed and enabled to renounce myself, to put on Christ, and to cleave to my Redeemer as my only portion and hope. By the Spirit and Son of God. I am led up to fellowship with the Father, and to call upon him as my Father, even mine. O my blessed God, my Abba, my Father, my Life, and my all, what hast thou revealed to my poor soul; and how much more hast thou done and prepared, than thou hast hitherto revealed to men; or than men in this state are able to conceive! O thou Fountain of unutterable blessedness, thou unfathomable height and depth of love, help me thus to know thee in the secret of my soul; and may all thy works of providence and grace increase this inward knowledge to the end! While others dispute, let me enjoy. Manifest thy precepts to my mind, and say to my longing spirit, "Peace be unto thee, for I am thy salvation."

One spark of this life is of more worth than the whole universe of notions; for this not only brings an understanding of divine things superior to all speculations, but gives with it a fulness of satisfaction, arising from the very taste and perception of the things themselves. Faith takes them for realities, hope is enkindled by them as such, and love finds them to be so, and embraces them with joy to the end.

CHAP. VI.

ON THE INCARNATION OF CHRIST, BY WHICH HE BECAME IMMANUEL.

Who shall unfold this mystery, or unfathom this love of my God? The Ancient of days became a child of days, and the Lord of all would be the servant of all, that he might be a Redeemer, a Brother, a Friend, of poor unworthy mortals, of vile apostates and rebels, such as I am, and such as, without him, I and all others for ever must have been.

He took our nature without sin, that he might bear our sin. If sin had been in that which he took for himself, it would not have been possible that one, who was sinful, should have taken off sinfulness from others. Thus he, who was not, and could not be a sinner by nature, did, by imputation, become the greatest of sinners: "He bare our sins in his own body on the tree;" and Jehovah "laid upon him the iniquities of us all, when he once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust." This dear Immanuel was a Lamb without spot, and therefore meet to be slain for an atonement; and a scape-goat, or strong-one going off, laden with iniquities; and so able to bear them away into everlasting forgetfulness.

He was very God and very man in one Christ. As Christ he is Immanuel, or God with us. What his name implies, that he truly is. He is God with us, able to save and to succour, able to bless and to enliven, in all our pilgrimage from earth to heaven. "Lo! I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world."

And is this thy promise, O thou meek and lowly Jesus? and shall I be still slow of heart to believe it! Shall I always be hanging my head like a bulrush; and shall my eyes be still gushing out their faithless tears; when thou hast promised not only the best of creatures in earth and heaven, but thine own blessed self to be with me, who art Lord of all? O my dear Redeemer, be so with me by thy gracious power, that I may be deeply sensible of thy continual presence; manifest thyself to me as thou dost not unto the world; for I am thine, and I desire to give up myself, and all I am and have, to thy blessed will for evermore. Be, indeed, according to thy name, my Immanuel, my God, with me and in me of a truth, that I may walk with thee as one agreed, and draw from thee all those supplies of grace, life, and peace, without which I can neither be happy, nor alive to thy glory. O hear and answer, for mine eyes are upon thee!

CHAP. VII.

ON CHRIST'S DESCENT INTO EGYPT.

It behoved this Immanuel in all things to be made like unto his brethren; therefore he went down into Egypt. All he did upon earth had some use and meaning. By some facts he testified what he was doing, and by others, what he would continually do, for his people.

"Out of Egypt have I called my Son," saith the Lord. His redeemed were spiritually in Egypt, the house of bondage. They were there under the service of a cruel king, a prince who ruleth in the world by usurpation till the time appointed. Grievous are the tasks, and sad are the wages, of this tyrant of souls. Jesus went down, and came up again for a sign. As the head of his people, he did this, preaching their redemption from bondage in himself. In their order and times, they come up out of Egypt too, by the strong hand of this Captain of salvation. He is great in might, and therefore not one of them faileth. The prince of the air loseth his dominion over them; and though he follow them like Pharaoh, and chase them all the way, he cannot hinder their course of faith, nor rob them of their Canaan in glory.

Oh marvellous love of my Saviour! Was it not enough for thee to take up my nature in its best estate, without submitting to a manger, to contempt, to persecution, to banishment, and all the wrongs of men? O how low must I be fallen, that it should be needful for thee, (for, if it had not been needful, this act had been spared.) to endure poverty, wretchedness, and shame, that I might be delivered from all! I was in Egypt, and thou camest to me. Thy grace preached liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that were bound. Thy power performed what thy love proclaimed; and thou broughtest the prisoners from the prison, and those that sat in darkness out of the prison-house. I, Oh wonderful to tell! I, among thy ransomed, have followed thee in the regeneration out of this dismal Egypt, and have tasted a little of the glorious liberty of thy children. Not unto me, my dear Saviour, not unto me, but unto thy name be all the praise. I was wallowing in the mire of Egypt, and in the mud of the Nile; I was entirely given up to the filth and pollutions of this world, and should have remained therein, till I had been sunk for ever in its woe; unless thy mighty arm had wrought my deliverance, and set me free. Glory to the, Jehovah-Jesus, thou Saviour all-divine, for mercy unmeasurable like this, for grace and glory yet before me, to which there is no end! O how shall I show forth thy praise for all which thou hast done for my soul!

CHAP. VIII.

ON THE MIRACLES OF CHRIST.

We see but little into the true worth and importance of the miracles of Jesus, if we look no farther than the outward facts. These indeed speak aloud the glory of his divine Person to the carnal sense of man, and did so even to those who hated and blasphemed him; but the grandeur of these works consisted in this, that they were only outward testimonies of the far more noble operations of his grace within the soul, which were not to endure for a time only, like their outward signs, but throughout eternity.

He gave sight to the blind, that he might testify unto men his sovereign power in giving light and understanding to the mind. He opened the deaf ear, that men might know, by whom alone they can hear aright the good news of salvation, and live for ever. The lame he caused, in a moment, to walk, that his people might learn, that they can only move, as well as live by him, and that without him they can do nothing. He cured the foul leprosy of the body, in order to show that only by him can be healed the far more deplorable leprosy of sin, which covers and defiles the mind. All sicknesses vanished at his command, that we might have hope in him, as the only restorer of our souls. The poor, or meek among men, were made rich for eternity. He cast out unclean spirits, and suffered them to possess the swine, who were thereby lost, that he might teach his redeemed, that he only delivered and can deliver them from the powers of darkness, which, being let loose upon the world, drive them violently and swiftly down the steep course of time, into a gulf of inextricable woe. The hungry multitudes were fed by his miraculous power, to explain this great truth, that he is not only the giver of spiritual life, but the constant sustainer and nourisher of it from day to day: and he did this by small means, that the excellency of the power might be known to be his, and not in the creatures, however sanctified, blessed, and used. The winds and waves were instantly obedient to his word. that his beloved might rejoice in him, as the stiller of all spiritual waves, the tumultuous madness of this world, the ragings of Satan, and the confusion of all things. These can roar and foam no longer than it pleaseth him; and when they foam and roar at all, it shall turn out in the end for the good of his people. The dead were raised, to proclaim his rising power, and to declare, that the issues also of spiritual life and of endless death are altogether in his hands. Whatever he did, was an act of mercy, under which he revealed, as in a parable, innumerable lessons of grace and love. All his works proclaimed him to be both the Creator of all, (and what seems more comforting to his chosen,) the Redeemer and Restorer of millions that were lost.

Learn from these things, O believer, what thy Lord God hath done for thy soul. He quickened thee from the death of trespasses and sins; he giveth light and peace to thy mind; he feedeth thee with the bread of life; he cureth all thy spiritual diseases; he quelleth all thy manifold enemies and temptations; he strengthened thee with strength in thy soul; he doeth all that is done in thee by grace; and he will never cease working in the both to will and to do, no, not even when he hath brought thee to his kingdom in heaven.

O pray fervently, my soul, rightly to apprehend these precious things. If thou teach me, blessed Lord, then shall I know them, in some measure at least, according to my capacity, as they ought to be known. Such knowledge, indeed, is too excellent for my clouded faculties of nature; they cannot, if left to themselves, attain unto it. I, therefore, seek not to obtain the apprehension of these truths, as fallen man can teach or attain them, but as thou dost teach and enforce them. In thy teaching, though the substance of the truths be the same, there is a wide difference from all the teaching of men. Man, by his own study, gropeth in the dark, and wearieth himself in vain to reach up to the perception of thine excellent wisdom; but thou art light in thyself, and sendest down both illumination and influence at once to such as are taught by thee, by which they not only know thy truth as a truth in itself, but feel the blessings of it, as a truth applied and made their own. They find strength and nourishment in what thou givest for food, and not airy words, or unprofitable speculations, which, without thee, are all that can be found in the best and wiseth instructions of men. O raise me up, then, my blessed Teacher, above the picture of things, which may be gained by words, to the true enjoyment of the things themselves. So shall I not hear, or give discourse only of thy spiritual feast, like a man in a dream, but shall taste and see indeed how good and gracious thou art, and that all life, power, and consolation are entirely free from thee.

CHAP. IX.

ON THE WORD OF CHRIST.

"For ever," O Lord, "thy word is settled in heaven:" and upon earth "it runneth very swiftly. The righteousness of thy testimonies is everlasting; give me understanding and I shall live."

Such is the word, and the end of the word, of my gracious Redeemer. It is called a word, because it is a revelation; all words being only the revelation or expression of things. This revealed word is settled in heaven upon the throne of God, is ordered by the Divine Persons in all things, and is sure, because ordered by them in a covenant which cannot be broken.

It is a word too of testimony, because it testifieth of my Saviour throughout, either directly by the institutions and declarations of his grace, or indirectly by the course and actions of his providence, meeting in one and the same end, which is the guidance and salvation of his people.

This word, in the conduct of the Divine Spirit, is also a word of power, and the fit instrument of all his work. It is his spiritual sword, by which he divides asunder the soul and spirit, and effects that circumcision of the heart, whereby his people are enabled to live no longer unto themselves, but unto God. The operation is painful indeed to the flesh, or to nature; but it causeth the spirit to rejoice in Christ Jesus, and to give up his confidence in all things beside.

For this purpose, then, of testifying for Christ, and of acting by the Spirit in the redeemed, is all the written word calculated and given. Hence, the institutions of the law preached Jesus and his salvation, the prophecies declared the same truth, the histories are records of God's conduct towards his people from age to age, the gospels are evidences of the accomplishment of all these things in Christ, and the epistles are explanations and enforcements of these things to believers. In short, all the holy writings relate to Christ, and to the redeemed in him. Jesus is the Alpha and the Omega of the whole word and work of the Most High.

In this word and its experience consist all the wisdom and comfort of a Christian. Here is truth without error; so that he may read without fear, and trust without danger. All other books, as they come from men, have more or less of folly or vanity in them, and often are looked over with little true satisfaction and improvement. But, in this volume, grace not only discovers something new, but brings new force out of old truths, which have charmed the soul a thousand times. It discovers the multiform and manifold wisdom of God, in what he hath spoken; insomuch that, from under the vail of one precious instruction, another and another shall arise, as the soul is improved to bear them. These are the steps of the kingdom; and the higher the renewed can ascend, it not only understands better what it hath already passed over, but sees farther and wider into the glories yet before it, till it is ravished with unspeakable delight in the infinite knowledge and love of God.

The right understanding of this word doth not puff up, but humbleth. He hath not a true apprehension of its sense, who is lifted up by it in himself. The lowly reader is the only learner. To him it is not a word lettered or sounded, so much as a living and lively word engrafted. It enters into his heart more than his ears, and it diffuseth its sweet savour through all the faculties, setting them into delightful exercise for the divine glory.

The great depth of the word of God keeps the real Christian ever a learner. He knows that it is impossible to reach the utmost of God's wisdom. There will be always mysteries to be unfolded, because man's capacity is finite; at the bound of which, how wide soever it may extend, remaineth ignorance. One, who had been in the third heaven, and in spirit caught up into paradise itself, where he heard unspeakable words, could only say, when he talked of the divine counsels, "Oh the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!" He could stand on the shore, and see; but all beyond was an infinite ocean.

The true disciple, however, knows enough to make him see the vanity and unprofitableness of all learning and wisdom (if so they may be called) out of Christ. The speculations of men are but dreams, and their pursuits but idle labours at the best, which begin and end in self, and have no higher object than this evil world. The poor simple countryman, who hath learned Christ, (and many such, blessed be God, there are,) can pity the pompous ignorance of those, who know almost everything but God, and the proper value of their own souls. By a logic, far beyond that of the schools, he hath been led to this conclusion, that God is his Father, that Christ is his Saviour, that the Holy Spirit is his Guide, that the Bible is his charter and his library, that the devil, and the world, and the flesh are his foes, that the earth is the wilderness of his banishment, that heaven is his home, and that all the favour, love, and power of the Godhead are engaged to bring him thither. The worldly wise can only value this (if at all) when carnal knowledge is dying with their bodies, and all their trifling thoughts are about to perish. Hence it is, that the poor man's knowledge being sound and true, though ever so small, can stand the onset of trials in the world, and death at last; while the learned and knowing, with none or small degrees of the true understanding, fall into errors, fail in their course, or die doubting and almost despairing.

O my soul, seek thou the substantial wisdom which cometh from God, and which time, or rather eternity itself, cannot diminish, but will only brighten and improve. Though other knowledge may be valuable for the purposes of this world, yet this alone can ripen for heaven, and is therefore most earnestly to be sought for, by thee, whose business and calling, whose citizenship and hope, are principally there.

And, O thou, who art the living and life-giving Word itself, through whom and for whom all the written word was given, come and possess my soul! I long for nothing, and I would always long for nothing, but for thy wisdom and thee. O forgive my unsettled heart, which hath so often been taken up with a multitude of unprofitable things, instead of being fixed wholly upon thee, who art the only Way, the Truth, and the Life! I can have no rest, no firm establishment, but upon thee. My nature is unstable as water; and I live moreover in a slippery world. Leave, O leave me, therefore, not to myself, nor to the power of the evils, which are above, beneath, and on every side. Set me upon thyself, my blessed Rock, and order thou my goings in the way, and lead me into the way everlasting. Who is sufficient for these things but thou, who art all-sufficient? How can I, so poor a creature, hope either to stand or to prevail, but through that strength which is made perfect in weakness, through that wisdom, which cannot be deceived by fraud, and that love, which is stronger than death, and durable as the days of heaven. O Lord, be on my side, and then neither my own flesh, nor the corruption of the flesh in others, no, nor all the powers of darkness, shall be able in the least to hurt me. I am thine, O save me now, save me to the end, and save me for ever.

CHAP. X.

ON THE LIFE OF CHRIST.

Though my Redeemer was to be, and was, a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief; though he was to have, and had, all our iniquities in his own body ~~on the~~ cross; though he was to bear the curse, and was cursed, for the transgression of his people, and, for a token of it, was hanged upon a tree; yet, in his own person, he was pure, harmless, and undefiled, and so was called typically, the holy Lamb of God, without blemish, or any possible defect. He was perfectly without sin, from the manger to the cross. When Satan tried him in the desert, he found nothing in him of weakness of mind or defilement of body; and therefore his temptations had nothing to lay hold of, but fell to the ground. His enemies among men, stirred up by the malice of the adversary, could not, when he challenged them, convince him of sin; nor was anything like guile to be found in his mouth. All his words were wisdom itself, and all his actions were purity and love.

There are three principal reasons why such a Redeemer "became us;" and these are to be found only in Christ.

A sacrifice, in the first place, was necessary for our iniquities; for, "without shedding of blood, there is no remission" of sins. The justice of God required atonement; because it is inconsistent with the holiness of his nature to spare the guilty. No truth, in all his word, is more plain than this. But nothing could be substituted in the room of sinners, which was sinful in itself; for this would only increase the wrath of the Most High. And, therefore, as his love was pleased to provide and accept a substitute; such a one appeared, as was without spot, or defect of any kind, in himself, and had nothing to answer for of his own.—This is the signification of all the pure sacrifices under the law, which speak aloud, that they are altogether vicarious, or one offered in the stead of another.

In the next place, the redeemed, as sinners, wanted a righteousness, without which they cannot appear with acceptance before God: and, as a perfect righteousness can only be pleasing to him, and all men are incapable of producing such a one, and as therefore it can only be obtained by accounting the righteousness of a substitute for their own; Jesus Christ was Jehovah in our nature, in order to be Jehovah in our Righteousness. God is well pleased for his righteousness' sake, which is infinite and everlasting, capable of justifying from all things, and through all times, even into eternity. Christ, not for himself but for his people, fulfilled all righteousness, and upon their account magnified the law of their God. It was for this end that he lived so many years upon earth, and went through all the stages of human life to manhood; by which his people of all ages might have, through faith, a right of acceptance in him.

And, thirdly, the merit of the sacrifice for sin, and the substitution of righteousness for sinners, required some person to intervene, or to stand between God and sinners, and to offer these exchanges in their behalf. This office is the office of a priest, who is a mediator between God and man, and who must therefore be holy in himself. Christ was this perfect person; and so was "such an High-priest as became us, holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners, and made higher than the heavens," having "an unchangeable priesthood," to which he is "consecrated for evermore."

These are the reasons of all his labours in love and righteousness: and he was able to merit and go through them, being Jehovah in man; as well as to suffer what he took upon him, being man in Jehovah.

Oh what a task of unparalleled grace and humility is here! Who could have done such unimpeachable works; but he who is perfect in himself? Who could have done them to render others perfect for ever before God; but one so much above all created perfection, as to have for others an unbounded perfection to spare?

Lord, help me to meditate upon thee, and upon all that thou hast done for my soul! O put on this garment of salvation, this robe of righteousness, which thy blessed hands have perfectly wrought, that it may be my wedding garment in the day of my espousals, when I shall leave the world, and appear before the Majesty on high! This is the righteousness of saints, pure, white, and shining, in which they walk with thee in glory, and in which I also hope to walk, unworthy creature as I am, both with thee and with them. O then shall I appear without spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing, all-acceptable to God, all-illustrious in thee! Lord, "what hast thou wrought" indeed? Thou hast wrought for me to entitle me to heaven; and thou hast wrought in me to fit me for heaven; a work, as it seems to me, no less difficult than the other; so stubborn and vile am I, and so opposite to thy pure nature is mine. I marvel, and with tears of joy I marvel, at all the mysterious wonders of thy redemption, at thy plain and clear yet unsearchable love, at thine awful justice magnified even by grace itself, at the kindness thou hast shown, and the goodness thou hast promised, at the never-ending line of wisdom in thy holy word, and at the unbounded scene of glory yet before me. I am overwhelmed, I am astonished, at the weight and grandeur of thy divine benevolence. Accept the faculties of my body and soul, all I am and all I have; and let them be found to thy praise, and honour, and glory, both now, and at the day of thine appearing! Amen!

CHAP. XI.

ON THE DEATH OF CHRIST.

"Behold, and see, if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow, which is done unto me, wherewith the Lord hath afflicted me, in the day of his fierce anger."

No, my Jesus, never was sorrow like thine. Thou barest the griefs of millions; griefs, which would have sunk those millions into unutterable woe. Omnipotence, itself groaned under the tremendous load, which forced from thy pure and perfect body, not common sweat, (the curse, inflicted with human labour,) but a dreadful sweat, bursting forth in great drops of agonizing blood. Oh, what a doleful cry didst thou utter; and who but thyself can conceive those to us unknown pangs and sufferings, which forced from thy sacred lips, the cry, "My God, My God, why hast thou forsaken me?"

The meditation of thy sufferings and death is painful in the sympathy of nature: yet I cannot wish that thou hadst not endured them, nor didst thou fully wish it for thyself. Thou was contented to be betrayed into the hands of sinful men for this very purpose. It was by the determinate counsel and fore-knowledge of God, that all the parts of this solemn event were transacted. And it is for the everlasting interest of me and of thousands, that all the Scriptures concerning thee were awfully fulfilled.

Lord, what is sin, that thou thyself couldest not be spared, when from the souls of thy people it was taken off, and laid upon thee? Can anything more solemnly describe the hatred of the divine nature to sin, and the severity of the divine justice upon account of it, than the pangs, the horrors, the cries of thee, my Jesus, thou suffering Son of God? And if thou wert sacrificed for sin, who in thyself knowest no sin, what shall become of those who reject thy saving sacrifice, and yet all the while have nothing but sin in themselves?

Who could support such excruciating tortures, unassisted and uncomforted as thou wert, even upon a just account? It was not in the power of a creature to sustain thine inward griefs, thine outward torments, and the entire dereliction or forsaking of God, of men, and of nature, all together and at once, as thou didst sustain them, upon any account or motive in the world. But thou enduredst the whole with dignified complacency and satisfaction, even for thine enemies to convert them into friends, and to make rebels and apostates, heirs of God, and joint-heirs with thyself of an eternal weight of glory. May I not turn thine own words, and say, "Behold, and see, was there ever love like thy love, which thou showedst for thy people, when the Lord afflicted thee in the day of his fierce anger?"

Lord, how shall I speak, and what shall I say to these things? Shall my incredulous heart be still backward to believe? If Jesus died for my sins, can I die for them too? If he freely bare the curse for my sake, will the justice of my God still require the curse at my hands? If my iniquities were taken by my Saviour, and he made a full and perfect atonement for them; can I dare to affront the divine Majesty by supposing, that he is yet so unrighteous as to charge them all again upon me? O forgive my hard and impenitent heart, that I should ever imagine such blasphemy against thy faithfulness and love; that I should even think, that thou canst be so unjust and untrue, even in contradiction to thine own word, as to lay that still upon myself, which, for my sake, was entirely laid upon my dearest and most blessed Redeemer! Lord, I melt into tears of shame at myself, and into tears of of comfort upon the remembrance of all this thy kindness to my soul. Thy blood, O my Jesus, cleanseth from all sin; and if from all, what sin shall remain to be now charged home upon me? O help me, thou mighty God, thou Prince of peace, that I may not be faithless, but believing!

CHAP. XII.

ON THE RESURRECTION OF CHRIST.

No fact was ever more strongly and undeniably established than this. Divine Providence ordained, that it should be so, because upon this great truth depend all the assurance and efficacy of our redemption: "If Christ be not raised (says the Apostle) your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins."

But is there no proof of Christ's resurrection, but the historical evidence?—Yes, blessed Lord, as thou givest thy people to know of the doctrine of salvation, that it is thine, by the demonstration of the Spirit; so thou affordest to them a most convincing testimony, that thou art indeed risen from the dead, by their super-resurrection from the death of trespasses and sins. If thou hadst not been raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father it would have been impossible for any of them to have either received or walked in the newness of life. Their being spiritually quickened with thee, is a proof in itself of thy glorious resurrection, and a confirmation to their souls, that they are thine own unalienable inheritance, and that they shall also live with thee for ever.

Thou hast truly and graciously said, "I am the Resurrection and the Life: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth in me, shall never die." Lord, I was long, too long, dead to God and dead to thee, shut up under the curse of thy law through sin, yet insensibly, as a dead carcass is of all outward impressions, to my alienation and separation from thy life and peace. I was dead also to my own true interest and everlasting concerns, and alive only to sin, and to the service of the lord of sin, without perceiving his bitter tyranny and horrible designs. "So foolish was I and ignorant, yea, even as a beast before thee." The beasts indeed follow the end of their being, but I neglected mine. In tender mercy didst thou open mine eyes, that I might know myself and my misery, and that I might behold thee as the only refuge and hope of my soul. Thou gavest me the powers of a new and spiritual life; and then I ran towards thee with an affection I had never felt before, and desire to know more and more of thee, and the power of thy resurrection; that so I might no longer live in or for myself, but in thy faith and for thy glory. All this was thy work, and thine alone. I might as easily have created a world, as thus have new-created myself, in opposition to the millions of hinderances from within and from without. No; it was thou, my dearest Redeemer, it was thou that restorest my soul, and didst lead me in the paths of righteousness for thy name's sake; and therefore I trust, (and though I am sometimes afraid, yet still do I trust, and would trust again,) that "Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life, and that I shall dwell in the house of the Lord for ever."

Oh what an evidence of thy resurrection hast thou thus brought home to my heart! Confirmed, as it is, by thy holy written word, it is demonstration itself, and is not be argued away by all the corrupt reasonings of men. It is a demonstration both of word and of deed, of spirit and of life, of understanding and experience, of thy faithfulness and truth, and of all my blessed and joyful interest therein. "Sing, O ye heavens, for the Lord hath done it: shout, ye lower parts of the earth: break forth into singing, ye mountains, O forest, and every tree therein; for Jehovah hath redeemed Jacob, and glorified himself in Israel."

Thomas doubted, that I might believe more strongly. He was suffered to fail in his faith, that my faith, and that of all thy children after him, might be improved and confirmed. But the mere evidence of sense can draw no blessing. His bodily view of thy resurrection was indeed followed by faith; but, from hence thou tookest occasion, most happily for thy people, to say, "Blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed." Through thy mercy I have believed, and, according to thy word, have tasted thy blessing. Joy and peace in believing, quietness and assurance of mind, peace and resignation of soul, some holiness and strong desires after more, contempt of this world and foretaste of a better, preparation for death, and views of a transporting eternity, are among the many proofs that thou art risen and livest, that thou art gracious and true. O that these proofs may increase in number and measure, that my faith may be more and more lively, and that my hopes may continually abound!

CHAP. XIII.

ON THE ASCENSION OF CHRIST.

"THOU hast ascended on high, thou hast led captivity captive; thou hast received gifts," in thy human nature, "for men; yea for the rebellions also, that the Lord God might dwell among them," or "that they might become an habitation of God through the Spirit."

This was prophesied of Jesus long before his advent in the flesh. It was so prophesied, as though it were a fact already past; because the things to come are, as it were, present with God, being foreknown by his omniscient mind, and ordained in his holy will, which must be accomplished in all its purpose and decree.

He ascended to the throne of the Highest, with the full merits of his blood and righteousness, which were a sweet smelling savour, or a savour of rest, to the everlasting THREE. By this gracious ascension, Jehovah is become propitious to the redeemed, receives them in Christ, loves them for Christ's sake, favours them with his peace in their hearts, carries them on by his providence and grace, makes all things work together for their good, bears them through life and death, and finally receives them to glory.

The ascension of Christ brought down gifts from above, and, as the greatest of all, the power and presence of the Holy Spirit, for his people. It was thus expedient for them, that he went away from the earth; for if he had not carried up his merits before the throne, the Comforter could not have come down to have led them into all the truth of God and of Christ, and to have made that truth effectual in their salvation. By his holy influence they are brought to believe, and are kept in believing to the end.

Jesus ascended likewise to prepare a place for his chosen. In a short time they are to be dismissed from these wretched houses of clay, standing in the waste wilderness of this world; and then they are to have in heaven everlasting mansions of beauty and glory, fitted and furnished by Christ himself. They are soon to leave their bodies, now thoroughly defiled by sin, and to put on some spiritual fabric appointed for them, in which they are to remain with Christ, and the blessed, till the final consummation of all things.

Oh what gifts, my blessed Redeemer, has thou procured and purchased for my unworthy soul! What hast not thou brought down of grace for time, and of promise for eternity to me, and to helpless sinners like me; Yea, thou hast given thine own self for thy brethren, that in thee they might be given up to God, and like thee be a sweet-smelling savour, ascending by thy merits to the highest heaven. Oh what shall I, what can I, render for mercies like these? I can give, poor as the gift is, only my heart and soul to thy dear glory; and I would not, surely I would not, restrain these. Yet I cannot offer these, so weak and so corrupt am I, without the assistance of thy strength. Favour me, then, more and more, with thy gracious power, that my affections may be constantly mounting upward, longing for the place of my everlasting residence, and counting all things worse than dung, that would stop my progress thither. Where thou art, dear Lord, soon do I hope to be. I am tired of this earth, and of all its shifting miserable scenes; I am weary of this body, full of disorder and sin; I loathe the husks, which the swine of this world quarrel for and devour; and can be satisfied with nothing less than thee and thy presence for ever. O my Beloved, when shall I ascend up after thee? All below is Mesech and Kedar: but, "with thee there is the fulness," not the mere shadow, "of joy; and, at thy right hand, there are pleasures," not for a moment only, but "for ever more." Thou hast said, "Surely, I come quickly." Amen, (reply the hearts of thy people, and my poor heart among them,) yea, come, Lord Jesus!

CHAP. XIV.

ON THE GLORIFICATION OF CHRIST.

The mission and work of Jesus for our salvation was completed in the eternal glorification of his person in heaven. His body was spiritually, though not substantially changed in this great event, and thus, with his human soul, as one complete and perfect manhood, was taken into God. He now shines in the brightness of the divine glory, far above all principality and power, and every name that is named, whether in heaven or in earth; and he thus shines as the Head of our redeemed nature, that his people may also be glorified with him, and be so united to him and to each other, as to become a holy temple, and a glorious habitation of God through the Spirit.

"I pray, (said the gracious Redeemer,) that they all may be one, as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee; that they also may be one in us; and the glory which thou gavest me, I have given them, that they may be one, even as we are one: I in them, and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one."

O what a transcendent height of glory is this, to which such creatures as myself, believing in Jesus, shall shortly be raised! What mind could have been sublime enough so much as to have thought of these wonders, if the Lord of glory himself had not revealed them?

The glory of Christ is not like the airy phantom which men call glory, but hath everlasting weight and solidity; it not only sends forth light, but is light; and all that can be conceived of splendour, excellency, durability, and bliss, meets in this glory, as its sole and substantial essence. The believer, therefore, is said to enjoy in Christ "an exceeding and eternal weight of glory"—exceeding all conception and comparison; eternal in its enjoyment and duration.

"It doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know, than when Christ shall appear, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is:" so that "with open face, beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, we shall be changed into the same image, from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord. Behold, what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us!" O that my heart may feel the thanks, which no tongue can utter, and, in humble adoration, bless my God "for his unspeakable gift!"

CHAP. XV.

ON THE INTERCESSION OF CHRIST.

When the high-priest, once a year, entered into the most holy place, he carried the fume of the sweet incense, and the blood of the sin-offering, with him. The fume was to cover the mercy-seat upon the ark of the testimony, and the blood was to be sprinkled before it. This shadowed forth the interceding office of the great High-Priest of our profession, in the holiest of all. He is entered there with his own blood, by which he hath made a perfect atonement for his people, and with his own righteousness, which both covers himself as the propitiation, and his whole church under him, so as to render all, and all together, acceptable to the pure attributes of Jehovah.

Hence my Redeemer received his name of Angel, Interpreter, Advocate, or Intercessor. He pleadeth for me, and for all poor sinners who come unto God by him, before the throne of the Highest. By the merit of his blood, and the excellent perfection of his righteousness, he fills all heaven (as it were) with the fragrance of that, which is unutterably delightful to God himself. No broken-hearted rebel, who cometh unto God by this High-Priest, Jesus, shall ever bewail the insufficiency of his Advocate, but rather shall bless the Lord for his mercy in laying his help upon One who is almighty. If he look to this Saviour, then certainly he will be with him as his "Angel Interpreter," or Advocate, "one among a thousand to show unto him his uprightness; and he is gracious unto him, and saith, Redeem him from going down to the pit, I have found a ransom." Then "his soul is brought back from the pit, and enlightened with the light of the living."

Our High-Priest, bearing our nature, "can be touched with the feeling of our infirmities," though without their sin; and he is "able to save us to the uttermost," or, "for evermore, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for us." O that I may come therefore boldly, with liberty of speech and with confidence of heart, to the throne of grace, that I may obtain the mercy I want, and find grace to help in the time of my need!

Blessed Lord, thou hast showed me what thou hast done for me on earth, and what thou art now doing for the interests of my soul in thy kingdom. Thou settest before me, in both respects, grounds of the most sure and the most strong consolation; so that, in thee, I might have the fullest assurance of faith and of hope. O work, if it be thy will, this rich consolation within me; for, without the effectual aid of thy power, I may reason upon these grounds, but I cannot apprehend them; I may conclude in my mind that they are true, but I shall not be able to apply their sweetness, strength, or truth, to my heart. Lord, take thy poor servant's cause into thine own hand; plead it for him in the court of heaven; urge it upon him in the court of his own conscience on earth; let him feel the comfort of both in all the sorrows of his present state, so that no trial nor outrage from his enemies, no humbling sense of his own infirmities, may be able to stagger his confidence in thee.

Though thou art in heaven, my Jesus, yet thou knowest where I am, and whereof I am made; and thou rememberest, that I am but dust. O leave me not, neither forsake me; lest my own heart without anything else, and especially my own heart with ten thousand evil ones beside, draw me off from my only true hope, to some wretched, stupid, corrupting refuge of lies! Intercede for me, as for Peter, that my faith fail not. He needed an advocate not more than I. O thou, that didst plead his cause with everlasting success, plead and take care of mine; that I, together with him, and all the clients of thy grace, may rejoice in thy goodness to my soul, and bless thy holy name for ever and ever!

CHAP. XVI.

THE LOVE OF THE FATHER.

"In this was manifested the love of God towards us, because that God sent his only begotten Son into the world, that we might live through him." We could have had no life but through the Redeemer; and we could not have had him, but through the tender love of the Father. Nothing can more forcibly show the love of God towards us than this, that he should give up Christ to the deepest humiliation and sufferings, for our rescue and redemption. Had there been any possible method of salvation beside this, consistent with the divine attributes, surely the bitter cup would have passed away from the blessed Jesus, and God would not have permitted him to drink it. But God did not, and therefore could not, in this case, spare his Son, but delivered him up to death for our sakes; and thus, in a most admirable manner and degree "commendeth his love towards us, while we were yet sinners," who therefore as such, could have done nothing to deserve it. "Herein is love; not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins."

All this ensued according to the covenant of grace, which was settled between the divine Persons on the throne of heaven; and when the Lord Jesus was sacrificed, then was this covenant ratified and established, Jehovah interposing himself therein, and through the divided flesh and spirit of the Messiah, satisfying his law and justice for the remission of sins.

By this new testament in the blood of the Saviour, his people are not only admitted into fellowship with himself as their brother, yea, as flesh of their flesh and bone of their bone, in more than espoused nearness; but they are also entitled, by a gracious right, to approach unto God as their father. They are adopted into his family; and the covenant, established in the hands of the Mediator, is the testimony and the seal of it. Hence, they are no more strangers and foreigners, much less slaves and enemies, but sons and heirs, children and heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ Jesus; and so when they look up and pray, they do not take God's name in vain and speak falsely, when they call Jehovah himself, Abba, Father; but they utter what they have a right and privilege to utter, and what the Lord delights to hear.

O my soul, thou canst not be in a ten thousandth part so ready to be joyful in this matter, as thy God is to rejoice over thee. If he could regard thee so much when thou wert dead in condemnation, and an alien, as to give up his Son for thy sake; how much more, when thou art reconciled by this very means, will he pour forth his compassion upon thee! If he was kind to thee, when he stood as thy Judge, and smote thy substitute for thy sins; will he, can he, cease to be kind under the character of thy Father, thy merciful and gracious Father, in Christ Jesus!—Lord, remove so wicked a thought, so diabolical a notion, of unbelief from my mind! It is treason against thy love, thy justice, thy truth, and all those attributes in thee, which are the shining rays of thy nature, to harbour so foul an opinion: it is atheism, madness, yea, the very falsehood and blasphemy of hell. Holy Father, drive by thy Spirit such base and abominable suggestions from my heart; and let me claim the privilege of my adoption, let me call myself thy child, though an unworthy child, and thus honour thy faithfulness and truth by living in the sense of my nearness and dearness to thee!

When my soul can most ascend to this its proper station, then time, and the things of time, are most under my feet; the world and all its bustles, annoy me less; my heart beats freely for heaven; and I can look down from the hill, seeing the vanities, and pitying the follies beneath, which carry men away from God, and too often "drown them in ruin and perdition."

CHAP. XVII.

THE LOVE OF THE SPIRIT.

If God be love, then the Spirit is love, because the Spirit is God. He manifests himself as the God of love, by unfolding and bestowing such love, as only God himself could have, and from himself could pour forth unto others.

The Holy Spirit, as one of the parties in the everlasting covenant, loveth his people with an everlasting love. By him also they are made sensible of the love of the Father and of the Son, when he sheddeth forth his own love upon their hearts; for it is He, who enables each of them to cry Abba, Father, under the taste of his mercy, and to say to Christ, "Thou art my Saviour, my Lord, and my God," in the rich experience of his grace. Without the love of the Spirit, as they could not know, so they could not come up to, the love of the whole Trinity; for by him alone it is shed abundantly upon all that are his, both in earth and heaven.

If I were left to love God by my own fallen powers, and had not the continual help of the Spirit of love, I should fear, that I could do nothing soon, but hate him entirely. "The carnal mind is enmity" itself "against God; for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be." The law of God is the pure life and love of God; and only by his Spirit can I delight therein, and then only "after the inner man." Hence it must follow, that, "if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his." Without him, every man must remain, as he was born, "earthly, sensual, devilish."

O how deeply, then, am I indebted to this divine Agent, for taking up his holy residence in my unworthy soul! What loving-kindness and mercy have I not felt and enjoyed by his blessed power within me!

How is it, that He, whom the heaven of heavens cannot contain, should vouchsafe to take up his abode in a poor sinner's breast? What marvellous love is this, that he should stoop to dwell with one, whose heart hath been the residence of the evil spirit, and the cage of every unclean bird! Surely it must be infinite love, which could cleanse so unholy a tenement, and keep it in any degree clean for himself, against the manifold attempts to pollute it on every side.

Whatever I may lose then, O thou blessed Spirit, may I never lose the love of thee! The loss of fame, of riches, and all things here, are but of small account in themselves, and can soon be made up by thy power; but the loss of thee is the loss of more than life itself, the parting with the very anchor of my soul, and turning me adrift into a dark ocean of doubt and despair. O then forsake not thine own, who could never have been thine own but from thy mere love and bounty; and perfect all the work of grace in me, that, before men and angels, I may give indubitable proof, that indeed I am thine!

CHAP. XVIII.

THE WORK OF THE SPIRIT.

The nature of man, since the fall, is carnal, and prone to evil; nor hath it power or inclination to raise up itself to the desire and enjoyment of heavenly things, but, on the contrary, shuns and abhors them. It "savoureth not the things that be of God, but the things that be of men," and of the world.

Now, as whatsoever is born of the flesh is flesh, and as flesh and blood cannot inherit, nor even know, the kingdom or grace of God, it is not marvellous that Christ should say, "Ye must be born again," or that it is absolutely necessary for a man to be "renewed in the spirit of his mind," before he can apprehend or enjoy the things of God. We see this plain necessity proved by the case of all men; for no man seeks and knows God by his own natural abilities; and every one, who doth know him, freely confesses, that it is by grace alone he obtained that knowledge.

The first work of the Spirit, then, in a sinner, is a "new birth unto righteousness." As this is the Spirit's office in the covenant of grace, so believers under it are said to be "born of the Spirit." This is their entrance into the knowledge of themselves and of God. They are united unto God in Christ by the act of his Spirit, and so partake of a new life, with new functions, faculties and affections; which life is in all things opposite to the carnal life of their fallen nature, and creates, from the time of its birth, a constant warfare in them against the being and power of evil.

As this generation in its essence is the sole work of the Spirit; so it is likewise in all its effects. When the Christian begins to live spiritually, he is soon enabled to think and act spiritually. And as the views and objects of this life are beyond the creature, and rest in God and in Christ, the Holy Spirit leads up the heart to a dependence on the divine Persons for the attainment of them. This is faith: and thus it appears, that it is the gift and operation of the Spirit.

By this faith, the Christian desires, and attains what he desires: by this he prays, and hopes, and waits, and expects: by this he wrestles against sin, and Satan, and the world: by this he looks with a holy contempt on all dying things, and beholds those delightful realities which are invisible to sense: by this he knows himself to be a child of God, and the purchase of Christ: by this he sees a glorious immortality provided for him, and longs often to enjoy it: by this he suffers the will of God, as well as obeys it, knowing that it must work together for his good: by this he welcomes death itself, and at length obtains the victory over it through Jesus Christ his Lord. All this work of faith is carried on by the effectual agency of the Holy Spirit. It is an action upon the spirit of a man, which none but the God of spirits either would or could perform. And where this work is not thus inwardly performed, there may indeed be the notions of truth, and the forms of godliness, but they have no life or power in them. The heart, in that case, may be as dead to God, and as much in and of the world, as ever.

He is called "the Spirit of Christ," because he not only is one with him in Jehovah, but also takes of the things of Christ, and shows them to his people. Thus, where his Spirit dwells, Christ is said to dwell, because of their inseparable union. If Christ dwell in our hearts by faith, it is because the Spirit of Christ is in us, and God is in us of a truth. It was the Spirit of Christ in the apostle which enabled him to say, "I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me."

To thee, then, O thou Holy Spirit of truth, and by thine own power, do I look up for faith and hope, and for the increase of faith and hope, and every blessing! O work in me to will and to do what is right; for, without thee, I can neither will nor do anything but evil. I am all depravity; but thou art grace itself, and the God of all grace. I am weakness, instability, and want; but thou art everlasting strength, the rock of ages, the fulness which filleth all in all. I have nothing, but thou has all things. O behold thy poor servant, whom thou hast made willing to serve thee; and let all the good pleasure of thy will be done in me, and by me. Abate my pride, subdue my unbelief, mortify my corruptions, strengthen my soul. All that I need, supply, according to thy riches in glory by Christ Jesus. So shall I be steadfast in thy steadfastness, lively in thy life, active in thy power, faithful in thy grace, wise in thy wisdom, holy in thine holiness, happy in thy love, perserving to the end by thy care, comfort, and preservation. O, who and what am I, that thou hast so tenderly brought hitherto; when, like millions around me, I might have been justly cut off, and left silent in darkness! Help, O help me to adore thee, and to testify of thy goodness and grace, in heart, in mind, in lip, and in life, both now and for ever!

CHAP. XIX.

ON THE EQUAL OBLIGATION OF BELIEVERS TO THE THREE PERSONS IN JEHOVAH.

It is an error to suppose, that we are indebted to one more than another of the divine Persons; for their love is but one and the same love, as their essence or nature is one and the same; and there could not exist such a difference or inequality of kindness to men, unless there was such a difference or inequality in themselves, as would not stand with the unity of the Godhead.

The love of the three Persons formed the covenant of grace from everlasting, in which they were equally and undividedly concerned; and though the fulfilment of this covenant had necessarily an order and distinction, according to the several engagements of the three distinct Persons, yet the mind and will of the Godhead were but one, and the object of their power but one, even Jehovah's glory in the salvation of sinners.

The Father loved, and concurred in the redemption of his chosen by Christ; the Son loved, and bare their sins in their nature, glorifying in that nature all the attributes of the Godhead; the Spirit loved, and engaged to make effectual the whole plan, by fitting the heart to receive, and by carrying to the heart the benefits of eternal salvation. Thus God was in Christ, reconciling the world to himself; Christ fulfilled all that was given him to do; the Spirit enlivens, enlightens, and seals to the day of redemption. This is the order of the covenant; beginning with the Father, and, through the Son and Spirit, descending from heaven, to the salvation of his people; but, in the order of their enjoyment of this covenant, the Spirit begins with them, and they ascend by him next to the Son, and then to the Father. This is a blessed mystery of faith, which (however plain in the Scriptures) can only be understood truly in the course of a gracious experience. No mere notions, and especially of the carnal mind, can possibly reach it. The tuition, or rather intuition, is altogether divine.

What a blessed thing is it to believe and to know assuredly, that the wisdom, will, affection, and power, of all the Persons in Jehovah, are concerned in the salvation of every poor sinner that repenteth! What a confidence of spirit ought not this to inspire in the children of God! If their Lord be thus engaged, and concerned for their welfare; how can any of them be lost, or fail of what he hath prepared for them! O my soul, rejoice in the love of the Father, Son and Spirit, that one God, who hath done such great things for thee, and who will yet do more, yea, more than eye hath seen, or ear heard, or it hath entered into the heart of man to conceive. To this ONE God be glory. Amen. Hallelujah!

CHAP. XX.

ON THE PARTICULAR DESIGN AND USE OF THE SEVERAL HOLY SCRIPTURES.

Blessed Lord, "Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path!" Without this glorious revelation, I must have remained as I was born, a poor, helpless, hopeless, and miserable sinner.

By this is thy servant taught the order and excellency of thy first creation, when man was made in righteousness and true holiness, and lived therefore in tranquillity and peace. Hence I learn how he fell from thee, and, in falling, became spiritually dead, and cut off from thy life in his soul; while his body received the seeds of dissolution, and began to die from that very hour. I also am instructed to see thy mercy, proclaiming a Redeemer in the midst of thy justice, which otherwise must have destroyed, or made wretched without remedy, my whole race. Thou ordaindest a covenant by sacrifice with the first believers, showing thereby in type and shadow the great atonement of Jesus Christ, who, by thine own everlasting covenant, was "the Lamb slain from before the foundation of the world. By faith in this propitiation, they offered up their spiritual sacrifices, when they presented before thee the appointed creatures; and "according to this faith they died, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth."

By this holy word, I also learn, how, for the dreadful impieties of the old world, thou broughtest on a flood upon the earth, destroying all mankind but the small remnant of one family. My eyes have seen abundant testimonies of this truth, within the bowels, as well as upon the face, of this globe; in beholding, what once lived upon the surface at great depths beneath, and what once inhabited the seas upon the tops of the highest mountains.

By thy blessed record I understand, that thou madest a covenant with Noah, and Abraham, and the other patriarchs, promising the great Saviour to them and their seed. Thou didst suffer their offspring to go down into Egypt, and broughtest them up again with thy mighty hand, that by this thou mightest proclaim a more glorious deliverance to thy people. The plagues of Egypt were strong emblems of the curses and evils which sin brings upon the souls of all men by nature; and thy visitations of Israel were likewise representations of thy conduct in grace towards all thy redeemed. Thou deliveredst to this day thy people from the world and the devil by the blood of the paschal Lamb, and sendest them forth from their power, to become sojourners as in a wilderness, "and to seek a better country, even a heavenly."

Thou didst appoint all the rites and ceremonies of the holy law to show forth a Saviour's love, life, and death, till he should come. They are lively prophecies, and wise memorials, of what he was to be, and to do, and to suffer, for the salvation of poor sinners. No mind, but thine, could have contrived such a long train of mysterious truths, which were all to be fulfilled; no power, but thine, could have established and accomplished them all from age to age; no love, but thine, could have undertaken salvation at so costly an expense as the sufferings and death of thy blessed Son.

In this sacred volume, I further read the conduct of thy providence, in preserving the chosen remnant, and in punishing the ungodly and profane. The histories of men are composed by prejudice, and are full of falsehoods. What passeth in my own time is so differently represented by different men; nay, what I have seen myself hath been so variously seen and understood by others; that, were we alike-minded to report the truth, our misapprehensions and errors are so many, that through them the same facts would scarcely appear to be the same things. But thy record is faithful and true, and spareth not the faults and evils of any man, either of thy chosen people as a nation, or of thy dearest children as individuals. Here I see thy constant love of holiness and hatred of sin. Here I read many great lessons of human infirmity, and many strong proofs of thy forbearance, thy justice, or thy mercy. O let me, while I read, remember and understand.

In this book of books, I am also instructed by large and various prophecies given forth in deep and mysterious words. By thy holy prophets thou hast indeed spoken at sundry times, and in divers manners or figures; but all their prophecies, whether by symbol, type, vision, inspiration, or voice, declare but one final purpose, even the salvation of souls by Jesus Christ. His testimony was the very life and spirit of all their predictions.

By other parts of this blessed volume, I am edified and built up in my most holy faith. The final patience and self-renunciation wrought in Job, under thy visitation, instruct me in the way of thy righteousness. The proverbs or similitudes, full of mystic sense under moral ideas, teach me to look unto thee for all my wisdom, grace, and strength. By one book, I am convinced of the vanity and vexation of all worldly things; and, by another, of the mysterious heighth and depth of the love of Christ. I am also taught what to sing, and how to sing, of thy wonderful praises, by words which thine own Spirit hath revealed, which millions of thy children have graciously communed with, and which infinitely exceed all the compositions of men. They are words, full of prophecy and vigorous sense, and full of sober joy in the faithful foresight of the prophecy fulfilled. The love of Christ is the substance, the form, yea, the very life and breath, of all thy holy psalms.

In thy gracious Gospels, dear Lord, I am taught the accomplishment of every mystery, and of the great work of salvation, covenanted and foretold, in the person, life, death, resurrection, ascension, and intercession, of my Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. O what a picture do they hold forth, of the meekness, wisdom, grace, and compassion of that dear Redeemer! Lord, thou knowest how often my heart hath burned within me, when thou hast talked with me by these records, and while thou hast opened to me the Scriptures. And yet thou knowest, too, how often I have been one of the fools and slow of heart to believe all that thy prophets have spoken. O give me an understanding that is true; and so shall I be taught thy word!

The life, deeds, and writings of the holy apostles are, in thy blessed hands, most glorious and lively demonstrations of thine everlasting truth. They show me how thy saints have walked; and they encourage me to be a follower of them, who now through faith and patience inherit the promises. O my gracious Master, strengthen me, as thou wert pleased to strengthen them, with might by thy Spirit in the inner man! and so shall I hold on and hold out, till I receive, as they have received, the blessed end of my faith, in the salvation of my soul! Thou hast also been pleased to close thy prophesy, and to seal the vision, with an awful revelation, which reacheth onward to the very end of time, and almost unveils the mighty majesty of eternity itself. I read this mystic book with solemn awe, and often tremble as I read. Thy grace hath unfolded some little of this important mystery to my mind; O grant me more understanding, so far as may be proper for my welfare, or as my weakness in grace may be able to bear it. Keep me from reading with my own eyes, which are but carnal, and cannot profit me, and let me be thy disciple, and thy humble disciple alone! The ideas of this solemn book are all framed upon the principle of the ancient part of thy volume, and can only be apprehended at all through the intimate analogy of the whole.

O Lord, I bless thee, I daily bless thee, for this wonderful record of life and peace, which, if all men could spiritually read, all men would confess, that it is, and could be, of no origination but thine. The impressions of divinity are so glorious and evident, that he that runs, if he hath but eyes, may read and own them. And yet in nothing is this record more true, and in nothing is human experience of it more strong and striking, than in this, that no man can believe or understand a word of it, to the salvation of his soul, unless it be given him from above, unless all his instruction be imparted by thee. Not that in thy book there is any defect indeed, but wholly in the gross, sensual, and sinful apprehensions of fallen man.

Open thou mine eyes, O Lord, and then shall I behold wondrous things from thy law! Things hidden to carnal sense, but clear and obvious to the view of that faith, which thou givest to thy children. I wait upon thee for this end. While I read and while I write, while I praise and while I pray, I seek for thine instruction. I am a fool, without thee; but, by thee, I am made wise for eternity. Speak then in thy holy word, for thy servant heareth; and enable me to lay up what I hear, like Mary, within my heart, that I may be a true “scribe indeed, instructed in the kingdom of heaven, bringing forth, out of the treasure of my heart, things new and old!”

CHAP. XXI.

THE RECOLLECTION OF THIS FIRST PART IN PRAYER TO GOD.

O THOU ever-blessed Jehovah, three persons in one Godhead, full of grace, and full of glory, have mercy upon me a miserable sinner! I am not worthy so much as to look up to the throne of thy holiness, being polluted in my nature, wicked in my life, and covered entirely with innumerable transgressions. But, O, whither, whither, shall I go for help and succour, but unto thee, O Lord, who, for these my manifold abominations, are most justly displeased!

Wonderful goodness! Thou hast commanded me to come, and invited me to present myself before thee, with most astonishing testimonies of favour and acceptance. Thou hast found a way to make satisfaction to thine offended majesty and justice, not by my punishment and ruin so fully deserved, but by the sufferings and death of thy dear Son. By him thou hast magnified thy law and made it honourable, through an infinite and perfect righteousness, which he hath completed for it. For these wonderful ends, by thine everlasting covenant, he took into his divinity our human flesh, and became our Immanuel, or God with us: And so he became capable of suffering, doing, and substituting for his people, whom thus he purchased, all that was given him from thee. Having completed this whole work of salvation, he is now ascended up on high, pleading and interceding for poor sinners, that they might be partakers of his glory. Oh how great was his love; stronger indeed than death; mightier than sin and satan; yea, almighty to redeem!

Holy Father, how great also was thy love in sparing thine own Son from heaven for guilty worms, and yet not sparing him upon earth, when bearing their nature and transgressions! I am overwhelmed with a sense of thine unutterable benignity and compassion, joined as it is with everlasting justice, purity and truth.

And, thou blessed Spirit, what do I owe unto thee, for all thy gracious work in my poor heart, enslaved as it was by sin, and by nature departed as it is from all righteousness! Thou has taken of the things of Jesus, and explained and enforced, and enlivened them, into my soul. By thee alone, I have heard, and believed, all the mysteries of redemption needful for me to know. By thee I have experienced some of them; and by thine aid I hope to experience more. Be with me throughout my pilgrimage, and, in these days of rebuke and blasphemy against thy person, O grant me the evidence of thy presence, by enabling me to abound in every good word and work for thy glory.

O thou blessed Trinity! Thou Three-One Jehovah! God in covenant for redeemed sinners! God in truth over all the world! hear and regard my prayer. Accept and sanctify my praise. I adore thee for all thine abundant mercy. I glorify thee, O Father, Son, and Spirit, equal in nature, love, and majesty, with earnest, though poor, returns of gratitude and praise. Receive me, and whatever I am and have, graciously, for Jesus's sake, who is my Master, my Saviour, my Priest, my Prophet, my King, my Lord, and my all, and also thine only Son, in whom thou art well pleased for ever.

Lord, I am frail, and full of wants. I am a poor, weak, despised, and despicable man; and yet thine own adopted child notwithstanding. Give, O give me the bread of life; lighten my dim eyes with the light of life; and supply all my need, great and various as it truly is, according to thy riches in glory by Christ Jesus! I bring a thousand and a thousand wants, imperfections, and cares before thee; and, Lord, I can bring no other. These, and such as these, are all I have both in body and in soul. O then take me as I am, and make me what thou wouldest have me to be. I know not of myself what is right, or good, or wise; but thou knowest. Therefore, I beseech thee, my blessed God, undertake even for me! I have no refuge, but in thy power; I have no hope, but in thy promises; and I desire nothing in this world, no, nor in the world to come, but the sweetness, the testimony, the possession, the glory of thy great salvation.

O let the evidence of this salvation be made more and more clear to my mind, and the experience of it more and more firm and solid to my soul, through thy word and by thy Spirit. May I read, and understand; may I understand and grow; till I come to the stature and measure appointed for me. Keep me from leaning on myself, lest I fall into error. Help me to depend upon thee, that I may be led into all the truth. So shall I praise thee with joyful lips, and, through my gracious Saviour, bless and adore thee, O God, my God, for ever and ever!

PART II.

CHAP. I.

UPON UNBELIEF.

THE corruption of our nature renders the life and exercise of faith the most difficult affair in the world. It is indeed far beyond ourselves. The Apostle, therefore, ascribes our believing to “the exceeding greatness of God's power,” even to “the effectual working of his mighty power.”

Many talk of this believing, and yet but few have attained it. The assenting to a chain of principles is easy; but the grounding of the heart in these principles upon Christ, and especially in the time of trial; the giving up a man's self as nothing; the patient waiting of the soul upon the truth and promise of God; the cool and deliberate parting with the things of sense for the things of the Spirit; the discovery and suppression of carnal and corrupt motives in the heart; all these are matters, which are neither in the compass, nor taste, nor inclination, of flesh and blood. Hence it is, that, when men are made serious by affliction, sickness, or the approach of death, they find themselves so much at a loss for the use of that faith, which perhaps, from a long profession, they did not suspect they had wanted. Oh, it is dreadful to be in the dark, when we want the most light, and to have no assurance of everlasting things, when we are called to part for ever with the things of time.

The soul, indeed, that never doubted, hath never yet believed. The office of faith being to subdue unbelief in all its activities; this often makes a sore and difficult conflict in the soul. Carnal reason looks for the demonstrations of sense, and cannot receive the things of the Spirit of God; for these being in their nature out of its comprehension, they appear foolishness unto it; and therefore this weak and fleshly reason cannot bring a strong and living confidence to the soul. Faith is chiefly occupied in things above animal sense, and often against it; but reason, beginning with ignorance, and proceeding upon doubt, seeks its rest in sensation, and can rise no higher. A man, therefore, cannot be reasoned by logical deductions and convictions out of unbelief into faith, but must be saved, through the gift and working of the divine power, first to possess faith, and afterwards to use it.

The mind likewise can never subdue its distressing doubts by its own exercise, but only by the gracious help of God: and the very looking for this help is from faith. Faith brings indeed its proper evidences with it; but these are all in the divine record, which, by the demonstration of the Spirit, answers the ignorant objections of carnal reason, and (what is vastly beyond the power of all the reason in the world) at once silences, satisfies, comforts, and renews the mind. Thus faith relies, and the Spirit testifies; and this conjunction of what the soul is enabled to yield, with what in that act it immediately receives, constitutes that full abundance of certitude, which should be the grand aim of the children of God. "After ye believed, ye were sealed with that holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance."

This is not the work of a day. Conflicts and exercises are repeated continually; because while flesh remains in the believer, it will be unbelieving flesh, ever expecting sensation instead of faith, which is directly contrary to God's method of salvation. Man fell by disbelieving; and he is raised again through believing. He is to trust God for everything, before he can have the true enjoyment of any.

Faith doth not take away all doubting, because it doth not take away the body, nor the indwelling of sin in that body; but it subdues the reigning fury and the raging prevalence of doubting. It constantly attacks the body of sin, which is the grand cause of doubting. Sometimes, it gives the Christian such clear views, as make him wonder how he could doubt at all. And yet the doubting will again and again return, though perhaps with less frequency and strength. Its sudden attacks, however, are very distressing: and these are permitted of God, in order to show, that the soul is not to live by anything imparted to it here, but simply and continually by that faith which leads the soul out of itself to God in all its views and desires.

This is a difficult, though a daily, lesson. Lord, teach it thy servant, or the knowledge will be too excellent and sublime for him to attain it! Let it be also not a lesson of theory and notion only, but of practice and experience, that I may become skilful in the word of righteousness, that it may dwell richly in me in all wisdom, and that I may know how to repel by it the sad assaults, which, while I am here, will daily be made against me. "O let thy mercies come to me, O Lord; even thy salvation according to thy word: so shall I have wherewith to answer him that reproacheth me, for I trust in thy word!"

CHAP. II.

HOW HAVE I RECEIVED CHRIST?

The Apostle says, "As ye have received Christ Jesus the Lord, so walk ye in him." I must therefore receive him, before I can walk in him at all. It is a matter of the deepest consequence to my soul, that I should do both.

How then, Lord, did I receive thee? Did I seek thee first, by my own will? Alas! I was gone out of the way, like all other men; I was altogether become abominable, having no will for good, but only for evil. Did I resolve to seek thee by my best endeavours? I must confess, with shame and sorrow, that my resolutions were weaker to me than Samson's bands were in his full strength to him; and that the first or the least temptation led me away. Could my sincere obedience merit thy favour? I see, that if a man could sincerely obey in his natural state, but which indeed he cannot, having no love for the work, but only a slavish fear of hell; Lord, I see, that thy law requires, if I would be saved by thy law, a sinless and perfect obedience, instead of this sincere and defective one, upon pain of my utter destruction. Thou has said in thy word, that "He who offendeth in one point is guilty of all," and that "By the deeds of the law shall no flesh living be justified." How then could I, who have offended in so many points, be saved? How then didst thou, in thy righteousness, bring me to expect salvation?

Lord, I was poor, and vile, and miserable; I was helpless, yet laden with iniquities; I was wounded, and lying in my blood; my case and condition no man knew, or, knowing it, could relieve. In the midst of my misery, was the appointed moment of thy mercy. Into my deepest wounds thou didst pour thy oil and thy wine. Thou alone cheeredst my heart with thy free salvation. In the view of what Christ has done and suffered for poor sinners like me, and by thy gracious power applying his two-fold merit; joy and gladness came into my soul, yea, greater than any found by men of the earth, "when their corn, and wine, and oil, have increased."

Thy word was the instrument, and thy Spirit the worker. He new-created me in Christ Jesus; he renewed me in the spirit of my mind; he made darkness light before me, and rough places plain. By his teaching I know thy truth, by his grace I enjoy it, by his power I am kept therein, and shall be kept, I trust, to the end. Lord, all the glory of my conversion wrought in me, and of thy complete salvation wrought for me, wholly belongeth unto thee from beginning to end!

It was in this way I received Christ; and thy word, O Lord, assureth me it is the true way; because it giveth to thee all the glory, and secureth to me all the benefit. In this way of humbly receiving, I must also walk continually. I have nothing of my own, but sin. Thou hast nothing, O my Redeemer, but grace and mercy for thy people. Help me to receive out of this eternal fulness grace for grace, according to my need, that I may walk unto all well-pleasing, and adorn thy doctrine in all things. I would love much, because much hath been forgiven me. I would serve heartily, because thou hast kindly done great things indeed for me. I would live holily, because it is the way to thy kingdom, and the very happiness of thy kingdom itself. Let, let me, my Saviour, be more like unto thee; for, Lord, I would be thine, and only thine, for ever!

Thus my heart often venteth its desires; though at times it is unsteady, dull, and ready to droop under the weight and grossness of a sinful body. I have no remedy for this malady but Christ, sought for in humble prayers. And when my prayers are faint and drooping, as they too frequently are, I bewail and am sick of myself; but I dare not leave him, lest a worse evil befall me. I, therefore, in compunction of spirit, cast myself down before him as low as I can, praying for prayer, and entreating him that he will not leave me to my evil self, but enliven my soul with an answer of peace. When I can put forth this act of faith, there is often peace in the act itself which refreshes me, and usually comfort follows upon it, or (what is better) more faith to throw all upon him, and to live more by him, for the time to come.

CHAP. III.

HOW DO I LIVE UPON CHRIST?

Alas! my soul, in spiritual things, thou too often livest upon thyself. Thou seekest in frames, in forms, in creatures, and in animal life, what is only to be found in thy Redeemer, even a right inward peace, and stability of mind. Outward duties are well in their place, but they have no divine life in themselves, and can give none to thee. They are to be performed, but not trusted in; to be used with grace, but not to buy grace. They are as the scaffold to the building, a mean for carrying on the spiritual work, but not the end of the great design. In the power of Christ they are blessings; without his power, they have no life or help in them.

Many treat the ordinances as a fair substitute for a serious and constant watchfulness over themselves, for patient devotedness to God, and for real holiness of heart and life, instead of the mean, and only the mean, which the Lord hath appointed, for leading up the soul to all this, as their proper and indispensable end. By such worshippers, the holy means are turned into a profane and detestable idol (as the case was with some of old, Isaiah, lxvi. 3.) in the sight of the Lord; who doth not regard lip-service. nor any carnal or corporeal attentions only, but the poor and the contrite spirit, that can tremble at, while it hears and believes, his holy word.

Remember this for thyself, O my soul. Thy first and last trust must be in Jesus. He is the way, the truth, and the life. Without him all prayers, praises, rites, and ordinances, dwindle into carcasses without a soul. Every performance will be carnal and corporal, unless the Saviour fill it with his divine Spirit. And when this comes, then there is a sweet communion of heart, and reviving of the soul after Christ. Then there appears a delightful view behind the veil of outward ordinances, such as no carnal eye can behold, of the Lord in his goodness, beauty, grandeur, blessedness, and glory.

Mere professors stick in the flesh, and mistake the worship of the body, and the motion of the lips, for the love, taste, action, and adoration of the soul. Religion is too sentimental for those, who rather walk by a course than live in it. The road, indeed, may be a good one; but these no more travel therein, than a corpse in a hearse can be said to be making a journey.

My soul, thy life and thy liveliness are all laid up in Christ, and to be drawn from him according to thy need. Thou hast no stock left to thy own disposal. As the manna was received daily from above, so thou must live out of thyself for thy spiritual daily bread. Having pleaded thy pardon by his blood, and thy justification by his righteousness, thou must live on him for grace, still to plead both, to enjoy both, to commune with him from time to time, to deny thyself, to renounce the world and the devil, to master corruptions, to be growing wiser in his word, and more rich in its experience, and, in short, to use him for thine all in all. The whole of this is spiritual, and therefore difficult, work; and thou art quite unable to perform it in any respect, but through that strength which is made perfect in weakness. If Christ, indeed, be thy life, then, because he liveth, thou shalt live also.

In living thus upon Christ, thou art to live above thyself, and certainly above everything which thou thyself canst perform. This is the true and sublime life of the inner man, which is not corruptible, nor dependeth for vigour upon corruptible things. It is, therefore, a hidden life. "Ye are dead, (says the apostle,) and your life is hid with Christ in God." No outward or carnal eye can see it at all, except in some of its holy outward effects, the true excellence of which it cannot apprehend; and the spiritual understanding of other believers can only discern its inward truth and growth, but in proportion as they themselves are spiritually grown up in Christ Jesus the Lord.

As thou art not to live upon thyself, O my soul, so thou canst not live this true life by the aid or opinion of others. If they are instruments of good to thee, it is thy heavenly Father, who employeth them for that end. They themselves must live upon him, as well as thou, for all their wisdom, grace, and strength, and not "by the life of their own hand." Christ is, and must be, as much their life, as he is thine.

Thou sometimes waxest and wanest in thy duties, as the moon in her light. At one time, thou art full of appetite and vigour; at another, in lowness and want of strength. The cause is not in the Sun of righteousness, who is always alike; but in thee, who turnest not the same aspect always to him, and therefore hast not always the same light and heat. If thou thinkest to get brightness from the stars around thee, instead of thy sun, thou wilt be like the dark part of the moon, turned away from the natural sun, which often scarcely appears, or, when it doth, appears very dull. In all providences, ordinances, and situations, Christ must be thy point of view, thy succour, thy light, thy life, and thy all; or they will be found, however excellent in his hand, only beggarly elements in thine.

In all things that are truly divine and spiritual, the flesh soon becomes weary, and flags, and fails. When the exercise grows difficult especially; then corrupt nature soon declines, and cannot sustain or endure the toil. Hence it is, that so many seem to receive the word with joy, and to run well for a time, who, when persecutions or trials arise, having no root in themselves, begin to find dislikes and offences, and so presently fall away. Their fallow hearts have not been broken up deep enough by the gospel-plough (i. e. the law.) to cover well the gospel-seed. The seed of the word hath never been hidden in the heart; and so hath taken no root downward in humble and secret contrition, nor grown into substance, upwards, to "bring forth fruit unto perfection."

This hidden and spiritual life is often most active and strong, when the flesh is lowest, and hath least to do. "Be silent, O all flesh, before the Lord; for he is raised up out of his holy habitation." When the Lord is risen upon the soul, all that is weak and carnal is as nothing before him. A sweet proof of this may sometimes be found in sick and dying believers. How do they triumph in spirit, with a glorious liveliness, over all the infirmities of a dying body! "When their heart and their flesh fail," God then appears most eminently to be the very "strength of their heart, and their portion for ever."

There is "a knowledge of Christ after the flesh," which will carry men a great way into all the splendours of religious profession. It shall make a man look and talk seriously; carry him constantly to ordinances; give him great personal zeal and confidence; enable him to be very exact in all outward discipline and form of doctrine; nay, it shall bring him with a fervent activity (if a minister) into the pulpit, help him to deliver sound discourses with seeming earnestness and able oratory, so that multitudes shall hear and admire, and perhaps be wrought upon by him; and yet in himself it may be mere flesh, and the poor low knowledge of Christ by the flesh, after all. There is sometimes a little true life in this, and then it is strengthened and refined by trials and temptations; but, when there is none, then, by time or trouble, or some other thing, it will finally fall away. "If they had really been of us, no doubt they would have continued with us."

O my soul, there are depths of Satan, as well as of God; and there is no security for thee, but in renouncing the flesh, and all the secret, as well as open, works of the flesh, and by following Jesus thoroughly in the regeneration. In the poverty of carnal nature, the Lord will manifest the riches of his grace. Thou must be poor in thine own spirit, or thou canst not be rich in his. He filleth the hungry with good things; but those, that are increased with their own goods, he will always send empty away.

O Lord, look upon me, a poor and helpless creature, who cannot so much as look up to thee for aid, without they special grace for that end. How can I live upon thee, my Saviour, unless thou come down to me in this dark and wretched world, and visit me with thy salvation! I have waited for thy salvation, O Lord; and I would still patiently wait in all the ways of thine appointment, expecting thy presence in the troubled pool to bless me. I expect thee, and only thee. None else can do me good. My soul craveth for true and immortal life; and this is thy gift: O give it unto me. In all thy means of grace, let my heart wait for thy grace by the means. "Teach me to bless thee for means, when I have them; and to trust thee for means, when I have them not; yea, to trust thee without means, when I have no hope of them." Without thy presence, all outward things are barren and dry; and my soul can find no sustenance. Lead me, O my gracious Shepherd, by thine own hand, to the green pastures, and beside the waters of thy holy rest; restoring my soul, and conducting me in the paths of righteousness for thy name's sake. So shall I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, neither fearing nor finding any evil; and at length arrive at the heavenly house of my God, in which I shall dwell for ever and ever.

CHAP. IV.

ON SELF-SEEKING.

As they that are in the flesh, cannot please God at all; so they that follow the flesh in any instance, do so far displease him. This flesh is a subtle adversary, and will creep into our duties as well as our sins; mixing itself, under a thousand forms, in almost all that we can say, or think, or do.

Who could expect to feel this deceiver in the deepest contrition of soul, or to find him in peals of groans and showers of tears? Yet self will endeavour to make a man proud of this very humility, to be plumed upon his own abasements, and be fancying himself something, in the midst of his confessions about his vileness and nothingness.

A poor soul shall own itself, with much pain and sincerity, to be a miserable sinner; and self, from this very acknowledgment, will stir up a notion of worth in the creature, and give it to believe, that there are some seeds at least of excellency within itself, which others have not, and for having of which he is higher or better than they. Self will bid some men confess themselves sinners, that they may be considered as saints. To take them at their word, would mortify and displease them.

When the heart of the believer is melted in duty, and enjoys the liveliest frame of communion and love; how often and how much is self to be found therein, either attempting to puff up with a high opinion, or to instil a carnal security, concerning its spiritual interest and welfare? If it can abate the power and watchfulness of faith, it will lay a ground of distress to the believer in the next trial; so that he will soon find himself to be yet in the flesh, and that (as one says) "He must never think to put off his armour, till he is ready for others to put on his shroud."

A man may appear excellent in religious conversation, and be eminent in public duties; he may speak and write much, and perhaps well, upon the things of God, and may recommend them with zeal to others; and yet so much of self may be in all, that, when he looks over his heart and discovers it, he will rather find reason to be ashamed of the whole, than to be satisfied with any one part of it. I know not, whether in writing these pages, there be not so much of this evil mixing itself, as to defile and almost nullify any good that may be in them. And though I can humbly look to God for the sincerity and uprightness of my general aim, yet such are my apprehensions of my own carnality, vanity, emptiness, and self-love, and of the sinfulness of giving them indulgence, in serious things especially, that I am sometimes inclined to throw the whole aside. I see this hateful principle in almost everything I can say or do, and am ashamed of myself, and of it; but still it rises again and again, though often detected; and therefore I am obliged continually to cast myself, with a redoubled sense of my mean, weak, vain, and vile condition of nature, upon the sole and free mercy of God my Saviour.

In success of duty for God, and in being the instrument of good to others, this selfishness of our hearts will endeavour, if not to rob God entirely of his glory, yet at least to share with him in it. Self will be pleased, because we ourselves have been concerned, because we have been honoured, and because by us the Lord hath been magnified in the souls of others. It is self which is vexed, when this is not the case, and when we have toiled for nothing, or others have caught the fishes. Whereas, our spirits should rejoice in the will of the Lord, and be as much pleased when his work prospers in other hands, as in our own. And thus indeed they would rejoice, if this corrupt self did not mix with, and seek its own establishment in, the most spiritual exercises of our souls. We too much forget, that we are only instruments, and that we can do no more of ourselves for God, than our pens can write down our thoughts, when not taken up by our hands.

All this may serve to show, what a severe jealousy we should hold concerning ourselves. We should not only pray, but watch unto prayer; we should both perform our religious duties with zeal, and should examine well the zeal with which we perform them; we should abound in every work and labour of love, and should entreat for wisdom and grace, that flesh and self may not abound in them too; we should ask again and again for a single eye and a simple heart, that all the glory of every good may be given to God, its right owner, that we may be kept in our true place, admiring his mercy, and showing forth entirely his honour and praise.

CHAP. V.

ON THE DIFFERENT APPEARANCES OF GRACE IN DIFFERENT PERSONS.

"There are diversities of operations, but it is the same God, who worketh all in all." Some believers are remarkable for the strength of their faith in trials even unto death; others for their livelinesss and activity in duty; others for their wisdom, conduct, and prudence, both in temporals and spirituals; others for their zeal in defence of the truth; others for their knowledge in the mysteries of the truth; others for their patience, meekness, and gentleness; others for their submission to the will of God; others for outward usefulness in the church; and others for an inward and spiritual life of communion with God. But all these are the various gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit, "dividing to every man severally as he will," and not the talents or abilities of fallen nature. They are also given to every man, who hath them, to profit withal, according to his place in the church, or in the world. He, who hath one of these graces, should not undervalue or despise him who hath another; for the giver is the same, though his gifts may be granted for different ends.

Very often particular graces are bestowed, to counteract and oppose particular corruptions, of which the Lord himself can be the only true judge. Some situations of Christians require gifts of grace, which might be less necessary, or less manifestative of the divine glory in others, than they are in them. The Lord distributeth wisely and kindly to all his people, according to their day and duty, or according to his own designs in them and for them. But they are all of them his workmanship, and could not in grace, more than in nature, either create or fashion themselves.

This should teach thee, my fellow Christian, a lesson of forbearance to thy brethren. It is not right for thee to judge another by thine own pattern. He may have graces, not less pleasing to God, nor less useful in their purpose, than those which are given to thee. Art thou a warm and active Christian? Condemn not him, whose endowments may be more placid and contemplative than thine. He who now creeps as a snail, in humble silence, may, by one lift of divine power, get into heaven before thee, and perhaps be raised higher there than thou. God judgeth not like man, according to the outward show, but according to the secret riches of his love. Art thou a quiet and retired believer? Do not censure him, who is called forth to more stirring duty than thou art. Though his work may seem less spiritual to thee, it may be to introduce designs of providence and grace, which only God can foreknow, and which may be the means of carrying out his saving power far and wide. Some of the first reformers were less remarkable for a quiet and gentle spirit, than some who have followed them; but these last do not seem so fit instruments for grappling with papal outrage and tyranny, as they were. When rough work is to be done, men use the axe and the saw; but, for gentler operations, the plane, the razor, or the knife. These last would not cut down a forest; nor would the first serve to polish or smooth.

Honour, then, the work and blessing of God upon his people, in what form soever it may be found. Every member hath his appointed office from him. It is self-love and conceit, which disparage others; and these we will not call gifts from above, but rather worms from beneath, which seek to gnaw the root of the vine. Covet, indeed, and earnestly, the best gifts; but the love of God and man is, after all, the more excellent way.

CHAP. VI.

ON THE DIFFERENCE OF MYSELF FROM MYSELF.

Lord, how variable a creature am I! Unstable as water, changeable as wind, different as the weather, when I am left, in any instance or degree, to myself. One of our English kings, from his slackness, was called "The Unready;" and the same name, with respect to my best concerns, will too often serve for me.

Sometimes I have a fair day of comfort and hope; but the clouds come on again, and gather blackness over my soul. Short and sweet was the hour of my spiritual delight; but now the time of my dulness and drooping hath been frequent and long.

Blessed be thy name, O Lord, that my real state with thee doth not depend upon my vigour, liveliness, and constancy, but upon those only sure grounds, thy faithfulness, mercy, omnipotence, and truth. Whatever I am, or may be, in myself, thou art, and wilt be, always the same, and always the same to me.

The time, or rather the eternity, is at hand, when my state will be unchangeable, and my frames will be unchangeable too. The crowns of glory cannot fade, nor those that wear them alter or decay. I shall both know as I am known, and in all things shall be like to my immutable and glorious Saviour, when I get into his kingdom.

Why, then, should my present variations distress me? I live not by them, nor for them, but upon a higher principle, and for a more exalted end. This is the time of faith, in which I must wrestle, and labour, and strive, against all the disadvantages of an evil nature, and an evil world; and I am to look for strength from Christ, who will be honoured in my weakness and deficiency, which compel me to give up myself incessantly to him. He is engaged to preserve me by his own oath and unchangeable covenant; and, therefore, come fair, come foul; let me have either comfort or sorrow; all must be well at the last, for he hath promised, and most assuredly will give me, a safe and abundant entrance into heaven.

CHAP. VII.

ON BRIDLING THE TONGUE.

It hath been a frequent confession of wise and good men, that they have often lamented their speaking too much, but seldom their holding their tongue. In the multitude of words there will be some folly, something that will not tend to edification, something that may rather weary and offend, than delight nn inform.

This evil of over-speaking usually comes from an over-weening opinion of self. Unchastised and unsubdued self is fond of its own display; although it can display nothing, or, were it not deceiving and deceived, nothing but its own wretchedness and ruin. The apostle hath a striking hint for professors of religion: "If any man among you seem to be religious, and bridleth not his tongue, but deceiveth his own heart, this man's religion is vain."

What is our end in religious conversation? If we speak without a purpose, surely it is folly. If we speak for own praise, it is a wrong to our own souls, and a robbery of God. If we speak for his honour, and the edification of others, we should look up to him for his blessing, that our words, as they ought, may be weighty and wise. In this humble dependence upon God, and with a warm and generous concern for the spiritual welfare of others, our discourse may be comfortable and edifying, both to them and to ourselves. A word in season, thus spoken, may be remembered, and blessed. The more of this kind of conference, the better; care being taken of the spirit in which we speak, of time and propriety of the speaking, and of not mixing other things (as is too often the case) with our religious discourse, which may render it trifling or unsavoury. When we have said all that we could wish to say upon things divine, it will be profitable to withdraw, that there may be a due opportunity for reflection, meditation, digestion, and prayer.

CHAP. VIII.

UPON FALSE APPEARANCES.

The whole world walketh in a masquerade, or, as the Scripture calls it, "an image," or "vain show." Scarcely any man would appear as he is, but as he is not, before others; and he loves to indulge even his own mind in the same deceitful view of himself. The more artfully he can put on the vail, the finer man he seems, often in his own esteem, generally in the esteem of others; and nothing mortifies him more than when some wind of trial blows this vail but a little aside, so that others perceive a part at least of what he hath been always very industrious to conceal.

This disguise is the handiwork of evil and corrupted nature, fallen from the truth and purity of God, into a strong love and likeness of the perplexed and foolish subtlety, which fully occupies that being, who is the father and author of lies from the beginning. To plead for this dissimulation, as some have done, is to turn advocate for the evil one, whose fees are vanity and vexation in this world, and something worse in the world to come.

Our depraved nature cannot bear to see its own wickedness, and much less to have it exposed. What shifts and turns, what labours and difficulties, will it not encounter, to obtain a great name and opinion, though it bo but a false one! And how will it be delighted, as with a prize, in the fleeting breath of dying creatures, who have only for a memorial of themselves, some filthy monument of sin or shame! To be open and sincere, is counted a weakness; because it lowers a man's power of taking those advantages for interest and fame, which all men by nature are pursuing, and which, in a state of nature, they think to be the only object worth pursuing, as the highest and greatest good.

And, alas! how much of this disguise is brought into the things and church of God! I lament, for one, how prone I am to cheat myself, and to wish more for the esteem of others, than I ought to think of, or than I can possibly deserve! I would be all fair, and valuable, and excellent, and what not, in their esteem; while I am concious to myself, that there is within me so much vanity, weakness, dulness, wretchedness, and evil, as might justly suffice to render me in their eyes, what any ef them, that can look into themselves, must appear to be in their own.

I have displeased some, whom I did not intend to displease; and others have offended me, perhaps with a contrary intention. The same persons and myself have been mutually satisfied at one time, and dissatisfied at another; and wherefore? Not because my nature or theirs was better or worse at any time, but only because it sometimes discovered itself more according to the occasion. And when it drops the disguise of goodness which we can regard, or discovers itself too plainly, sinners as we are, we cannot love it, so odious and depraved is it become since the original ruin. We cannot love it in others, nor others because of it; though we are at a world of pains to conceal, to indulge, or to dress off, the ugly monster in ourselves.

It is this depravity, which hath begotten hypocrisy, not only in the world at large, or in courts, or particular callings of men, where certainly it doth reign absolutely and universally, but also in religious profession, where surely it ought not. It hath reigned especially in this last, since it hath been esteemed a scandal not to be called a Christian. It is true, indeed, that the appearance of religion is certainly better than the appearance of evil; but, however, when men seek to appear religious, for the selfish honour or carnal comfort which may follow from others upon account of it, they only seek themselves, and are but the less truly religious, for all their professions.

Why am I grieved, if others think lightly of my gracious attainments? Because I am grown unjustly great in my own esteem for things, which are not my own, but given to me. But doth not this very grief prove, that their judgment is but too right, and that my real stature is not so tall as I think it? If I were humbled in myself, in some degree as I ought to be (for, in in the full and just degree, no man can be humbled in this life,) I should approve their sincerity towards me, and contentedly sit down before them in the lowest room. Their low opinion would not hurt me, because it would be the same as my own. The vileness of my heart, and the low progress I have made in Christian experience, are, indeed, sufficient to humble me every day I breathe; and it is only my own blindness, or a falseness to myself, that leads me to forget either my own real condition, or the place where I ought to stand.

We are not naturally honest to ourselves; and we do not wish that others should deal honestly with us. If we were truly honest and wise, (and grace only can make us so in any degree,) we should meekly hear, and even wish to hear, of our own frailties, errors, and defects, that we might grow the true Christian growth, which doth not consist in the favourable opinion of men, and of our own minds; but in lowliness of heart, and spirituality of life, respecting ourselves; in patience, quietness, good-will, with regard to others; in contrition, humiliation, and submission before God.

Professors live too much outwardly. Religion is carried often into the strong animal passions, not to subdue, but to feed them. Hence the poor anger and violence of a corrupted nature, are frequently mistaken for zeal, for life, and for power. But noise, and bustle, and tumult, and hurry; the agitations of temper, and strong desires for influence or authority, or direction among men; the parade of religion, or the superiority of a party, may all be carried on with very small degrees of real grace, and perhaps with none at all. Diotrephes loved to have the pre-eminence; but this could not suppress his inward bitterness, nor increase the signs of his Christian calling, 3 John 9. If we do not live for God in our religion, we must live outwardly, and so shall endeavour to make a "fair show in the flesh;" but if we have his presence indeed, the truest way of our life will be hidden, and we shall much and gladly retire within to enjoy it. The most certain sign of our real growth will be, the sinking into ourselves as vileness and nothing; the being thought meanly of with content, if not pleasure; and the rising up of our souls towards God with secret delight, ardour, affection, and constancy. All this may be done before Him who seeth in secret, far better than in the corners of the streets, or places of public resort. We shall aim, through grace, to be gracious, rather than to appear so.

This hidden life my soul pants for, O Lord, thou knowest; whatever becomes my outward respect among men. If I have the more of thee, for the loss of this, it will be, indeed, a rich amends. Nay, it will be better for me to be without human regards, lest I should grow more proud than I already am, and so lose that blessed sight of thee, which I always enjoy most sweetly and clearly in the deepest renunciation and depression of myself. O make me more and more dead to the opinion of even gracious men, that my poverty and meanness may ever be before me, and that in all forms and circumstances, I may constantly be relinquishing myself, so that I may have more inward and intimate fellowship, friendship, complacency, and nearness with thee!

"Careless myself, a dying man,
 Of dying men's esteem;
Happy, O Lord, if thou approve,
 Though all beside condemn."

CHAP. IX.

ON THE SPIRIT OF THE WORLD.

NOTHING more fully proves the fall of man from his original creation, than the opposition and temper of his soul, while in his natural state, to the things of God. His wishes, his hopes, his labours, his principles of action and thinking, are all turned directly to another way. "God is not really (whatever a man of the world may speculate) in all his thoughts." He is "without God," or rather, in sober truth, he is (as the apostle calls him) "an atheist in the world."

Hence it is, that the people of the world have, in all ages, reputed the people of God either to be fools, in not laying themselves out for such things as wholly engage themselves; or knavish hypocrites, who only take a pretended spiritual method to accomplish the same carnal and selfish ends. And if they can find an instance or two (as they have often done, and may do) to confirm this opinion, Oh, how do they insult over professors of all kinds, and run down religion itself, as though it were a trap or an engine for all manner of deceit, or at best, a whimsical paradise, framed by superstition for dunces and fools!

On the other hand, how wild, mad, besotted, and phrenetic, do all the agitations of these men seem to the Christian, in his retired and considerate hours! They are pursuing, in his view, lies and shadows, vapours and dreams. They grasp after something, they scarcely know what. Ever restless, they are always upon the hunt; but never finding, never satisfied. They live weary and tired lives, full of envy, disappointment, and care: and they die hopeless deaths, either in abject terror at what may come upon them hereafter, or in the stupid opinion, that God created them only to live for awhile, like maggots, upon the trash of the earth, and then, at last, to be thrown into a whole, to rot away into nothing. Such is the sordid spirit and wisdom of this world!

CHAP. X.

ON THE PRIDE OF THE HEART.

MOST of the discomforts of our lives arise from the pride of our hearts, unmortified and unsubdued. Did I think as meanly and humbly of myself, as, from the knowledge of my weakness and sinfulness, I ought, the contempt or the insult of others would not hurt or afflict me. But I am false to myself, and therefore lifted up, assuming to my vile nature what it hath no right to expect; and I am false to others, wearing appearances, to create respect and esteem; which is walking in a mask, and rendering myself foolishly proud. If men saw me, and I saw them, as we really are, we should none of us be much inclined to boast of ourselves; but our glorying must either cease, or else be wholly in the Lord.

This pride hath occasioned to my soul a world of trouble, both when it hath reigned unsubdued, and while, through grace and trials, it hath been in the act of subduing.

When it is unsubdued, the heart is open to all manner of mortifications. A look, a gesture, or a word, shall put it to pain; and when this pain rages, the passions will begin to rave, and throw the whole frame into a miserable violence and disorder. Outward opposition will make it worse. The inflammation then grows often to a degree of frenzy, which nothing hardly can soothe or allay. And it is one of the wonders of providence, that this pride of man, when combined and raging in multitudes, doth not confound all order and rules more than it doth, and utterly ruin and destroy the world.

To subdue this sore evil, the pride of heart and life, and all its effects, in his people, is one great end of God, in afflicting dispensations. They are high in themselves; and it is necessary for their good, that they should be brought down. Whatever answers this end, come in what shape it may, it is all a blessing.

Did such a one use me ill, or speak contemptuously of me? As David said of Shimei, it is because the Lord hath permitted him. Hath he treated me as I deserve? Why, then, am I angry? He hath been to me a messenger of truth, whatever were his intentions, with which I have nothing to do; and, therefore, let me own the truth, and fall down in abasement and contrition before God. Is the censure false? I have no right to be offended. He hath not hit me, but himself, and becomes therefore the object of my prayer. If, in this instance, his condemnation hath been wrong, my heart knoweth in how many others, and perhaps in worse, it would have been just and right. In every view, I have no fair claim to be flattered with the applauses of men, but to be humbled in myself for the constant weakness, worthlessness, and evil, that cleave to me in all things. If I felt this as I ought, and walked, as I ought, in the continual sense of it; I should be ashamed to be proud, and should abhor myself for the bold injustice and iniquity of being so, in dust and ashes.

I believe that some Christians have more trials and afflictions in the flesh than others, because there is more natural stubbornness of pride and wilfulness in them. The Lord will have thee to be subdued. And he suiteth all his chastisements, with great and unerring wisdom, to the occasion. If they thought of this aright, they would not be so much in care to get rid of the visitation, as to have the design of it answered within them. They would pray to be humbled under the mighty hand of God, that he might exalt them in the right way, and in the due time.

It is my pride, and my self-will which proceeds from pride, that render me so uneasy with God and with others. Were I truly lowly, and deeply sensible of my own condition, not the opinion and hard words of others, but my own sin, would offend me. I am imperfect, as in all other graces, so especially in humility; and therefore I fret in myself, and am inclined to speak, and to render evil for evil. O Lord, help me, a poor feeble man, and hide pride from mine eyes! Suffer me not to fall upon this stumbling-block, which hath overturned the world; but help me to follow Jesus, who was meek and lowly in heart, and by him to find rest to my soul!

CHAP. XI.

COMPARISON BETWEEN CARNAL AND SPIRITUAL WISDOM.

CARNAL wisdom is the highest attainment of the carnal mind. It is an exhibition of fallen man in his fairest and most cultivated form; and is therefore the aim and desire of the best of natural men.

This wisdom (for we will call it at present by that name,) arising from a depraved and corrupt principle, is necessarily weak and corrupt likewise. It seeks earthly and carnal things, is occupied entirely upon them, and looks no higher, and finds no more, when left to its own inclinations and powers. This wisdom, therefore, is called, in the Scripture, earthly, sensual, devilish. It acts only upon, and for, this present world: it is plunged in the sensuality and designs of it, through an earthly evil nature: it is, like Satan, in total opposition to the will and holiness of God, serving, as its last end, the creature, instead of the Creator.

Thus, the learned man is proud of his knowledge, as it gives him superiority over others: the statesman, by his political understanding, pursues and triumphs in his own grandeur: the merchant, by his skill in trade, heaps up to himself riches: the mechanic, by his art and ingenuity, assumes his peculiar distinction: the carnal divine (for such a one there may be) is learned, and zealous for his party or profession, or for his own carnal exaltation in it. In short, it is no matter whether the means be high or low, but every man of every condition employs all his understanding and all his powers for carnal views, for earthly glory, and for temporal attainments. If his plans are calculated for these, and especially if they succeed, he is admired, applauded, and admitted to be a great, a wise, or an extraordinary man.

But, alas! how vain and perishing, how delusive and unsatisfactory, is this short-lived wisdom, and all that it can seek after or find! To what purpose are eager, wearisome toils and cares, the studious anxieties, and restless pursuits, of all the millions of mortals in ages past, whose airy glory is forgotten, and whose very names are extinguished and lost? And if not lost and extinguished, yet of what value or consequence are they now, beyond the fleeting idea and imagination of mortals like themselves? And to how few, even in this last poor way, doth the remembrance extend! And how unknown and insignificant is all this to the owners, whose very image is departed from the world on which they doted!

This is the highest prize of all earthly wisdom; and is not this perfectly fanciful, fleeting, trivial, and vain? In the grave all its thoughts perish, equally with the low notions and opinions of the ignorant and the foolish, the poor and the despised.

But there is a wisdom, which (unlike the other) deserves the name, and being no production of this corrupted earth, but coming from above, is pure and spiritual in its nature, and, in all its purposes and effects, true, real, lasting and happy.

Its origin is in grace from Him who is the fountain of wisdom. And its first effect is in the renunciation and abasement of self, as that which is false and contrary. Thus, the fear of the Lord is the beginning, or first-fruits, which the soul can present, of wisdom; and thus a man must become a fool, that he may be wise. This wisdom sees the ignorance of all other pretended wisdom, detects its base and grovelling pursuits, and lifts up the soul, not to a temporary dying fame, which is often infamy with God, but to a solid and perpetual good. It discovers the deceivableness of unrighteousness in the heart, and in the world, the poorness of everything out of Christ, and the great value of Christ, and of the soul, above all other things. It doth not lift up a man in himself, as a great and glorious doctor, for human admiration; but it makes him low in his own eyes, through a view of the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus his Lord; and it keeps him from aiming at vain glory, a being a kind of treason against God, and as an unjust attainment for himself, a poor, dependent, ignorant sinner. The Christian, made wise to salvation, dreads to be left to his own wisdom; because he knows that blindness is its other, and its truer name.

Christ is made, of God, wisdom to the believer. He spake as never man spake; and none teacheth like him. He often gives a poor and ignorant countryman such instructions, as render him abundantly more wise than the mere scholar by all the florid pomp of the schools. So engrafted, too, are his instructions, that the art of man, and the sophistry of Satan, cannot baffle those who possess them. His knowledge is solid, and real, and enjoyable; such as the heart can feel, the soul live by, the spirit exult in, the whole man act upon, amidst a thousand trials in the world, and in the nearest prospect of death and eternity.

Possessing this wisdom, how serenely can the Christian look down upon the bustling cares and pursuits of men, upon their honours, their pleasures, their riches; even as a man of great natural wisdom would look down upon the follies and recreations of boys! Toys and games employ the attention of children, and engage their passions, though frivolous and fleeting. And are the solicitudes of men, and of old men too, less idle or extravagant, when they lay out all their time, and strength, and souls, for that which profiteth not even here, and which none pretend to be profitable in the day of wrath? What poor things are these of the world in the hours of sickness and pain! And how much poorer still, in the hour of approaching death! Honours, titles, and estates cannot remove a pang, or give one drop of consolation; but, in many cases, afford a wish, of dismal remorse to their owners, that they had never obtained them. There is, I fear, more than one Dives, in eternity, who laments that he had not been a hundred times poorer and sorer than any Lazarus (with grace) was, or could be, in this world.

True wisdom proves its own worth, by obtaining a proper and valuable end. On the other hand, that cannot be real, but delusive, wisdom, which is always working and promising, and at last concludes in nothing, or nothing but ruin. But this is the most which is attained by the wisdom of this world, spiritually viewed. It gains air and dirt, a name and a perishing good (if a good) below; and then it ceases to act, leaving its poor possessor only misery and disappointment, except a fearful expectation of an unwished and unwelcome hereafter. Can the end of the merest idiot be more stupid and unwise?

Without a doubt, the affairs of this life must be carried on, and the Christian must, more or less, be engaged in them; but the wisdom of grace in his soul will teach him, that there are also other affairs to mind; affairs of infinitely more moment to him than all the world put together. If he should gain the utmost, or the whole of this earth, and lose himself, and the end of his being; where would be his profit and advantage? People who can speculate clearly and nicely for gains in common matters, would do well to carry their thoughts of profit and loss a little farther towards the end of time, when all things are to be balanced and settled for ever.

Lord, above all wisdom of earth, and earthly gain, may I obtain that wisdom, which leadeth to a happy immortality, and which shall abide with me beyond the bounds of time! I am a poor dying creature, going fast out of this world, and almost upon the very threshold of another. O help me to see, then, what can truly profit, or what may really hinder me; that "the loins of my mind" may be girt up with the girdle of saving wisdom, and that I may always be so running, as at length to obtain the crown! O preserve my heart from that unwise wisdom, which layeth up what must soon be lost, and squanders away what can never be regained! which thinketh much of airy trifles, and almost not at all, or not at all to purpose, of an unperishing good! of a good which thy Spirit hath called, "an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, a crown of glory that fadeth not away, a building of God, eternal in the heavens, a kingdom which cannot be shaken, a blessedness which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor hath it entered into the heart of man; yea, rivers of joy, and pleasure for evermore!" Lord, if thou give but the wisdom to obtain these, I shall very soon cease to lament the want of all wisdom beside!

CHAP. XII.

UPON INDEPENDENCE.

Men desire what is called independent fortunes, through their natural arrogance, and fond indulgence to their flesh: and because believers are flesh as well as spirit, therefore, in proportion as that flesh is spiritually uncircumcised and unsubdued, even do these require this meat of the world for their lust. It is very irksome to a believer's carnal nature, that he lives in his spirit the life of faith; and it will be more and more irksome to nature, as this life grows in him, and is proved by trials which tend to deny or abridge his earthly desires. The flesh cannot delight in anything that doth not gratify its senses; but the life of the spirit consists greatly in "crucifying the flesh with its affections and lusts," in trusting God, through a naked promise, for what is yet unseen, and in giving up will, hope, desire, and everything within and without, to his disposal. This is all horrid and dismal, yea, death itself, to the natural man. He hates, and abhors, and scoffs, and sets all his wits and passions at work to cry down a life so strange and peculiar, that he must even die to himself and all he loves, before he can live it. But whosoever will save this life of the carnal mind, shall lose it; and whosoever shall lose it, shall, by the mercy of God, find a better, even a life of confidence and communion with Christ Jesus.

This principle of independence, or aversion to live in simple trust upon God, is the secret cause why many professors hasten to be rich, or will be rich in this world, though by it "they fall into a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in ruin and perdition." If I can get such and such a fortune, I will do so and so, (say they,) and then serve God without distraction." But the flesh is not to be laid asleep by indulgence, nor the fire to be put out by heaping up fuel. Experience shows, that large possessions do much oftener damp any little life or zeal for God, than quicken the Christian's hope and concern for a better world.

The spirit of faith teaches another lesson. It bids a man "commit all his way to the Lord," and rather to fear than to court great riches; knowing what mischief and wretchedness they have brought upon many, who once seemed to run well; and knowing also the natural desire of the carnal mind to covet these things merely for its own food and feasting.

The goodness of God, therefore, providentially keeps his children, for the most part, poor in this world, that they might live in the fuller trust and dependence upon himself. He that doth not expect much from this world, cannot be much disappointed by it. When a man hath little or nothing before him, he looks to the best help: so the poor Christian sees, that God is his best help, and therefore lives humbly upon his bounty. In this way of continual trust and daily dependence, and not by fulness of bread or independence, he is made rich in faith by additional experiences, and walks with more and more strength and sweetness of spirit as an "heir of the kingdom."

On the other hand, how many rich professors are there, who plead their very situations in life, as so many false reasons why they should be gay and splendid, why they should see all sorts of fine company, no matter of whom, why they should have pompous equipage and luxurious tables, and why, in short, they should have everything in dress, manner, and custom, which their poor, vain, foolish, unmortified flesh can desire to have! They seem not to see how in all this they are living to themselves or to earth, and not to God or his glory among men. How it is, that they support faith at any rate, with every indulgence and ease to the flesh, with full conformity to the world, and with the entire good opinion of the world, I know not: but this I know, that if the true life be supported amidst so much contagion and disease, it is because "all things are possible with God," though with men this, amongst others, is impossible. I speak not against rank and station, for these are providential appointments, and necessary in themselves; but against the abuse of these to pride, sloth, vanity, and all the common evils and excesses of a polluted world. And I believe also, that I do not speak from envy or chagrin; for I really know not the man in this world with whom I should wish, or dare to wish, an exchange of situation. Lord, let me have what is best for my true life and welfare, and that only. Make me contented in thy allotment. I have often been otherwise, and am still prone to desire unnecessary and dangerous things: O forgive me this error and blindness, and correct the madness of my proud and rebellious heart by the fervent faithful life of thy Holy Spirit. So shall I desire only what will please thee, and be content in my soul with what thou givest, or when thou deniest, however my flesh may strive to murmur and repine. O hear me; and let my whole trust, my God, be in thee!

CHAP. XIII.

ON WORLDLY GRANDEUR.

To a Christian, living and walking as becomes his heavenly calling, how poor and creeping, how idle and vain, how foolish and wretched, is the common eager pursuit after high distinctions in the world! They not only come up and are cut down like the grass, withering into dust and oblivion; but, while they appear, they are empty and fleeting shadows, or (if it can be conceived) the very "shadows of a shade." If viewed at a distance, they seem solid as a mountain; if embraced closely, they are found but a cloud. Their possessors are poor, because ever in want. One blast of honour will not serve him that wishes for two; nor a thousand, him that can hope for more. The dominion of Europe would make a natural man pant for Asia; and he that cannot be satisfied without an additional province or river, would not be satisfied with this whole world if he had it, but (like Alexander) would grasp and lament for another. Whatever a natural man hath, it is no matter: he never hath enough; he always wants more. Consequently, he is poor; and he is wretched, because he perpetually feels himself poor. He hath both miseries from his poverty, and torments from his pride.

The real Christian is enabled to pity the anxious absurdity and vexatious vanity of those things, which are the great jet and concern of the worldly-great and worldly-wise. He looketh indeed for a name, but it is for "an everlasting name, which cannot be cut off." He is not content to be happy only for a few days or years, but desires to be blessed and joyful for thousands and millions of ages to come. He longs for a crown, but it is for "a crown of glory, that fadeth not away." He pants for a kingdom, but it is for the "kingdom of Christ and of God." He is really a person of boundless ambition; for nothing less will serve him than the infinite realms of everlasting glory. Riches are much upon his heart; but they are the durable, the unsearchable riches of Christ. He cannot be put off with the paltry cares and thorny honours of wordly greatness; but nobly pursues, and with certainty too, the very happiness and grandeur of God himself, even that very glory which Christ received from the Father, and which, as their head, he will share with his members.

Compared with this, all the pride and glory of man appear but as stubble or falsehood, the mere dream of a shadow, a nothing. And if human greatness can appear thus in the believer's ideas now; what will it seem. when the earth itself shall be dissolved, and the Babylon of sin upon it shall be thrown down into perpetual ruins?

> O what is earth, if heav'n be mine,
> Or what its dying toys?
> I seek, I burn for wealth divine
> For God's immortal joys!

CHAP. XIV.

ON WORLDLY COMPANY.

All things may be lawful, but all things are not expedient. It may be lawful for a Christian to be much among the men of this world, and in some cases it may be necessary, for the discharge of lawful callings; but it is not expedient certainly to be more among them, than is thus strictly proper and necessary. Either the Christian must enter into their spirit, or they into his, before they can be agreeable companions. If he take up their spirit, surely it will soon be to his grief, and to his burden. And it is very unlikely that they should come into his, unless God might bless his faithful conversation to the good of their souls. But this is seldom the case in worldly company, and especially in the company of many worldy men together. The corruptions of one will bear up and harden the corruptions of another; and he, that perhaps would not have jeered alone, will scoff by sympathy with a mocking crowd. It is best to speak of spiritual things with carnal men by themselves; when common decency may force them to give a patient hearing, even though grace may not crown the discourse with a blessing. A whole herd may only trample upon your jewels, and then turn again to rend you.

That man's religion is much to be doubted of, who frequents the society of the men of this world for satisfaction and pleasure. "How can two," even two only, "walk together, unless they be agreed? If ye were of the world, the world would love its own; but because ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you (says Christ) out of the world, therefore the world hateth you."

Can a man touch filth, and not be defiled; or fire, and not be hurt? How much less then can a man conform to the spirit of this world, without pollution to his soul, or without feeling the loss of that peace, if he ever had it, which the world can neither give nor take away? It is no wonder that men complain of spiritual falls and desertions, when they stand upon slippery places, and leave the presence of God for the presence of mammon. How can a heart, reeking from the hot dunghill of this filthy world, be offered as a sweet-smelling savour to God, or hope to be accepted with returns of his heavenly fire?

CHAP. XV.

THE MANNERS OF THE WORLD ARE HURTFUL AND HINDERING TO BELIEVERS.

The apostle declared it, as his privilege, that "the world was crucified to him, and he to the world." Another apostle says, that "whosoever will be a friend of the world, is the enemy of God." And Christ assures us, that "we cannot serve God and mammon," insomuch, that if we would approve ourselves to be his disciples, "we must take up our cross daily, and follow him."

This is very evident: they who are the most given to the modes of this world, and mix most with its customs and pursuits, are the least alive to God, and the least lively in the things of God. Gaiety and foppery of dress, mimicry of worldly pride and parade, the hollow language of fashionable companies and friendships, do ill become a Christian, and never promote his true welfare.—It is not indeed the custom at this day to say such things to professors; but they are not, however, the less true, or the less needful.

Poor and wretched are all these fooleries when weighed in the balance of the sanctuary, and especially when they thrust out the enjoyment of things divine. To have gay bodily apparel with cold and naked souls; to possess fulness of bread, with emptiness of grace; to enjoy much worldly company, and lose the society of God and his saints; to be esteemed polite and genteel in manners with men, and to be awkward and dumb in addresses to God; is all such a complication of folly, meanness, misery, and sin, as a Christian in his right mind, should be amazed at and abhor.

Are we loved by the world? It is for this reason: the world will love its own. But how then are we "chosen out of the world?" How then can we belong to Christ whom the world hateth?—This trimming between God and the world is neither for the comfort of our souls, nor for the credit of our profession.

Do we fear to be censured for singularity and precision? A Christian must be singular; for he is one of those, who is "not to be numbered with the nations," a stranger, and a pilgrim, or passenger, here: and he must be precise, neither loving the world, nor living for the world, for otherwise "the love of the Father is not in him."

On the other hand, an open and generous civility, a gentle and benevolent deportment, bespeaking sincerity of heart and holiness of life, are truly ornamental to the Christian. In avoiding the ape, a believer needs not to stumble upon the bear; nor, in shunning grimace and affectation, to plunge into sourness and brutality. If meekness, patience, gentleness, good-will, and good works, will please all men; it is his duty, by these means, to study to please them. But if they expect his conformity to the world for their pleasure, and are disgusted at the transformation and renewal of his mind, as it is more than probable they will be; it is then his honour and his privilege not in this way to please them, if he would approve himself to be the servant of Christ.

Though the Christian, in one sense, must be in the world, and put his best hand to its business and affairs, according to his lot from God's providence; yet, in another sense, he must come out from the world, and be separate, lest his soul be hindered and defiled. He cannot enter into the spirit of the world without injury and loss: and it is the spirit, not the lawful business, of the world, which contains all the evil. In his calling and concerns, a believer is to glorify God; and he is enabled to do this, first by the prayer of faith over them, and then by the life of faith in them. That business and those intentions, which will not admit of these, are to be avoided as the very plague.

Lord, how poor and vile are all the gay modes of this world, compared with the simplicity and enjoyment of thy truth! how beggarly and unsatisfying are its vanities, how low and crawling its ambition, how foolish and cheating its hopes, how vain and unprofitable its cares, how various and continual its troubles, how wretched and horrible its end! O give me thy wisdom and love, thy grace and thy truth; for this is that better part, which shall never be taken from me!

CHAP. XVI.

ON CONVERSATION AMONG PROFESSORS.

There are many professors of religion, who are always craving for company. They think, that to be alone is to be dull, and that, without conversing with creatures, they must be silent and stupid, whimsical or melancholy. Such persons are to be pitied, who have not learned the divine secret of talking with God in private by fervent faith and prayer, who know not how to listen to the still small voice of his Spirit in his holy word, who cannot find an endless delight in discovering and tasting the sweets of redemption, and who loathe to commune with their own hearts, in their closet or their chamber, and be still.

When such persons get into company, and especially into a great company, they soon discover how unfit, as Christian professors, they are to be in it. The discourse, if of God and his truths, will be light and unsavoury, without unction or solid experience, or if their converse turn, as it generally will, upon men and earthly things, it will only differ from the language and spirit of this world, by being spoken by persons who wish to be thought of as living for another.

It is a melancholy truth, that the levity, dissipation, envy, calumny, and detraction, too often found among companies and parties professedly religious, as well as among the people of the world, make retirement very necessary to the Christian, who would walk much with God, and far more cheerful than the generality of talkative professors can conceive it to be. But the soul, which is led to the true enjoyment of divine communion, finds it a relief, rather than a burden, to "cease from man."

The Christian should not, if possible, get into company, but either to impart some spiritual good, or to receive it. If he hath grace and talents for the former, he will, before discourse, secretly look up to God for aid and blessing, and afterwards will desire rather to be humbled for what he could not say, or for the manner of saying it, than to be pleased, on his own account, for anything he did say, or for the satisfaction afforded to others. If, on the other hand, he hath received edification from godly conversation, he will then pray, that it may abide with him, that the sweet savour may not be lost, that it may be carried into lively act and experience, and that, like good seed upon good ground, it may increase with the increase of God, and bring forth fruit abundantly to perfection.

All this implies, that large and mingled assemblies must be more noisy than profitable. There hath been of this at all times very sufficient evidence. Great entertainments, and many persons called together to enjoy them, may serve to keep out the calm serenity and sweet possession of divine reflections, but perhaps too rarely promote them. In many words, there will probably be errors and folly; nor do numbers in a company always multiply wisdom. The flesh may be gratified and feasted, while the spirit may be starved, and wearied, and dry, and at last be sent empty away. It must be grievous, to a real Christian, thus to come out of company a worse man for entering into it.

It is the way of God to "feed his people with the rod," (of his gracious and selecting power,) even "his flock, his heritage, which dwell solitary in the wood, in the midst of Carmel," (the field of the world:) and they do feed (like Abraham and the patriarchs, who were stangers and pilgrims upon earth,) in Bashan and Gilead, (the lands appointed for them,) as in the days of old. Micah vii. 14. They were ever a people dwelling alone, (in abstraction from the spirit of this world,) and not reckoned among the nations. Numb. xxiii. 9.

If I have thee, O my God, I have plenitude of society, though (like the blessed John at Patmos) no creature should be nigh, or though I should be an outcast from all the world. Thou canst talk with me by thy works, by thy providences, and chiefly by thy Spirit and word. O what delight have I felt in the testimonies of thy faithfulness and truth, of thy mercy and grace, of thy presence and love, of thy glory and power! Surely, surely, when I have enjoyed these in their genuine sweetness, retired from every eye but thine; it hath seemed hard to go forth again into the world, or even into the converse of those, whom thy own providence and grace have endeared to me. And if this be so divinely delightful in a mortal body and a miserable world, O what shall my felicity be, when I become a pure exalted spirit, with pure life, in the calm and unspotted regions of glory?—When I think of these unutterable mercies, how can I but long and pant, how can I but hunger and thirst for God, the living God, my God, my own God, and my own for ever!

CHAP. XVII.

ON THE CHANGES OF TIME.

How do the things of this world pass away! One generation followeth another, and another that, and so on from age to age, filling up the long rolls of time in melancholy array. They appear long to me, because my rule of comparison is taken from the shortness of human life; but to eternity, to the everlasting existence and infinitude of my God, these ages are almost a nothing. Into this eternity, all that can be called time, is continually passing, as into a gulf which hath neither bottom nor bound. Thus, time is full of changes and vicissitudes; while eternity is not only a perpetual now, but also a perpetual same.

When I look into the histories of ancient days, and review the confusions and violences that have passed, (for the history of the world is little more than a record of its sins;) I ask my heart, to what purpose have all these things been, and where is now the profit to those evil men who promoted them? Their works are in the dust, or at best upon paper; so that, excepting perhaps for punishment, they have neither remained here, nor followed their authors. All their hopes, and cares, and commotions; their own restlessness, and their inquietudes to others; are all buried in everlasting gloom. The pleasant remembrance of their gayest hours is either extinguished, or followed up in sorrow for their sin; and the prospect before them—O what can this be, but a complication of all that is dreadful, unavoidable, and eternal!

This cool and serious review of all worldly things and affairs passes so often upon my mind, and seems so necessary in reminding me how much I am but a stranger and sojourner here, that, if I have dwelt a little the more upon the vain wickedness of this world, the reader will know the reason in me, if he feel no occasion to apply it to himself.

One cannot take up an annual calender of names, published only twenty or thirty years ago, without almost considering one's-self among the tombs. The gay courtier and the plotting statesman, who once figured away within the senate, or about the throne, now lie in undistinguishable ruin, with the beggar and the clown; not less vile than these, and perhaps not less regarded nor less forgotten than the lowest of the low.

And what shall preserve, from the like disaster, all the present system of cares and pleasures? If, indeed, that can be called a system, which begins in evil, is carried on with disorder, and ends in folly or nothing.

"O but (says one) I have much goods laid up for many years; and I will say to my soul, Soul, take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry." One of this sort, not worthy to be named, is put down in God's record for an everlasting fool. In the same night his soul was required of him, and had something else to think of than to attend the absurd business, which only the body could do, of eating, drinking, and being merry, in the abuse of temporal good.

In the midst of all this perishing and disordered state, there is one rich blessing, which never can fail. The mercy of Jehovah in Christ Jesus endureth, yea, endureth for ever. This is often repeated by the Lord himself, that it might be constantly and cheerfully believed.

O my soul, thy time faileth, thy body is decaying, the world is daily changing, and nothing about thee continueth in one stay. Blessed be God, to thee likewise a change shall soon come, and come for the better in the midst of it all! Whatever alterations appear, thou hast an unalterable God, and an unalterable home, before thee. If the earth fall into destruction, as soon it will, thy estate cannot be lost; for thou art only a pilgrim and traveller here, and thy inheritance is above, out of the reach of ruin. Thy interest being safe in Christ, all is safe that is worth saving, with respect to thee. Thou canst only pass from death into life, from sin to holiness, from pain to peace, from earth to heaven, from mortals to God.

O how then should I rejoice in thee, my Saviour and my Lord! In thee, who makest all things mine; all, either as good, or to lead me to good. I adore thee, that thou thus disposest of the world, life, death, things present, or things to come in my behalf; calling them mine, and making them really mine, because they contribute to my welfare. Above all, I bless thee for the end. I am lost in love and admiration when thou tellest me, that I am thine, O my Redeemer; as thou art God's!

What manner of love is this, that I, a mutable worm, should become an immutable spirit; that I, who live in a tottering house of clay, amidst a people of unclean lips, should be raised to a mansion of glory among the innumerable company of saints and angels; that I, a dull inhabitant of a miserable world, ruined and ravaged by sin and time, should be translated to a joyful rest, unchanging as eternity; that I, who was once a slave to Satan, and deserve only to live with him, should be made and kept a child of God, yea, an heir of God, and a joint-heir with Christ Jesus, of a kingdom which cannot be shaken! O what manner of love is this indeed!

CHAP. XVIII.

ON THE PATIENT ENDURING OF WRONGS.

Like the blessed psalmist, I have sometimes been rewarded evil for good, to the great discomfort of my soul. It seems trying to flesh and blood, that is, to my animal and corrupt passions, to bear all, and to say nothing: but yet this is generally my wisdom and my duty.

It is my wisdom, because then I do not stir up further evil or strife in my own bosom, or in others; and I moreover engage my gracious Master to undertake for me, by committing all in silent patience to him, who hath engaged to make everything, and such things as these most certainly among the rest, work together for my good. Thus, that which appears to be only a natural evil, will, by his superior management and control, be turned into a spiritual blessing.

It is also my duty to endure, considering him who endured the most severe contradiction of sinners against himself; because, thereby, I prove that I belong to him; for which purpose, perhaps, trials of this kind may have been permitted to fall upon me. If I have right and truth on my side, it is not only faithless, but also unreasonable, to be impatient. I ought rather to be thankful in that behalf, and to ask mercy and grace for those who slander me against all equity, and without a cause. It is, indeed, unpleasant to have the treatment which he experienced, who said, "I became a reproach among all my neighbours; and they, of mine acquaintance, were afraid of me; and they that did see me without, conveyed themselves from me." But this may be God's physic to my soul, which is not given me for my pleasure, but as the means, though painful means, of future good. My worldly attachments, or my Christian attachments in a worldly way, may be growing stronger than are for the true health of my soul; and, therefore, this is a call to live more inwardly upon grace, and to wait in faith and prayer for more communion with God. When I gain his company, by losing the company or the friendship of men, and even of good men, with great corruptions like my own, I have no reason to lament my loss, but to be thankful, with all humility, for the kindness of every providence which leads me nearer, and keeps me closer, to my blessed Lord. He is a tried and sure friend indeed, a friend for eternity.

If I took another sort of conduct, and exposed those as I might, and perhaps as they justly may deserve, who have done me evil for good; I should indulge only that base revenge of my fallen nature, which would plunge me as deep, another way, in the corruption of which I may have right to complain. I may and ought to use the caution of keeping out of the way of injury; but I must not revenge it either by word or deed. While I am only wronged, I am safe; but I am open to all manner of evil, when guilty of wrong.

Above all the harm that can be done me by creatures, let me tremble at my own passions, which, like tinder, are ready to kindle by the smallest spark of mental fire. May I tremble, too, at the officious readiness of others to increase my inflammation by their own. And, alas! how much more ready is corrupt nature to feel and to foment discord, than to subdue and abhor it! Let me pray, then, to be delivered, from the strife of other men's tongues, and to have a strong restraint, for such I greatly need, upon mine. "Sin is the great kill-friend," as one calls it; may I, therefore, beg to be guarded against sin, both in myself and in them!

O Lord, what a nature, and what a world, do I live in! I groan under a nature, which is ready to meet all the evils and confusions that are in the world, and to make every one of them my own. How doth the unquiet spirit of man plunge himself and all about him, into confusions, miseries, and distresses; engendering unhappy discords among individuals, and bloody cruel wars among the nations! And how often, my blessed Master, instead of retiring to thy bosom, have I myself allowed this spirit of violence within me, and met it in other men! How much have I wronged my enemies, by not praying for them, as I ought, when they have vented their wrongs against me! With how little patience and submission to thy will have I endured these wrongs, not considering that they could not have come, unless they had been permitted by thee, and were allowed to come altogether for my good! O Lord, wipe off my guilt by thy most precious blood, and enable me in future, as well not to take offence, as to be earnest to give none. So shall I appear, indeed, to be the disciple of thee my Saviour, who, like a patient, speechless lamb, didst endure all manner of insults and injuries; and so, in following thee, I shall find peace at least, by thy grace, both in thy bosom, and in my own, though I find none beside throughout this distracted world!

CHAP. XIX.

ON PRAYER.

Prayer is the very breath of faith, and the first evidence of new and spiritual life in the soul. The Lord said of Paul, "Behold he prayeth;" because the Lord had then given him a heart to pray. Doubtless, he had often fasted and prayed before, as far as the lips were concerned; but the spirit, not words—life, not expression only—constitute prayer with God. Language may give it a form; but language alone, is like a mere body without a soul; and he, that so offers it, renders to God a dead unclean carcass, for a living sacrifice; which is an abomination in his sight.

Whatever hath life, must breathe; and if the life be sound and strong, it will breathe freely. Short, irregular, disordered breath, discovers either great exercise, or ill health.

It is the same in the life of faith. If the soul be quickened by Christ, it will breathe out its desires after him; perhaps, like a child at first, mingled with strong crying, bitter sobs, and many tears. But still it breathes on, and prays on; its breath of prayer is not stopped, but struggles for life and increase. If the prayer be faint and weak, disordered and low, the person is not in full life and health, or else some great temptation oppresses him heavily. The Physician of souls must be looked to for medicine, and for deliverance. Certainly all is not right; and a speedy help should be sought for, and applied.

When the mind is truly touched by grace, it will and must pray. If the heart cannot find words to carry up its requests, it will send them forth in earnest groans. Prayer can no more be kept from ascending, than flame from the fire. The "Spirit (said one who understood this matter well) helpeth our infirmities: for we know not what we should pray for as we ought; but the Spirit itself maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered." The cries of a drowning man are above the formality of words, and forcibly pierce the ear for help: so the deep-felt anguish of a convinced heart is inexpressibly eager for mercy, and with moans and groans sues it out from God in right earnest. It doth not seek a florid oration, or theatrical starts, but pours forth aspirations, at times, too ardent and mighty for words. Oh, how God loveth such addresses as these! One Abba Father, one tearful sigh, one inward groan, are beyond, and better than, all the fine speeches in the world.

Let not the broken-hearted sinner grieve them too much, that he cannot find language to express the fulness of his desires. His desires are the better for being found, in his bosom, too large and too strong for utterance: there is more of heaven in them, and they will break out at last the swifter towards heaven. If he can find fit words, let him use them; if he cannot, let not their absence increase his concern. God knows and loves the language of the heart, and in due time will answer the prayer. See 1 Sam. i. 13—15.

As to the gift of wordy prayer, it is generally bestowed for the sake of others. If accompanied with faith, it is highly valuable for godly edifying: if not, it will rather weary than improve. This gift is stirred up to more usefulness by exercise: and when expressions flow easily, the heart can freely open itself without over-much labour or fear.

As to public ministrations of prayer, the unhappy zeal of party renders it difficult to speak of them, without danger of offence. However, this every candid Christian may venture to allow, that a form of sound words may more decently be used for congregations, than the loose crude, and incoherent expressions of raw and inexperienced men. On the other hand, could the church be always sure of sound and able ministers, who might rightly pray over the word of truth, as well as divide it; there certainly would be less occasion for forms, which seem to have been composed to prevent disorders, or keep out heresies, or to show to the church at large, what should be the objects of prayer at all times. No one surely can deny, that, in both the Jewish and Christian church, where public forms have been used, men have prayed together with the Spirit, and perhaps with the more understanding and communion, because they knew the words; and that it is possible to do so now with any sound and gracious form. So, on the other hand, it would be bigotted and unchristian-like to affirm, that the Spirit of grace hath not blessed what is called free prayer, to the edification of souls; when, doubtless, there are now living numberless witnesses, of great truth and piety, to the contrary. It never was the form, or the want of it, that made true prayer; but the grace of God in Christ Jesus, flowing through the words that were used, from or to the heart. And, if all these gracious persons, divesting themselves of narrow prejudices, were asked, how and by what means they prayed? they would probably answer, to a man, that it was by faith in Christ Jesus, and by the good Spirit of their God. If both sides, then, are thus in debt to grace for the very life and being of all their prayers, and are thus alike free to confess it; how, then, should the meekness and forbearance of their dear Lord glow in all their hearts toward each other, and cause them to love one another gladly, because he hath made no difference in his love to them! Surely this would be much better than to wrangle about a mode, or no mode of prayer, in either of which, just as God blesses, there may be much true prayer, or no prayer at all. It is the Spirit of faith which carries on the real business; not the form or the gesture, the lip or the tongue.

Having ventured thus far, to walk upon ground which party, and prejudice have made very tender, it may be expedient for my soul, to consider the subject of prayer, in a view more interesting and necessary to its welfare.

My Saviour commands me to watch, as well as to pray; and his apostle exhorts me to "be sober, and watch unto prayer." My flesh is prone to be intoxicated with the mystic cup of Babylon, with the love of this present evil world, and therefore is unruly and unsteady. From hence arise all my dulness and distractions of mind in the things of God; my coldness and weariness in prayer, my feebleness in duties, and my faintness in praise. I had need to be sober, for I have a great concern before me: I ought to watch, for my enemies are subtle and mighty. They watch, if I do not, and are always ready to take advantages to hinder, whenever I am careless to get forward. I have "an open door, and many adversaries." If I do not watch unto prayer, the world will get between me and my duty: if I do not watch in prayer, Satan will do his utmost to prevent my sweet, or continued approach unto God: if I do not watch after prayer, pride, presumption, security, or negligence, will find a way into my heart. O Lord, if I were fully and constantly aware of my true situation, how could I think to do less, than "always to pray, and not to faint?"

My fallen heart is ever ready to take up with the mere performance of duty. How often have I prayed for spiritual mercies; and not considered afterwards whether God hath granted them, or not! For increase of faith, wisdom, holiness, and other graces, I have asked with earnestness at the time, and then soon have forgotten what I asked for, or neglected to mark the event. Hence all the lowness of my attainments in divine things, and my overborne subjection to things earthly. And when I have requested temporal blessings, how little have I considered the hand of God in granting, or the wisdom of God in refusing them! How often have I sought the good for its own sake, instead of seeking it for God's glory and my spiritual welfare, and thereby was ready to turn it, if granted, into an evil! How little use have I made of temporal benefits, when they have been given me, and sometimes given unexpectedly too, that I might notice God's providence; and how ready hath my corrupt nature been to take and apply them all to itself! Surely, I am as much the monument of God's patience, as of his love.

It is a matter always to be had in remembrance, that prayer should be followed up with thanksgiving. I ought to be thankful, if what I have prayed for is received; and I should be thankful also, if what I have prayed for is restrained. God is better to me than I am to myself; and he only restrains anything from his children, either because it is not good for them at all, or not good in the time and for the purpose for which they desired it. The words of a very ancient poet, rightly turned, may express, in this case, the sentiment of every Christian.

> "The good we need, great King, bestow,
> Whether we ask for it or no;
> But if for ill we blindly cry,
> In mercy, Lord, that suit deny."

The practice of many saints under the Old Testament was to pray thrice in a day. According to opportunity, I cannot pray too often, either in the closet, the family, or the church. There are, indeed, stated times for these; but one kind of prayers may be used at all times, and in every circumstance of life. The prayers of ejaculation, or of darting up the heart towards God (like that in Nehem. ii. 4.) in short and pathetic sentences, have a wonderful effect in them, and tend very much to keep the soul's communion with God, and the life of holiness in all things. Many such may be taken from the Psalms in particular. They show a sweet and healthful inclination of the soul, more perhaps than laboured expressions, or long continuance of address, which may sometimes fall into idle repetitions, or be unattended with suitable affections and fervency. Oh how delightfully will these aspirations often pass towards heaven from the soul! how warmly stir up the affections, and raise the mind! how strongly check the inordinate care of earthly things!

"Let the words of my mouth, and the meditation of my heart, be always acceptabe in thy sight, O Lord, my strength, and my Redeemer."

CHAP. XX.

ON SINGING PRAISES TO GOD.

The first of all earthly singers gave this as an inspired rule; "Sing ye praises with understanding." Without spiritual understanding, we can only make a noise. Unless we know how deeply we are indebted to God, and have the sweet sense of his goodness in our souls, we may please ourselves with a tune, but we yield no music to him. Some of old "chanted to the sound of the viol, and invented to themselves instruments of music;" but, at the same time, they were among those who were "at ease in Zion," and who "put far away the evil day," to whom wo was denounced. God never instituted music in his service, however, like other carnal ordinances, he might bear with it under the Jewish economy; but only trumpets and rams' horns, to usher in the seasons and solemnities. It is spiritual harmony which is the delight of heaven, and not outward jingle and sound; and therefore if we are not spiritual, we can have no true notion of this delight, nor "make melody in our hearts to the Lord." The thrills of music, and the divine joys of the soul, are very different things. Worldly men have had the first, and thought them from heaven: but they continued no longer than the sound; while the peace of gracious praise is full, sublime, and abiding. We must, indeed, be real Christians, before any of us can say with the apostle, "I will pray with the Spirit, and I will pray with the understanding also; I will sing with the Spirit, and I will sing with the understanding also.

I cannot but shake my head, when I hear an officer of the church calling upon the people, "to sing to the praise and glory of God;" and immediately half a dozen merry men, in a high place, shall take up the matter, and most loudly chant it away to, the praise and glory of themselves. The tune, perhaps, shall be too difficult for the greater part of the congregation, who have no leisure for crotchets and quavers; and so the most delightful of all public worship shall be wrested from them, and the praises of God taken out of their mouths. It is no matter whence this custom arose: in itself it is neither holy, decent, nor useful, and therefore ought to be banished entirely from the churches of God.

When Christians sing altogether, in some easy tune, accommodated to the words of their praise, and not likely to take off their attention from sense to sound; then, experience shows, they sing most lustily, (as the Psalmist expresses it,) and with the best good courage. The symphony of voice, and the sympathy of heart, may flow through the whole congregation, which is the finest music to truly serious persons, and the most acceptable to God, of any in the world. To "sing with grace in their hearts unto the Lord," is the melody of heaven itself; and often brings a foretaste of heaven to the redeemed even here. But jingle, piping, sound, and singing, without this divine accompaniment, are grating discordant harshness with God, and vapid, wretched insipidity to the souls of his people.

I am no enemy to music as a human art; but let all things be in their place. The pleasures of the ear are not the gracious acts of God's Spirit in the soul; but the effect of vibrated matter upon an outward sense. This may be indulged as an innocent and ingenious amusement; but what have our amusements to do with solemn and sacred adorations of God? Would not this be carnal, and after the modes of the world, and not after Christ? Surely, no believer will venture to call anything spiritual, which does not proceed from the Spirit of life, or "tend to mortify the old man with his affections and lusts."

Neither sounds of air, nor words of sense alone, however excellent, can please God. "He is a spirit, and they who worship him, must worship him in spirit and in truth; for such he seeketh." It is easy to do many, if not all, religious acts, with a very carnal heart; but to be truly religious, or to walk and act in our spirits with God,—this hath always been too hard for flesh and blood, and can only be performed by that grace which giveth life and power to every renewed mind.

Lord, help me, I beseech thee, thus to laud and adore thee! Give me a lively sense of thy mercy to my soul; and then my soul shall offer up her gracious returns of lively praise. Sacrifice and burnt-offering thou requirest not, for no outward thing, even of thine own appointment, when not inwardly understood, can please thee; the music of my voice, without the incense or breathings of my soul, thou wilt not accept. O assist me, then, to praise thee aright; for, without thee, I can do nothing. Thou alone givest occasion to praise; and thou also givest the spirit of praise to use the occasion. Vouchsafe both unto me. Then shall I one day join the great "assembly of the first-born, whose names are written in heaven," and sing, with joy unspeakable and full of glory, that ever-new song, "Salvation to our God, who sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb! Amen: Blessing, and glory, and wisdom, and thanksgiving, and honour, and power, and might, be unto our God for ever and ever. Amen."

CHAP. XXI.

A CHRISTIAN, IN LOSING HIS LIFE, SAVES IT.

Christ hath said, "Whosoever will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross daily, and follow me. For whosoever will save his life, shall lose it; but whosoever shall lose his life for my sake, the same shall save it.

In doing this, the Christian must die daily. He is "crucified with Christ," in the flesh, that he may "live with Christ" in the spirit. His mortal body is brought into subjection to the rule of grace; and grace mortifies that body, by crucifying its affections and lusts.

These words are easy and plain; but, alas! how few do know them? to die to self, is the most painful thing to flesh and blood, that can be. To be stripped of all pretended worth, to renounce a man's own righteousness, as well as his sins, to give up in earnest his own will and way, to live in an empty frame of mind simply upon Christ for strength, wisdom, grace, and salvation, to desire nothing but what may please him, to be contented with the trials he sends, because they are his, to have a heart carried above the world, not to fear man against God, to bear, to believe, to hope, to endure all things as the best, and to maintain a firm view of eternal glory; all this is losing a man's own carnal life, and saving the life of his soul in Christ Jesus. The Christian who hath this in him, may say with the apostle: "I am crucified with Christ: nevertheless, I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life, which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me."

At first sight, this kind of life appears gloomy and dreadful; but, when once truly tasted, it is sweet and pleasant to the soul. It grows less difficult and painful, as the carnal life is more and more subdued. The life of the flesh can only indulge some poor, base, and vexatious gratifications in earthly and perishable things; but the renewed life of the spirit consists in righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost, which cannot be lost, and which never can cloy. The enjoyment of this renders the Christian, in proportion to his enjoyment, a steady man, unshaken or unsubdued by the disorders and distresses of the world, and cleaving the faster to God when they come. A worldly man is often terrified to his wit's end, or to death, where a real Christian can be calm and resigned. He hath learned the worth of all life in Christ; and he knows, that what is really worth his anxiety, can never be lost. In throwing all upon God, he finds the fears and terrors of his weak and corrupt flesh abated, and gains strength and liveliness in his soul. God gives him a tranquillity of courage, which the bravest human heart cannot put on. Women of delicate tenderness, by this gracious gift, have met the very king of terrors, with a soberness of triumph unknown to mortal heroes.

These mortal heroes indeed may have ventured upon death, despising life and all its enjoyments; but were evidently concerned for their vain-glory, and the useless perpetuity of a name. The peculiar distinction of the Christian hero is, that he not only can meet death as a vanquished foe, but also can look down upon the infamy of the world with a noble scorn, valuing it and all reputation among worms as trifling pageantry or idle pride. He can live and die in secret, which none of these ostentatious mortals can either endure or dare to do.

No man can live truly by his own power, but only by power from on high. The Christian, therefore, is daily looking up to Jesus, his head of life, for the maintenance and support of all his graces. If Christ withdraw his hand, he must fall; for, in himself, the strongest, the wisest, the holiest Christian, is confusion and wickedness, weakness and nothing. He feels himself void of all good, and so flees to Jesus to obtain it. When he doth not enjoy his Saviour, he cannot enjoy himself. But when he hath him, he hath more than all things, because he hath him who made and possesses them all.

They, who are great, and love to be great, in outward things, have commonly but little of this life within them. When the soul hath no feast within, it gads abroad for delight, and will put up with mean and carnal trash, unsuitable to its proper nature, rather than have nothing. Outward pomp and carnal show, even in religion, commonly proclaim an inward emptiness and want.

There is a carnal knowledge of spiritual things, which the apostle calls "a knowing Christ after the flesh," and which is very different from the divine knowledge of those things. The apostles appear to have been in the former state till the day of Pentecost, when they "received power from on high." They, indeed, loved Christ, and sincerely followed him before; but their love and knowledge of the Saviour had in it a large mixture of flesh and corruption. Hence, they were astonished to hear of his sufferings and death, and their own humiliation; when, it is plain enough, they expected great temporal advancement and honour for themselves, and a glorious temporal kingdom for him. Even after his resurrection, like the Jews at large, they thought of "a kingdom to be restored unto Israel:" but, when the true kingdom came into their hearts, we hear no more of these carnal expectations, but of a joyful readiness to suffer persecution and death for their Lord, and to go somewhere else, instead of this world, to enjoy him.

So, among us called Christians, there is this carnal knowledge of Christ, consisting in outward profession and a natural understanding of the truths of the gospel, which is also mixed sometimes with degrees of grace and spiritual life. But persons in this state are much in outward things, are great outwardly, talk of religion outwardly, and of its great advancement by the great human helps in the world. They are strong in their animal passions, carry these into religious matters, make a great noise and bustle among men, are great rulers if possible, seek to carry all church affairs in their own way, and, in short, are never easy out of bustle, and certainly never easy in it. When these people sink into themselves, by getting more true life in Christ, they are found to be more and more mild, humble, patient, gentle, "not obtruding themselves into things which they have not seen, nor vainly puffed up by their fleshly mind." Then Christ is all in all to them; and they themselves nothing at all. Then it is that they lose their own lives, and find them with great interest and sweetness in Christ.

If the love and word of Christ "dwell in us richly in all wisdom," we shall desire to be much with Christ in our spirits, and to shut out all possible interruptions and hinderances in our communion with him.

CHAP. XXII.

ON THE OPINIONS OF CARNAL MEN.

The judgment, which natural men form of spiritual life, is altogether wild and extravagant, gross and injurious. "The things of God are foolishness unto them, neither can they know them, because they are spiritually discerned." And can those think rightly of the people of God, who have not the faculties to think rightly of the things which render them distinct from other men, and which are the very grounds and principles of God's conduct towards them? And ought a Christian to be moved exceedingly at the judgment of ignorance and error?

This world's opinion of all divine things is, indeed, very foolish and vain. It condemns what it hath not seen, and despises what it doth not know. It laughs at the wisdom of God, which it is too weak to apprehend, and sets up its own perishing folly in its stead. A few years shall lay it low; and the wisest of the worldly wise will be the first to condemn themselves for the madmen and the fools.

Be satisfied, then, fellow Christian, with the just judgment of God. Thou canst not be more despised than thy Saviour. He indeed deserved no scorn: but thou, much more than thou canst have. If they called the master of the house Beelzebub, shall those who are of the household, think to escape a hard name? No; let them bear it for his sake: it will never disgrace them in heaven.

CHAP. XXIII.

ON THE ESTEEM OF GOOD MEN.

Though a nice sense of honour, consistent with his profession, becomes a Christian, yet an over-nice care to get honour from any man, is neither the duty nor the practice of the Christian life.

Be not too anxious, my brother, for the good opinion even of the best of men, nor altogether judge of thy state by so uncertain a rule. Concern of this kind seems to argue a too fond regard of thy carnal self, or of thy own state in the world. If they show disrespect, and if it arise from mistake, rejoice that thy true hidden life depends not on the opinion of mortals, but on the love and just judgment of an unerring Redeemer. The opinion of others can neither make nor unmake thee, as a Christian. But if their disesteem be founded in truth, fear not to dive to the bottom of thine own undeservings, and cease not to pray for grace to correct them. Be not offended with thy brethren, in either case; for this will lead to ruptures, neither for their profit nor thine. The glory of God and of his truth is also concerned, which should fill thee with the greater forbearance and caution in all thy dealings with "the household of faith." Pray for wisdom, to examine thy cause faithfully, to know the worst that can be found of thyself, and to see into the truth or mistake of others. And if, in thine own conscience, the right be with thee, be thankful for the mercy, and cease not, because they need it, to pray for them who are in the wrong. Thy true charity should relieve, in this way, their spiritual necessity, and so rise, with that lawful triumph of a Christian, by a holy and inward superiority of meekness and of truth.

Beware of anger and offence. The wrath of man cannot work the righteousness of God. Be humbled by every disesteem, whether just or unjust, within thyself. This is gaining a step in the great inward and spiritual progress of self-renunciation; for which end these means, though unpleasant to proud nature, may have been mercifully and providentially ordained. Fear not to see the worst of thine own infirmities: tremble, rather, lest they should be hidden from thee. When thou art made truly low in thine own eyes, the slights and contempts even of good men, proceeding, as they usually do, not from grace, but common infirmities, will not over-much vex thee. It is the fondness of self, and the pride of our hearts, which render all outward insult and injury distressing and painful. He that thinks little of himself, can bear to be thought little of by others: but he that is lifted up within, is grieved when he cannot find that tribute of respect which his own foolish fondness hath ordained for himself.

The best remedy for spiritual disorders is spiritual prayer. Corruption inflicts or feels pain; and grace should subdue corruption. It is the true wisdom of a Christian to set his faith, and not the passions of his unholy nature, at work upon evil. Grace will teach him not to huff, or snort, or resent, or speak great swelling words of carnal indignation; but to bear and forbear, and pray and wait, and entreat, according to the occasion. When the rough north wind of trial rages and raves; then the graces of the Christian should more abundantly flow. All this is difficult, without a doubt; but will not a gracious success be afterwards a comfort to the believer, both as it affords a real proof of the true life of Christ within him, and an occasion of glorifying God before men? And if it answer these ends, how great is his reason to be thankful?

When gracious men see all this work upon thee, they will honour God in his own gifts: but, if they do not, it is in no man's power to alter thy condition with him. Be deeply thankful that thou hast found mercy, and show tenderness to those who need it from thee.

CHAP. XXIV.

WEAKNESS IS IMPATIENT.

It is not strength, but weakness, which complains. He, that is strong, can well bear the infirmities of the weak: he, that is weak, cannot bear at all, but is overwhelmed with his own. A father in Christ can put up with the frowardness and indiscretion of the babe in Christ; but the latter, having his mind but little exercised, is full of dislikes, and always wants his own will and way: otherwise he complains.

This weakness is commonly captious; fonder of finding errors than healing them, and more able to discover the grounds of difference, than wisely to take up the methods of unity. Sincere, yet quarrelsome; troubled, yet headstrong; young in the faith, yet presuming; fond of parties and persons, of modes and of forms of doctrine, with warm life and little experience; all this is the character of most young or weak professors. When they grow older in grace, they become wiser in the kingdom, more catholic, patient, forbearing, candid, and forgiving. They see a thousand mistakes and wilfulness in their own first profession; and these incline them, through an increase of wisdom and strength, to suffer kindly the infirmities and frailties of others. They then love what is real, encourage what is weak, pardon what is childish, endure what is troublesome, correct what is evil, and pray, not rave, when they see but slow improvements.

CHAP. XXV.

ON RETIREMENT.

Whatever is a man's first great business in life, that he will pursue most, and desire to study with the least interruption and disorder. A man of this world hath his heart in the world; but a Christian gets as much as possible into heavenly things, because his heart and his treasure are in heaven.

The God of wisdom himself hath said, that no man can serve him and mammon. We have but one heart, which we cannot divide; and, if it were possible, a heart and a heart, or a heart divided, would be a hateful offering to the Most High.

There is no Christian but who feels and bewails how often his common affairs draw off his mind from his best affairs, and throw him into dulness and distraction. He feels, and bewails this, because he is a Christian, and because his best affections are somewhere else. His grief is not so much, that he must apply himself to social duties, which are indispensable to every one according to his place under Providence, but that he cannot carry more of the true spirit and unction of religion into them. Could they be more and more sanctified by the word of God and prayer, and could his mind be more delivered from the worldiness both of them and of those with whom he must have to do; they would grow into a kind of holy ordinances to him, and, instead of hindering his faith, would improve his joy. We forget to bring religion into our common course of life; and so that course is suffered to bring its own punishment and trouble upon us. A Christian, living like a Christian, in his outward profession, is far more in the way of rendering glory to God, and of doing good to men, than a hermit, who does nothing in his wilderness but seek himself; or a monk, who, by the torture of his body, thinks to work out his own righteousness, by which to merit heaven. The true retirement is retiring from the sinful customs and spirit of this world, and giving up the soul to God in all things.

Having said this, it is also right to say, that there should be hours of secret retirement to every Christian, if possible: or at least as much time as possible, for prayer, meditation, and reading, upon the things of God. Where this time is through necessity short, as it often must be among the poor, who generally are God's own rich ones; still the retired believer, in the midst of any or of all his business, may now and then sweetly dart up his soul to God in fervent ejaculations, which will keep up the true frame of his mind, and draw down many comforts from above. These short and silent breathings will show a lover's heart, and prove, that, whatever may employ his hands, his mind is truly engaged for heaven.

Where circumstances of life, and the capacity of persons, will admit of farther separation from the world; it will be right, because advantageous, to use it. The retirement, however, must be for God, and not for self; in the spirit of religion, not of laziness; to be more quickened for heaven, and not to be more useless upon earth. Hence it will be seen, that all Christians are neither called to, nor fit for, an entire seclusion from the world: their habits, dispositions, abilities, and occupations of life, render it improper for them.

When a Christian can fill up all his retirement with the things of God, and for his glory, with no just demand upon him from secular affairs, it is certainly a most high and desirable privilege. Such a one may and ought to further himself in knowledge, and to devote all he knows, through grace, to the glory of God, and the edification of men. Leisure is abused, when employed in tattle and dissipation, as it often is; and the abuser had much better be engaged in some active calling and employment.

To retire indeed unto God, is the most severe and solemn business in the world. It is a sort of middle state between heaven and earth, which no carnal mind can either understand or love. The froth and levity of the flesh must be subdued; else all the retirement will end in vanity. Humble and ardent prayer should begin the day, the study or the exercise of gracious things should carry it on, some intervals must be found for supplications and praise, strict watchfulness and trials must be continually made upon the heart, and growing meetness for death and heaven must appear in the life, and no rest be taken at night but after humble prayer, and surrender of all into the hands of God for time and eternity. A truly retired Christian is more careful of his time than any other man, because he can spend it more preciously. He thinks it a sad loss to throw away hours which might have been employed in the works or word of God.

When the truly retired Christian is alone, he is (as one says) "never less alone;" for God is with him and in him of a truth. He not only goes into his study or his closet, but gets within himself, into the closet of his heart, and watches all the motions of nature and grace. Thus in time he becomes truly learned in that most difficult subject—his own self.

When we talk much with others, it is hardly possible, in a nature so fallen and corrupt as our's, not to talk amiss. But when we commune with God, he speaketh so with us, as to give an increase of wisdom and grace, with much solid refreshment of mind. His word and will become plain and familiar to our souls; we enter into the spirit of his ways; and our spirits feel many undoubted proofs both of their own immortality, and of the great blessedness of approaching glory. This, wherever it abounds, deadens the affection of a Christian to the low and vain discourse of the world, renders him more happy in, and fit for, his retirement, and enlivens his hopes for God and heaven. What improvement, thus to live! What blessedness, thus to die!

Many retire, that they may see and hear more of the world, and be entertained with its novelties and news: but the believer would withdraw to dive more fully into himself, as into a subject deep and little known, and to be more acquainted with his Redeemer in all the wonders and manifestations of his grace. It is a day lost indeed, when he gets no news of heaven, or hath made no steps towards it.

If a man doth not thus retire, he only opens a wide door to all sorts of temptations to rush in upon him. So very few are fitted for, or called to this kind of leisure, (though by abuse only it becomes leisure,) that God in his wisdom hath appointed so much corporeal employment in the world, even for his own children. As the earth would be more an Aceldama, or field of blood, than it is, but for necessary labours, which call away, in some respect or other, almost all men; so the church itself would be more defiled; and individuals more unholy, than they are already, if manual or active duties did not take up the greatest part of their time.

I have known many professors, and some of an order too which should have engaged them entirely in things divine, who have wasted in frivolous discourses, mean pursuits, idle engagements, and other sad dissipations, large portions of that time which should have been devoted to studious improvement, serious conversation, or active piety. Vessels thus ever running out; how and when can they be filled? And what have they for others, who lay up so little for themselves?

O Lord, help me to retire indeed, but yet chiefly for thee, and for greater communion with thee. When I find thee not in my heart, it is hard and darkened: when thou art not in my closet, it is either full of confusion as a market, or it is desert as the wilderness. I can get nothing; and I soon feel that I am nothing, but an empty, unprofitable void. O cheer thy poor servant with thy presence, who would indeed be a stranger and a pilgrim upon earth; yea, if it be thy will, a stranger to everything but thee; having my heart in thy home, and my soul in every respect under thy command. Lord, thus help me to withdraw from the world, only to draw nearer, both in spirit and in life, unto thyself, and to whatever relates to thy glory!

CHAP. XXVI.

ON THE FEAR OF MAN.

He that unduly fears man, cannot truly fear God: and he that lives much in the fear of God, will not regard overmuch what man can do unto him. The want of faith is the root of all carnal fear, which becomes less and less, as faith gathers strength and increases in the soul. It is a sad hinderance in the ways of God, as well as torment, to live under the views, opinions, prejudices, and passions of worldly men.

"The fear of man bringeth a snare;" and a snare for all sorts of evils. Mild, gentle, feeling, and delicate tempers, are most exposed to this danger; and they should pray much to Him who strengtheneth the weak, for fortitude without rudeness, for resolution without roughness, and for stability without stubbornness, that so they may properly act and hold out in the time of trial.

When it is a principle graciously established in the soul, that men can do nothing to us but what is for our good, and that they must do whatever is; it greatly abates that fickle feebleness of our nature, which, out of too much love and care for itself, brings us into bondage of heart to wretched worms, "whose breath is in their nostrils," and themselves, in this way, "not to be accounted of."

CHAP. XXVII.

ON MY OWN IMPERFECTIONS.

While I am in the flesh, I must be encompassed with many infirmities; and while I am in the world, I cannot escape trial and temptation. These things are grievous to my spirit; but I see that they are permitted, to wean me from myself, and to draw off my heart from the creatures to my only true refuge in God.

What feebleness, at times, do I not feel in duty; what fickleness and unsteadiness, in following my Redeemer; what dulness and distraction in prayer; so that I can hardly remain firm and lively long together, in the pursuit of that good which my soul most desires and approves. It is a war indeed in my members to get my corrupted nature down, and to have the life of grace warm and vigorous within me. I cannot but groan, at times, in this tabernacle, being burdened, and almost oppressed, by the evils within and about me.

Were it not for divine help, O what should I do? Like Peter on the sea, I have sometimes ventured boldly after my Lord; but like him too, through faintness of heart and weakness of faith, at other times I have cried out, "Lord, save, or I perish!" Thou hast helped me indeed, blessed be thy name, O my God; but yet I cannot but reproach myself for the cold forgetfulness and weakness of my spirit, in doubting so often of thy faithfulness, and in not keeping hold of thy promises.

Thus, Lord, I feel myself a poor, a frail, and altogether, a weak and worthless man, fit for nothing but thy mercy, and capable of nothing, when left to my own nature, but rebellion against it. When I survey myself, and all my confused and ruined faculties, I am filled with shame, and cannot but wonder at thy long-suffering toward me. O wretch that I am, in what a vile body of sin do I live! How am I always struggling against thee with my perverse and wicked flesh, contrary to the true and lasting interests of my soul! How ready to yield to thine enemy and mine; or to give up all for lost, rather than maintain the hard and painful struggle with corruption and sin!

When I have been lively and zealous for my God, how often have I been ready to overlook, to misapply, or to turn his grace to the foolish vanity of my own mind! Insomuch that at times I seem all flesh to myself, and to have neither true light, life, wisdom, or strength, from above, within me. My failures are and have been so numerous, the apostasy of my heart so great, the conduct of my life and temper so mutable and irregular, and all my frame so poor and wavering, so cold and weak in embracing the best things, that I am ready to bemoan with the prophet, "Woe is me, for I am undone; because I am a man of unclean lips!" My whole head is sick, and my whole heart is faint.

Others may talk of their will and their power, their duties and their deserts, but as for me, I can scarcely lift up my eyes to heaven, when I consider myself: rather with the publican my brother, I must smite upon my breast, and say, "God be merciful unto me a sinner!" Instead of looking on mysel as a fine holy creature, who can appear confidently before my God; I shrink, with contrition and shame, at the thought, that I have done little else than dishonour him all my days, and deserve nothing for the best thing I was ever able to do, but confusion and sorrow.

Oh what a plague is a man's own heart, when he knows himself; and how little doth he appear in his own eyes, when he hath been made to view, in some true light and degree, the vastness of the purity and perfections of God!

And yet, Oh marvellous to say, God is pleased, by all the weak and contrary things in me, to magnify his own power and glory. By these, he makes me out of humour with myself; by these, he drives me from a thousand refuges of lies; by these, he compels me to cleave unto him, as my only rock, succour, and remedy. In this way, I can feel, as well as read, what the apostle means, where he says, "Most gladly, therefore, will I glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me:—for when I am weak, then am I strong." These are strange paradoxes to the natural heart; but blessed is the man who can truly understand and enter into the experience of them.

CHAP. XXVIII.

THE BELIEVER RECEIVES FOOD, AS WELL AS LIGHT, IN THE WORK AND DOCTRINE OF CHRIST.

The mere notion of divine things, without their power, cannot profit the soul. As a man may be poor with the plan of a large estate, of which he hath no possession; so a professor of Christianity may have the Bible before him, and may be able to raise very high and fine speculations from it, and yet have no true knowledge or enjoyment of the truth which it contains.

A minister may preach of these truths with great clearness, great readiness, and great noise; and yet have no true savour, no solid experience, and no real communion of the truths themselves, within him. What proves this is, that he is not the same man in the pulpit and in the world. The doctrines of the gospel will serve for orations, as well as other topics; nay, will serve for the best orations, because there is more of sublimity and truth in them than in any other.

An author likewise may write about divine revelation, and all the mysteries of redemption, with precision, accuracy, force, and elegance, and yet be destitute of the main concern, which is the faith and inward perception of these things for his own soul. I would deal fairly and closely with my own self in this respect, as well as with others; and I will own, that my light is far beyond my liveliness; and though I humbly trust that I have some little real life in my knowledge of God and his truths, yet I confess with an aching heart, that it is indeed but little, too little, and much less than my own fondness for myself, my vanity, pride, or conceit, (for, Lord! thou knowest, and I know, that I have all these in abundance within me!) will suffer me at times to think that I have. Perceiving, then, my own weakness, and the deceivableness of unrighteousness in my own heart; I am able to see, and yet to pity and bear with, the same infirmities and defects in others.

However, no real believer can find much or long satisfaction in any notions or conceptions of divine truth, though very sublime, clear, full, extensive, and convincing, without something more in them and from them. He doth not despise head knowledge, indeed, because by this he can see the wisdom of God; but he would have heart knowledge too, because he wishes to taste, to enjoy, to be assured of his interest in, the love of God. He can no more feed upon words and syllables in his soul, than he can live upon air only for his body.

The Lord, therefore, when he imparts "the demonstration of the Spirit" to a man, imparts it "not in word but in power." Thus the gospel is "the power of God unto salvation, to every one that believeth." He cannot receive it aright without this power; he cannot live upon it but by this power; nor hold out in living and believing to the end, but by the same power.

This gracious feeding of the soul upon the things of God is its greatest comfort upon earth, and one of its brightest evidences for heaven. It is a secret holy act, carried on best without the clutter of the animal passions, or the intercourse of corporeal things. The holy bread was eaten in the holy place, before the holy light; and all out of the air, or view, or correspondence of the world. Thus, in the secret place of the Most High, the soul feeds upon Christ, beholds Christ, and enjoys all its divine communion with the things of God. And when it hath thus tasted that the Lord is gracious, it loves to be with him, and says earnestly, as Peter did, "It is good to be here." The carnal notion even of the best things will no longer satisfy or feed it.

CHAP. XXIX.

ON THE SPIRIT OF SCOFFING.

It is no less ungracious than unwise to indulge a scoffing temper in our souls. Pride and an unmortified opinion of self, joined with contempt of others, are the true origin of this evil. It is the more dangerous, and not so much to the scorned as to the scorning, when set off with wit and mimicry, point and satire. But attic salt is not the salt of the covenant; and, in sacred things especially, it is not to be used by a Christian.

It may be diverting to mimic and to take off others, in order to expose their foibles or defects; but how and to whom is it diverting? Is it to the humble, spiritual, and mortified mind? No, but to the profane and the carnal; or at least, to what is carnal and profane in a Christian, which is the very principle of all others, that he would not strengthen or encourage, but subdue.

There is so much inhumanity, as well as irreligion, in this jeering temper, and usually so little good sense, that the Christian is bound to oppose it, both in himself and in others. Cheerfulness is his privilege; but surely he may be happy in his mind, without planting thorns elsewhere; nay, it proceeds from the want of true happiness, if he can endure, at any rate, such a contemptible shadow of it. True peace is gentle in itself, and glows most sweetly in diffusing gentleness and kindness on every side. The happy Christian would increase his own joy, by making, if possible, every one happy about him.

CHAP. XXX.

IT IS A GREAT POINT OF CHRISTIAN WISDOM TO DISTINGUISH WELL BETWEEN NATURE AND GRACE.

Every real believer hath an old man and a new, an Esau and a Jacob, a carnal mind and a spiritual mind, within him: and these are contrary the one to the other; so that he cannot always do the right things that he would do for God, nor crush the evil things that he would not do, within himself.

These opposite principles have two opposite laws, or rules of action and power. The inclination and effect of the one are constantly directed to self, and to carnal things for the indulgence of self; and those of the other, to God, and to spiritual things, for the glory of God.

Men under nature, having only one of these principles, cannot, in their natural state, discern the other. It is by grace, as by rule, that they are able to measure nature, and to know the proportions of both grace and nature within themselves. "He that is spiritual, judgeth, or discerneth, all things; yet he himself is judged of no man."

Nature in the Christian is for cleaving to sense, to its own doings, and to its own powers, even in religion: but grace in his soul is for living by faith, above, and often, against the feelings of sense, upon the truth of God, and upon his work and working, for life and salvation.

Nature loves to show and set off itself, and to be admired as excellent, eminent, wise, and great, in the eyes of men. Grace doth not sit much by itself, but is lowly and humble, vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up, dreads the applauses of men, and makes the soul see, that it is so mere a nothing in itself, that it must receive everything good, both the least spark of grace and the bright crown of glory, from God in Christ.

Nature is quarrelsome, impatient, and full of restlessness, desiring its own objects immediately and independently, and applying all it receives to its own ease or aggrandisement. Grace seeketh not her own, but the things which are Jesus Christ's, makes the spirit meek and mild, and patient, and quiets it with the will and love of God in all things.

Nature hates the cross, and shuns it as a bitter and evil thing; it struggles hard not to feel it, and, when it feels it, to get rid of it, without any other consideration than that it is painful, and hinders all indulgences and gratifications. But grace submits to the cross with humble resignation, and desires that God's purpose may be answered in it; like as a wise patient wishes that his physic may have its due effect, however unpleasant and distasteful it may be in the act of receiving.

When nature attempts holy duties, as she sometimes will, either in fear or in pride, it is to make herself rich and increased in goods by them, so that she may have something wherewith to purchase even of God himself. But grace comes to the obedience of faith, not to live, or purchase life, but because she is truly alive already to God; and she acts, not for her own exaltation, but for the glory of Him, who only can exalt, and "who fills the hungry with good things, while the rich he sends empty away."

Nature admires dignity, and parade, and pomp, and outward splendour; it seeks to be pleased with sweet sounds, fine language, decorated places, and genteel company; and all this in religion too. Whereas grace shuns and distastes all gay appearances of earth, thinks of Christ in a stable, and of all he did and suffered to stain the pride of flesh and blood; and receives the favour of God as a precious pearl, for its own intrinsic and eternal value, and not for the sake of any outward things, different in kind from its own.

Nature loves life, and to see good days in this world, and as many of them as possible; it shudders to give up its temporal enjoyments and carnal hopes, and would endure a great alloy of care and trouble, rather than part with the lying vanities to which it is wedded, and in which it delights. Grace, contrariwise, can say, "I would not live always upon earth, if I might; for I have a desire to depart and to be with Christ, which is far better." Grace can think upon death as a friend, and hath often met him as such; looking forward to the crown of glory, which death can only lead to, but never can take away; and all its trials here only cause a stronger breathing and livelier expectation of the heavenly home.

Nature is forward to speak, and loves to be heard, and will be angry if not regarded, and will do much to be seen and known. Grace is slow to speak, and slow to wrath, wishes to hear, and learn, and understand; delights not to be in the chief seat, but is content with the lowest; and had rather lay up spiritual treasure in the heart, than babble it away, for selfish aims, with the tongue. It is not petulent or vexed, if disregarded, but commits itself and the whole of the matter to God.

Nature draweth all from its own fund, and carrieth all back, and with interest if possible, to itself again. But grace receiveth all from God, and is never so truly delighted, as when God receiveth the whole of the glory, as his just return.

These are a few of the many distinct operations of nature and grace. But sometimes they are so perplexed and interwoven with each other, through the craft and duplicity of the fallen natural principle, that it requires the greatest watchfulness and attention of the Christian, to unravel and divide them. The fact is, the two principles live at one time, act at one time, and will be found in one and the same person at all times, and in all things, while he lives upon earth. The Christian cannot avoid the activity of his natural or carnal mind; though, by that faith and prayer, which removes the spiritual mountains of difficulty, he is to strive, and may prevail against, its high rule and predominancy. Carnality will exist, while he exists below; but it must not be the reigning and triumphant principle within him. On the other hand, grace, which is pure and simple in all its own acts and intentions, and resolves everything with a single eye and a single heart, into God, must take the lead, and bring the other into the closest captivity and obedience that can be unto Christ.

This is the daily battle and warfare, which passes within the Christian, and which no eye can see, but the eye of God and his own; yea, not his own always, nor always alike. Thus, when grace prevails, there ensues what is called mortification, self-denial, humiliation, renunciation, and all the other exercises, which are painful to the flesh or nature, and, its will and ways. On the contrary, when nature is uppermost, there ever will arise coldness towards God, faintness in duty, doubts, reasonings, discomforts, fear of man, fear of death, and a whole world full of weaknesses, hinderances, and temptations. By the superiority of these different effects in the soul, may easily be seen, if attended to, the superiority of one or other of their respective principles. When there is a strong animal or carnal nature in the believer, though with a good measure of grace, and a trial comes of a powerful and threatening kind; Oh what a tumult is raised within! Nature struggles for ease, and winds, and turns, and frets, and laments, and uses a thousand shifts, to carry off the believer from the battle, or to melt away his heart in the midst of it. Grace, on the other hand, tells him, that now is his time to act like the Christian, to lay hold upon Christ and his promises, to take up the shield of faith, the sword of the Spirit, and the helmet of salvation, and to withstand at least, if not even to meet, the enemy; that he shall conquer the trial by suffering the will of God, it being his present duty to trust, to hope, to pray, to wait; and that, in a short time at the utmost, all shall end well, and redound both to his Redeemer's honour and his own improvement. What conflicts, perturbations, hopes, resignations, despondencies, will not the Christian find in the opposition of the carnal and the spiritual life; when temptations, troubles, or trials of any sort, are to try the strength of both! And yet, after the temptation, it is in some measure with him, as it was with Christ after his; comforts, like angels, will minister unto him. There is such a peaceable fruit of righteousness succeeding to these grievous things, as will make the believer a most ample amends for all his sorrows. But if this fruit should be deferred in this life, it will be but the more welcome and glorious, when the soul bursts the bonds of clay, and leaves sin and a sinful nature behind it.

CHAP. XXXI.

ON TEMPTATIONS.

It is a great part of the Christian warfare to encounter temptations. When a man truly becomes Christ's soldier, he is armed from head to foot by him; because from head to foot will his enemies attack him, with all sorts of weapons, for distress at least, if not for destruction. He hath, because he needs, the whole armour of God, that he may both stand and withstand, during the evil day of this mortal life.

O how many fiery darts are thrown, with all the vehemence of spirits, against the Christian's soul! If his armour doth not sit close upon him, and if the shield of faith be not well and constantly held up to catch and repel the assault; how many sore, and almost venomous, wounds will he not endure? Nay, if the Christian think to be only upon the defence, and fight not in his turn, it will be with him, as it is in all defensive wars among men, very troublesome and very disadvantageous. He hath therefore a weapon given him, that he may attack too; and when he wields, in the strength of his Captain, "the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God;" the great spiritual foe remembers the deep strokes he received by it from Christ himself at his temptation, and shrinks away from its edge. If the Christian should be so unwise as to fight this enemy in his own might, and without armour, he would suffer as a man must do, that would encounter a whole host in array (every individual of which is almost infinitely stronger than himself,) naked, unsupported, unarmed. None know the strength of the world, the flesh, and the devil, but those who have life, and are called to oppose them; just as the force of a stream is tried by the resistance made against it. The people of Christ too often fall into this vain way of fighting, through a presumption of their own conduct and power, and therefore are often brought off from the field wounded and half-dead: and it is through the mercy and grace of their Lord, that they are not entirely captured and destroyed. They are more ready to look to their armour, and call upon their leader in great trials, and therefore they prevail: but when they despise the strength of a little temptation, and fight against it in their own, then it is that they are often taught their inward and natural weakness, by losing the day. In their captain's armour, in his strength, and by his sword, they must resist the devil, and then to their joy shall they find, that he will presently flee away from them.

Nothing escapes the vigilance of this foe. He observes the particular constitutions of persons, and he makes his attacks upon all the weak and unguarded parts. He suits his devices to the frame of their dispositions; and, if they are ignorant of those devices, he will often make sad havoc and distress.

He also knows, that the Christian hath traitors in his own bosom, once under full diabolic command, and now not fully suppressed and confined. These he bribes, entices, advises, corresponds with, and acts by; so that, when the assault is made from without, these suspicious inmates are not idle within, but join hand, head, and heart (as it were,) to throw all open to the enemy.

Hence, for these inbred foes, envy, pride, malice, lust, and all the confederacy of black and carnal principles, Satan finds out and proposes their several objects of desire. These are soon converted into engines of war against the soul; and if the Christian's thoughts are not brought into captivity to the law of Christ, they will lead him in bonds (as it were) to his old master, who used, before he was a Christian, to "take him captive at his will." What disgrace doth this bring to his holy profession; and what misery, before and after his recovery to himself.

Satan hath also sly and subtle temptations, perverted from religion itself, by which he often assaults the mind. Sometimes he will raise snares from zeal, love, light, enlargement, and success in duties, by which to flatter the Christian into a high opinion of himself and of his gifts and graces, in order to take him off his guard, or to unclothe him of his humility. When he can make a man proud, he makes him like himself; and when unclean, like a beast. At other times, he will inject the very poison and curse of his own diabolical spirit, by darting evil thoughts, despairing or blasphemous suggestions, vile conceptions of Christ, his word, his work, and all his salvation; preposterous, doubting, distracting, and presuming fancies; and an almost infinite variety of abominable suggestions; which, if the soul be unarmed and unguarded, will harass it to the utmost distress. He hath no pity; nor will he leave off for groans or wailing, agonies or tears. These rather encourage him, if there be nothing but these, The only thing he dreads is "the sword of the Spirit;" and the only thing he cannot pierce is "the armour of God." Therefore, when all this sad business is going forward, the Christian should not lie crying on the ground, like one bereft of his senses, but should call upon his Captain for the armour and the sword, and with these should venture on boldly, trusting to the divine strength which is promised against the foe. When he can do this, the conflict will soon be over; it is yielding, hearkening, reasoning, and parleying, which occasion all the mischief.

I can talk of this, my fellow-Christian, and I know it likewise to be right and true; but I am often beset, and have often been as much to seek as thou canst be, in this hard, yet glorious, service. To this moment I feel my own miserable weakness, when left, in the least degree, to myself, I have had my drubbings, my falls, my horrors, my conflicts, as well as thou hast; and I have been taught by them, though with much slowness (I speak it with shame and sorrow) to flee to the right refuge, to lay hold of the right strength, to buckle on the right armour, and to fall on with the right sword. When I have done this with most alertness, and with the most unreserved confidence in my divine Master, I have been most successful, and most easily have prevailed. When I have lingered, or dallied, or tampered with my foe, or else thought I could cope with him by myself, because he hath appeared under a mean disguise; then I have fainted and failed; then have I sunk, and been surely overthrown. My rebuffs have made me a little more wary of my own heart, as well as of my spiritual adversaries; and I find it the best way to begin speedily with prayer to Him that heareth, that I may truly be ready for whatever may come upon me.

While we are in the flesh, all this must be more or less our daily exercise. And the use of it is, chiefly, to keep our hearts from pride and sloth, to bring down the love of self in all its desires, and the love of sin in all its forms, to endear Christ to our souls in all the ways of his salvation, to cause us to give up ourselves to him with less reserve, to wean us from earth and earthly comforts, and to fix our affections more firmly on heaven. If all this ensue, we shall then have happily disappointed the Devil, and beaten him with his own weapons; and therefore shall rejoice for every trial and conflict, which has led us on towards the attainment of that blessed state of mind, which is the true life and hope of a Christian in this world. O that I may remember these things for myself; while I am aiming to stir up the minds of others to the remembrance of them! Lord, thy strength is made perfect in weakness, and thy wisdom in folly; I call upon thee, therefore, and upon thee alone, to be the guide, the help, the defender, and deliverer of my soul! "Thou art faithful, that hast promised;" and here I rest my safety and salvation.

CHAP. XXXII.

ON ADVERSITY.

We naturally love the world, and the things that are in the world; and this love, unsubdued, is the sole cause and ground of what are called mortifications and disappointments from the world. If the love of Christ prevailed more in us, it would not be in the power of outward things to give us so much pain as they do; or, rather, if this love were perfect in us, we should be ashamed and sorry that these things should give us any pain at all.

This is the truth; but how do we use it? Very often, in the time of trial, we make no other use, than to assent to it as a truth, and there leave it. Reflections of this kind are orations to the winds, unless grace shall second and enforce them. The most trifling loss, as I have often observed in myself and others, is sufficient to unhinge and throw us out of order; if we have no stronger power than our own to keep us in it.

There is not a plant upon earth, how unsightly and bitter soever, but which hath an end for its being. God, likewise, hath not intended his providential works, however adverse or disagreeable to our sense, but for some just purpose and design. There is a "needs be," if we "fall into divers temptations." And, if needful, then they are right and profitable, and will appear to be so at the last.

We have many evil humours, that require correction; and God sends adversity as a medicine for the soul. When it comes with grace into the spirit of a Christian, how doth it soften and blunt his rough and acid dispositions, how reform and lower his swelling and confident frames, how chasten and subdue his restless and impatient tempers; while the better part, his renewed mind, gathers strength, and holiness, and resignation and hope. We shall indeed thank God heartily for all our adversities by and by; and though they are not to be counted as any part of our inheritance, we shall rejoice eternally, that they were graciously made a part of the means for bringing us to it.

The apostle Paul was a chosen vessel, and dearly beloved of the Lord; but the Lord did not say concerning him, what great things he was to do or enjoy (though nobody perhaps ever did more for Christ, or enjoyed more of him upon earth), but "what great things he must suffer for my name's sake." The flesh shrinks at this: but grace can enable the soul to count it all joy when it falls into divers temptations; not for the grief that is in them, for that would be unnatural, but for peaceable fruits of righteousness which they shall produce in the end.

We must pray, then, to trust the wisdom and love of God in all sorrowful dispensations, since he doth not willingly or wantonly afflict his children, nor send one sorrow more than what is absolutely necessary to their true edification and welfare.

When we can bear all trouble as a part of the burden of Christ, and can obtain his assistance to bear it with us we shall find it daily grow lighter and lighter, and at length become upon us like the burden of wings to a bird, enabling us to fly the swifter and higher towards heaven.

CHAP. XXXIII.

ON PROSPERITY.

God's people are seldom trusted with much prosperity; and, when they are, it very rarely appears for their good. The things of earth and time, in affluence or abundance, have a fascinating power over the carnal senses, entice them first into the ways of evil, and then if (grace prevent not) intoxicate them with it. How many spiritual sots are there in the world, who, though averse to gross intemperance, are reeling instead of running in the path of duty, their heads being turned with the fumes of this earth, and their hearts waxed gross through the abundance of her delicacies! And it is one dreadful proof of the strength of this intoxication upon them, when they hate to be told of it, and feel angry, not at themselves, but at the friendly and faithful informer.

The gaiety, parade, lightness, and lofty airs of many religious professors too well show, what a dangerous thing it is to possess much of this world, and how easily our hearts may be made drunk, and then drowned with sensuality, if not in perdition. If Christ and his apostles were now upon earth in their plain and lowly form, it is much to be feared, that they would be thought hardly good company enough for many of the present race of genteel and modish professors of religion.

It is an excellent prayer, which Christians in worldly prosperity cannot remember too often: "In all time of our wealth, good Lord, deliver us." We want his help, then, more if possible than in adversity; lest "the lust of other things, entering in, should choke the word, and it become unfruitful." We have weak heads and a disordered appetite, which are soon overcharged with a full cup of temporal prosperity. "They were filled (says the Lord, speaking by the prophet to the Jews)—they were filled, and their heart was exalted: therefore have they forgotten me."

It was the good advice of a wise man; "Seek not proud riches, but such as thou mayest get justly, use soberly, distribute cheerfully, and leave contentedly."

There is no doubt, but that Christians with worldly riches may do abundance of worldly good to others; and it is one proof, that God is in them of a truth, when they do so: yet, there is a very great reason to pray, that while they are God's stewards to feed other people, they may be careful not to be starved themselves, and that no pride may arise in their hearts through these outward displays of "zeal for the Lord of hosts." These may seem great things to men; but, if we remember the widow and her two mites, we may understand that something else is greater before God, than any administration only of carnal and temporal things.

Our hearts need no damps of this world to cool them. On the contrary, God, by troubles, frequently stirs up his own grace and life in them, as we stir our fires, that they may kindle more freely, shine more brightly, and glow more strongly for our comfort. Whatever draws us nearest to God, cannot be real adversity: whatever entices us from him, deserves not the name of prosperity.

CHAP. XXXIV.

LUXURY INDECENT FOR CHRISTIANS.

Luxury is to pride what the body is to the soul. It gives substance to that depraved temper, which Satan occasioned to man, and which reigns in himself with the most malignant subtlety, ruling also, where it is permitted, the faculties of creatures, and the grossness of matter. It first reduced him from angel to devil; and it hath degraded mankind almost to both devil and beast.

A very great part of the world's pursuit is indulgence to the flesh, by procuring, not the mere necessaries, (for these are in small compass,) but the pomps, the shows, the imaginary comforts, or the real luxuries, of this present life. If they have much goods laid up for many years, no higher thought remains, but to take their ease, to eat, to drink, and be merry. They have strange and wretched notions of spiritual and eternal enjoyments: heaven and heavenly things are necessarily in their very nature too refined for those, whose heart is ever in the dirt, and whose whole life and hope are supported by what lives and grows upon it. Like a man whom I remember to have seen, they have no "desire, to sit singing upon a bare cloud (as he expressed it) all the day long, without anything to eat or to drink." This was his idea of heaven: and have those people any better or more solid thoughts of its glories, who prefer to them (as the men of this world uniformly do) the poor vile trash and sordid attainment of the earth? Alas! so it is; no natural man hath any true regard for God or his soul, but only for his carcass and the world.

The primitive Christians were distinguished as well for the plainness and simplicity of their manners, as for an exact frugality in all their affairs. They thought, and with great truth, that to do otherwise would be both unseemly for their profession, and injurious to the poor people, who want all for themselves, as the luxurious ever must, (except in some rare cases,) can have but little, if anything, "to give to him that needeth;" and, what is worse, a luxurious, pampered person hath usually no heart to give at all, but hath lost his bowels of compassion, through the excess and voluptuousness reigning within him. Hence it is, that the very rich and very great are commonly hard-hearted; while, in the middle ranks of life, both sympathy and benevolence are frequently found to lighten the load of wo. These, it is true, may be all mere nature; but they are, however, not the least precious remains among its ruins.

To glut the stomach, is to starve the mind; vainly to dress up the body, is to strip the soul; to appear great before men, is really to be little in the eyes of God; to be anxious for this world alone, is to lose the true enjoyment. both of it and a better. Yet all these compose the prime wisdom of this world. But can such be the object, the pursuit, the practice of a Christian? Can the pilgrim, or traveller, the stranger and sojourner upon earth, who talks of "seeking a better country, and a heavenly," make it his business or delight to indulge his flesh and carnal affections in modes like these? It seems indeed a sort of burlesque upon godliness, that a creature, proud, pampered, glutted, adorned, and wallowing in lazy and luxurious life, should solemnly profess meekness and lowliness of mind, abstraction from a sinful world, deadness to earthly vanity, humble expectations of heaven, and a life of faith and communion with God till heaven be attained. I am not a monk, nor monkishly inclined; but surely the modern luxury among many professors is neither the characteristic nor ornament of Christian life, and cannot from its own nature be the means appointed either to win, or to wean, men from mammon to God. It is indeed with pain and reluctance, that this subject of pride, laziness, and luxury, which usually go together, is here mentioned, and especially that there is so much occasion for mentioning it, in our day and in our land. To use, and liberally to use, God's temporal mercies with cheerful thankfulness, is one thing; but to "nourish our carnal hearts as in a day of slaughter," to live only for ourselves, and to be filled with a fulness of earth instead of God, is quite another. The apostle speaks of "using the earth, and not abusing it," plainly intimating the difficulty and the danger. For this reason most probably it is, that the Lord keeps the bulk of his people out of worldly snares, by poverty and trouble, for which they will see more cause to thank him hereafter, than the wealthy and the great for all their riches. When the world lies heavy and close upon the heart, Oh with what a sluggish slowness doth it mount up towards heaven!

Lord, above all thy gifts, give me thyself! I may be happy without the creatures, but I must be wretched for ever without thee. Against all my carnal affections and desires, above all my apprehensions and views, beyond all my hopes and expectations; O do thou lead me through time to eternity, and be my life, my love, my light, my Lord, and my all in all.

CHAP. XXXV.

THERE ARE MANY FIRST, THAT SHALL BE LAST.

Our opinion of persons and things is usually taken from outward forms and appearances; but God looketh on the heart and spirit, which are the true and only substantial essence or being.

What a wonderful revolution shall the day of God make upon the earth! Many high and towering professors, extolled by others and prized by themselves, shall be glad to take even the meanest and the lowest rooms, deeply thankful not to be quite thrust out of the kingdom; while some poor, dejected, and despised souls, who passed their days almost unknowing and unknown, with respect to the world, shall shine forth as stars in the firmament of heaven, to the surprise and astonishment of every eye.

We greatly mistake, in general, with respect to spiritual glory. It doth not consist in the splendour of gifts and talents, or any bodily exercise (as the apostle calls it) of the animal frame, but in the less glaring, though far more solid, ornament of a meek and quiet spirit; not in the attraction or admiration of men, but in the love and enjoyment of God; not in the subtle and lofty aspirings even of the inward man; but in self abasement, simplicity, humbleness, and sincerity of mind, resignation of soul to God, victory over self, and everything else that belongs to true lowliness and profound humiliation. This is real and living glory; but not the glory of the world or of the flesh, for these neither understand nor desire it. Alas! how little is it considered, that an outward religious act, and religion itself, are two things, very distinct and very separable! Scribes, pharisees, and hypocrites, have performed the one with the greatest care and exactness; but, all the while, were farther from the kingdom of God than even publicans and harlots: the other, consisting in divine life and the inward union of the soul with Christ, is the portion and experience of none but the children of God.

We may be proud of pretended virtues; and, perhaps, it is possible to be proud even of grace itself, opposite as it is to that fallen principle of corrupted nature; but it is not so possible to think nothing of ourselves, and to be contented with the slight and contempt of others; to prefer all God's children to ourselves, and to place our seat far below theirs; to love our meekest and our humblest thoughts, and to hate bitterly the emotions of pride, and the urgings of anger and arrogance. Yet all this is the true and solid dignity of a Christian soul, and brings it nearest to the likeness of Christ, if not nearest to his throne.

O Lord, help me to understand myself. May I wish to see, not how great and good, (as flesh would have it,) but how mean and vile, I am. Preserve me from high thoughts of myself; for these become not a sinful, dying worm, who lives every moment upon a breath of air; nor yet do they become a redeemed sinner, whose only plea must be mercy, who had nothing of his own but sin, and who by grace alone can be saved, according to thy gift, O Lord, my God!

CHAP. XXXVI.

ON TALENTS.

It is the sentence of an apostle, uttering the mind of the Holy Ghost, that "though he himself should speak with the tongues of men, and of angels," that is, with the highest degree of the most energetic or zealous eloquence "and had not charity, or the love of God in his heart, he should become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal." He goes farther: "Though I (says he) have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries, and all knowledge; and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing." He doeth not stop here: "Though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing." Awful words! The possibility of such a case, (and surely the apostle had not been led to state it, if it were not possible) should alarm the mind of every one, who professeth to believe and follow the gospel of Christ.

It is obvious, at first view, that grace and gifts are two things, and that their separate effects or consequences, to the possessors of either, may be different also.

Grace, or charity, or love, which have nearly the same sense, when applied to the life of God in the soul of man, is the special influence of the Holy Spirit, dwelling in the heart. This, coming from God, unites him in love to God through Christ, and shows itself in the various ways of patience, resignation, self-denial, abstraction from envy and other malignant passions, with all those other blessed fruits, which the apostle beautifully describes as growing out of it, and which cannot truly grow out of any other principle.

But eloquence, prophecy, understanding of mysteries, attainment of theoretic knowledge, and even that sort of faith itself which rests in the working of outward prodigies as well as almsgiving, and the surrender of life, may all be possessed without grace, and may answer ends too that are not gracious. They are gifts indeed from God, and so is food, or health; but they are often gifts to the mere natural man, and may be held, like all other natural faculties, either with or without anything better.

A man may understand the terms, grace, justification, regeneration, and other holy and spiritual principles, so far as they can be the objects of human apprehension; and yet have no share in the truths implied by them, and consequently be ruined at the last.

Ahithophel was eloquent and wise, almost as the oracle of God, 2 Sam. xvi. 23.; Saul, as well as Balaam, was among the prophets, 1 Sam. xix. 24.; Solomon understood all mysteries and knowledge, but found them vain and insufficient to keep him from falling. Judas preached and wrought miracles, but at the same time had a devil. Luke ix. 1, 2. The pharisees gave great alms, but were a generation of vipers. Even heathens themselves, and amongst them poor Indian women too, have surrendered up their bodies to torture and to death; but none of them, certainly, either with any sense of this love of God, or for his glory. The apostle's argument is, that these outward gifts alone cannot possibly profit to eternity, because they cease or vanish in time: even the believer's holy knowledge, as it is possessed here, shall be done away, because it is partial, and sees through the medium of corruptible senses, as through a glass darkly or enigmatically; which will not be the case in the soul's future perfect and pure vision of God: but charity, or the divine love, being from the divine essence, and essential also to the very being of a true Christian, can never fail, nor cease, nor vanish away.

All this proves the assertion, that grace and gifts are two separable things, even in the profession of the truest religion. Grace is peculiar to the children of God: gifts may be possessed by men, as such, whether Heathen or Christian. The former is essential to the divine life; the latter, chiefly ornamental or subordinate. A man may go to heaven without gifts; but, if he had all the fine parts, and all the advantages of religious life and profession in the world, without grace, they would in the end profit him nothing. Many, it is to be feared, have written and spoken well concerning salvation, who never inwardly experienced or enjoyed it. They knew the theory, but not the thing.

By their fruits, such ever were and ever will be known. They have called Christ, "Lord, Lord;" and this was easy enough: but to "do the things which he said," to "take up his cross," and to "follow him" truly in the regeneration; this is above flesh and blood, and impossible to be done by those who have nothing else. This observation applies to professors at large; but the Redeemer himself carries it farther to persons in a higher class; "Many, many will say to me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied (or preached) in thy name? and in thy name have cast out devils (from those who were under their dominion)? and in thy name done many wonderful works (perhaps been made the means of converting thousands); and then will I profess unto them, I never knew you: depart from me, ye that work iniquity." Thus, it appears, the devils may be subject to a man through Christ; and yet (what is of infinitely more consequence to himself) his name may not be written in heaven.

Where grace and talents are indeed united, they capacitate the possessor not only to be useful, but to shine: and to shine thus (like a diamond upon sable,) reflecting purely the Redeemer's glory, and foiled (as it were) with meekness and humility, is a blessing to be wished for on account of others, rather than for any man's own concern, and therefore not to be envied. He that envies another's abilities, forgets the giver, and hath not learned the proper use of any, not even of his own. Great faculties require proportionally the greater grace to manage them; or the corruption of the heart will pervert them to private ends, as it hath but too evidently done in a thousand cases. To colour the deception, there may be a show of zeal, and abundance of activity with these talents, which may seem well laid out, and be very successful too among men, in the most serious and divine concerns: and yet, after all, self, that secret and subtle self, may be the main-spring, or final object, of the whole. "Come, see my zeal for the Lord," said Jehu; while his great purpose was earthly splendour, and dominion for himself. Herod preserved John (as the word means,) and did many things by his suggestion, and heard him gladly; but, through pride and lust, he murdered him at last. And so Judas (as was mentioned before) prayed and preached, and undoubtedly wrought miracles, as fairly and clearly as the other apostles; or certainly he must have been suspected by them for the traitor at the Lord's supper, without any further occasion of troubling Christ with their repeated question, "Is it I? is it I?" Had he been noticed for the least outward deficiency among those, "to whom even the devils were obedient through the name of Jesus," John could have wanted no other sign, John xiii. 21—26. An old writer gives another remarkable instance: an eloquent and distinguished orator maintained in a set discourse the truth of the Christian religion, with so much force and clearness, as to excite the admiration and astonishment of all that heard him. His friends warmly congratulated him on his success. He was alive to their praise; it was the very thing that he wanted. But, to secure the honour (as he thought) the more entirely to himself, he vaunted, that, in taking the other side of the argument, he could easily pull down all he had raised, and establish the contrary upon its ruins. Divine justice, we are told, was not slow to vindicate the divine glory; for he, who, notwithstanding his great abilities, was before a spiritual fool, became soon afterwards a natural driveller and an incurable idiot. His eminent powers, which at first seemed to be in employment for God, turned out, upon trial, to be devoted to himself, and his own vain glory. These, and such like things should ever occasion great searchings of heart.

Help me, O my God, to search mine. For this end, do thou thyself "examine me, and prove me;" try my reins and my heart. Leave no corner unexplored; but discover the whole, as it is, to the eye of my mind; let, O let me never be deceived about myself, nor fatally be a stranger to myself, or to the principles of action and affection within me. Let these be all simple, all pure; give me the single eye and the single heart, that no double views or intentions, nor corrupt motive or desires, nothing, no, nothing but what proceedeth from thee, and leadeth to thee again, may direct and animate my soul. Let me cautiously regard all my faculties, and jealously watch over the application of all my powers, that everything of mine may proceed in the exactest conformity to thy will and word. It is my wish indeed, and this thou knowest, to act much for thee, but in no case, and at no time, without thee; and when thou callest me not to action, but to suffering and waiting, which is yet more difficult to man, O help me, like Abraham and Moses, to stand in patient submission, as they stood, though my trial be drawn out, like theirs, through a dull and unpromising length of years. Be thou with me, and all shall be well, whether I bear or do. If I am to be silent or passive, support me, for I cannot even stand by myself: if I am called to act, "work in me to will and to do of thy good pleasure;" for all thy truth and my own experience prove, that in the business of spiritual life especially, "without thee I can do nothing."

CHAP. XXXVII.

IT IS THROUGH GRACE THAT ALL ORDINANCES ARE RIGHTLY USED AND BECOME BENEFICIAL.

As there is a talent of speaking with grace the things that are true and profitable, so there is a talent of hearing with grace, that those things may be received with edification. We may too often see and bewail a customary slight mode of hearing, which, instead of enlivening, deadens, instead of warming, fixes the cold; instead of promoting the life of God within, only confirms the life of the flesh throughout. This is sharply reprehended in Ezek. xxxiii. 30—32.

Some are for hearing a variety of preachers, others a multitude of sermons; not for profit, but for pleasure; not to digest, and turn the discourses into spiritual nourishment, but to satisfy the hurry and bustle of nature, which doth not love patient reflection, nor the meditating labour of the soul. To hear only, and commend this, and that, and the other preacher, however excellent and gracious, is poor employment indeed, which requires very little sense, and less grace, to perform. To set up men, and forget God, to be extolling one man above another, and to be ready to quarrel and abuse for the sake of one poor worm against another, is all of it nothing more than the vileness of the carnal nature, perversely crept into religious profession, and all of it equally wretched, impertinent, and vain. If this were the whole that is to be found in religion, it would not be a bad wish, that one's "life might rather be spent with philosophers."

To hear for amusement or criticism, to be delighted with flowery language, to be charmed with action, person, manner, and voice, may be well enough in the theatre or the senate; but to attend upon God, to hear his word as for one's life, to be filled with the solid importance of divine things, and to carry them home into the heart for comfort and strength in the experience; this is quite another kind of business, which doth not so much engage the carnal mind or ear, as employ the most fervent exertions and the holiest affections of the soul. The one is rank abuse of a sacred institution, and perverted to lull the soul to sleep, in carnal security, under the notion of a religious engagement: the other is finding, in the true and gracious use of the means, the advantage which the Lord intended by them.

It is better likewise to hear one sermon, and then to recollect it, to feed and ponder upon it, and to turn the matter of it into prayer, than to be present at four, five, or six, in a day, as some have been, and not be able at last to give a tolerable account of any one of them. The divine life of a Christian doth not consist in mere hearing, any more than his natural life in always eating; but in digesting and in bringing what he hears, as so much nourishment, into the very frame and strength of his soul.

Faith must be mixed with this, and with all ordinances and sacraments, otherwise the outward man alone acts, while the inner man is asleep or dead; and so that, "which should have been for welfare, only becomes an occasion of falling."

"How have I heard, not how much?" is the best inquiry. Our Lord directs us to consider it well, where he says, "Take heed how ye hear." And if we reflect, that God's word is "a savour of life unto life, or of death unto death," in them that do hear it; surely in so solemn an affair, we ought to pray before we hear, to watch unto prayer in hearing, and to mix faith and prayer with what we have heard, that it may turn to our good, and not to our sorrow.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

ON THE PROFITABLE HEARING OF THE WORD.

This subject is of so much importance, as to demand some further reflections. It is a trite observation, that we have two ears, and but one tongue. The natural inference, however, becomes the more important, when authorized by the Holy Ghost: "Let every man be swift to hear, and slow to speak."

But though swiftness of hearing be right, it is only so upon just principles and for a proper end. A person may be swift to hear evil, through the corruption of nature, for no other purpose than to practise it. In such a case, slowness, or deafness itself, is comparatively a blessing.

It appears, then, that there are two sorts of hearing, or faculties, the spiritual and the carnal, the right and the wrong: the one formed and improved by grace; the other left, as it came into the world, under the perverseness and depravity of nature. We will consider both of these as briefly as possible.

When man fell from God, he not only lost the right use of the natural faculties, which consisted in raising spiritual and divine ideas from the outward objects, but the faculties themselves were diminished; and, instead of serving the Creator, and showing forth his glory in the knowledge and happiness of a perfect creature, were corrupted to obey a fallen spirit in every ministration of sin, whether in filthiness, baseness, pride, or malignity. The ear, amongst these, became the organ of a depraved understanding, and is often put, by a figure, for the depraved understanding itself. And because men, in their state of nature, are so besotted and blinded by sin as to have no understanding (or what is worse than none) in spiritual things; they are said to have no ears in those things. On the other hand, our Lord frequently addresses himself to those, "who have ears to hear;" manifestly implying, that the faithful only can hear to purpose, and that all others are, in a certain sense, without ears, that is, incapable of understanding what they outwardly do hear. This corrupted faculty cannot, therefore, receive the truth; but, through gross misapprehension, can only pervert it, turning good into bad, and the bad into worse and worse.

The true faculty is indeed a new creation, and consequently the operation and gift of God. The Lord makes "the hearing ear and the seeing eye," said the wise man; or, as Elihu expresses it to the same purpose, "God openeth the ears of men, and sealeth their instruction." In vain might men speak, as Ezekiel would have spoken to that emblem of sinners spiritually dead, "the dry bones," unless the Lord of power vouchsafe to bless, and to impart the truth and strength of a right understanding to the mind.

But where this new faculty is given, the believer should remember, with anxious concern, that even there also remaineth the old. They both remain in the same person, and often produce, if care be not taken, and a better care than his own, a sort of neutral exercise of faculties, employing them upon the very best things to no purpose at all, and sometimes to purposes which, it might be thought, no gracious person could allow or endure. The fact is, professors hear the truth too much in their old man; they do not mix faith with what they hear; and so they become triflers in divine things, and grow insipid and indifferent to them. Their new man is not renewed day by day, through holy meditation and prayer, and therefore seems to grow weaker; while their old man gathers strength and inclination for the things of the flesh and the world. They do not (as the martyr of old said) "join the ears of their head and their heart together."

Hence, in Christian profession, we have such just complaint of heavy ears. Persons shall have been long under the word, and yet shall have profited so little for the time, that they appear like infants, when they ought to be full grown; or dwarfs, and misshapen dwarfs too, at the age of maturity. This dulness of hearing often makes it needful that such should be "taught again the first principles of the oracles of God;" because (as the apostle says) "being babes, they have no experience in the word of righteousness." What a strange sight is this, a man in leading-strings; a person in years wailing for the breast! And yet meat, and especially strong meat, is not good for him; he cannot digest it. He is capable of taking nothing but milk: and it is well, if the only pure milk will satisfy him.

There is also, in Christian profession, what the scripture calls "an uncircumcised ear." A man, with an uncircumcised ear, is unsubdued by what he hears, so that his "thoughts are not brought into captivity," nor into sweet subjection unto Christ. He hears, therefore, by his own powers. His soul consequently is not bent into meekness under the word; but coming to it as a critic or a judge, with a high look and a lofty heart, he squares all things by his own rule and reason, and determines all by his own measure and understanding. When the truth is made particular to him, he acts like some high professors of old, and like all who are "uncircumcised in heart and ears," (Acts vii. 51.)—he "resists the Holy Ghost." Such a one receiveth not correction; truth is perished to him, and cut off from his mouth. He is therefore not the better for what he hears, but the worse, converting the wholesome nourishment, through his cachectic or bad habit, into poison or disease. In process of time, he grows both careless and hardened under the word; and, being now sermon-proof, receives no more real impression from the gospel, than the flinty rock from a shower of rain. Alas! alas! how often may one bewail these uncircumcised ears!

The Apostle reminds us also of "itching ears," which are not so desirous of their own proper exercise of receiving the truth, as of being tickled and amused. A light thing, a mere feather, will answer this purpose better than that two-edged sword, which cuts beneath the skin, and penetrates to the very thoughts and intents of the heart. The itching ear takes a wonderful pleasure in quaint or odd expressions, or in flowing, polished, or rhetorical phrases and language. To it there are no such charms, as the charms of manner and words; a rich and glowing diction, a correct and masterly style, the grace of delivery, the force of reason, and the sublimity of thought. These are excellencies indispensable and invaluable to the curious ear. A good story, especially if there be any wit in it, will tickle it almost to an ecstasy. Sometimes mere rodomontade will serve the end, which is, to divert and be diverted. A pathetic or melancholy discourse will also tickle well an itching ear, though in a different way; for, if the animal passions be moved, if the old Adam be wrought upon, if the common feelings of the carnal nature be excited with any degree of emotion; these will gratify and please that carnal nature, as well as in hearing tragedies and oratorios, even to rapture and excess, so as almost to be mistaken for religion and grace. In all this, there may not be one particle of that life of the new man, "which is renewed after the image of him that created him." I do not mean, that a Christian is to be divested of the common feelings of humanity, but that he is not to mistake these for the actings of grace in the things of God; nor from the word of God to seek for so low an object as the gratification of these. He is not to be entertained, but edified; not to be amused, but corrected; not to be pleased only, but profited; not to crave indulgence to the "desires of the flesh and of the mind," for this every worldling craves; but through grace to subdue his evil propensities and affections, and to confine nature within its bounds, that the life of Christ may be made manifest, and that the fruits of faith may abound to the divine glory. Oh how much more wise and happy is this for the soul, than the mean and trifling enjoyment that can be procured for itching ears!

There is also, to mention no more, what a gracious and dear friend of mine has well styled, that monster in profession, who is all ear. No faculty, in religious matters, but this one: no head to apprehend, no heart to love and experience, no hands to act for Christ, no feet to walk in the obedience of God; but all—all ear! A new preacher, a fine preacher, a long sermon, sermon after sermon: discourses about the talents of preachers and the beauty of sermons, and sometimes matters not quite so good as these, are objects of supreme delight for too many, who rather wish to hear about Christ, than to live upon him, and to have a good seat under the sound of the gospel, than to be enjoying the power of it. O what a poor sort of professing life is this! To mistake air for food, and mere hearing for godliness; alas! what will this avail the soul, when it shall need strength and courage to resist the powers of darkness, and to enter the gloomy valley of the dead.

The true servants of God have, in a certain subordinate sense, their ears opened or pierced, according to the meaning of the rite in the law; and thus they are made his own for ever. They come willingly, in the day of his power, to the door of his house, even to Christ, the only door of the "true tabernacle, which God hath pitched, and not man;" and there each of them joyfully declares, "I would not, and, in thy strength I will not, go away, O Lord, from thee; because I love thee, and I love thine house, and because it is good for me to be with thee." By this spiritual operation, they are made alive to God, and are enabled spiritually to hear his word, and to have it written in their inward parts, and thus to serve and live for God in Christ, with life eternal. They cannot endure another service; and any voice, but the voice of their Master, they will neither delight in, nor obey. As dutiful servants, and adopted children, they listen to his holy word, follow his heavenly will, seek not their own, but his honour and glory, and count nothing of so much value beneath the sun, as to finish their course with joy. O my soul, mayest thou be found with these, when the Lord shall "make up his jewels, and shall spare them as a man spareth his own son that serveth him!" Thou shalt then enter into his house indeed, and dwell with him for ever and ever.

Another type in the law shows the inward virtue of the divine life. The sanctifying oil was not only to be put upon the right hand, the right foot, and the right ear of the leper, but upon the extremities, the thumb, the great toe, the tip of those right members; in order to show, that, in our renewing by the Holy Spirit, we must expect all true strength, even the least and to the utmost, all our right obedience, and all our hearing to profit, from that unction of the Holy One. This anointing, which is received of Christ, even the Spirit of truth, which the world cannot receive, abideth in the real Christian; and by this, in fact, he becomes a Christian, that is, an anointed person: and the same anointing teacheth him of all things, and is true, and not a lie. Thus he hears, and hears aright. He hears inwardly, and with life; and, by grace in this hearing, increases life. Sounds, mere sounds, are nothing; and words alone nothing; but the word and truth of Christ, spiritually received and experimentally digested, are, in his eye, and heart, and ear, the all in all of every ordinance and proclamation of the gospel.

I would come into the power of these things, O my Lord, more and more; and I lament with deep compunction, that my progression is so small, my true hearing so dull, my affections so cold, my faith so weak, my hope so drooping, and my whole man so often disordered and defiled by infirmity. Oh how great and difficult a thing is it to be a Christian! To live, and hope, and walk, truly by the faith of thee, the Son of God! Do thou, who art the High Priest of my profession, circumcise and pierce my ear, that I may be made affectionately thine own for ever; anoint it also with thine holy oil, that I may receive rightly, and understand truly, the words of eternal life, the rich and the profound mysteries of thy kingdom. So shall I hear, and live, and learn, and love, till I see thee in thy glory; and then, stripped of all my own imperfection and frailty, but clothed with thy righteousness and salvation, I shall magnify thine holy name in the great, the universal, the everlasting, Hallelujah.

CHAP. XXXIX.

UPON DECLENSIONS FROM GOD.

Alas! how prone am I to fall into sin, and to leave the fountain of living waters! My infirmities often prevail against me, and, contrary to the better will of my soul, drag me into the snares and bondage of corruption.

I have sinned: what shall I say unto thee, O thou preserver of men! If thou leave me to myself, if thou recover me not, I am gone for ever. O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death.

Thus I mourn and am vexed, when my corruptions are ready to overpower me. I should be lost, but for the merciful aid: I must perish entirely, if the blood and righteousness of my dear Redeemer were not again and again applied to save and to comfort me.

Oh what a miserable body do I bear about with me! It is the very load, and plague, and prison of my soul. And yet how foolishly do I love it, and care for it; and how much more time do I spend in nourishing this evil flesh, than in seeking the peace of God, or the advancement and prosperity of my immortal mind! I am ashamed, as a Christian, that I am not more ashamed of these things.

CHAP. XL.

ON SOBRIETY OF SPIRIT.

A Christian should desire, as a great privilege, the constant sobriety and calm recollection of his mind. Worldly things often flutter the animal spirits; and the disorder of these will too frequently throw the soul into confusion; so that it is liable to be carried away into what it condemns, through a sudden impression on its affections, or to be turned aside from what it approves, by the vehement onset of its passions. This want of inward sobriety is one great cause of all the irregularities, which believers feel and bemoan in their passage to heaven.

"Be sober, be vigilant," is a most necessary admonition to us, while we are in this unstable flesh, and within reach of such an adversary as the devil. If we are not abstracted, in due measure, from the crazy and drunken spirit of this world, to which we are naturally inclined, and from which grace only can deliver us at all, we shall be distracted with a thousand foolish and useless things, be exposed to numberless dangers and snares, be harassed with doubts and disorders, and often in our giddiness shall forget where we are, whither we are going, and what must shortly pass upon us. Oh this golden, glittering, dazzling cup of the mystic Babylon, this evil world! how often is it in her hand, held out towards us! how ready are we to take and to drink of it! but how full is it of the abominations and filthiness of her spiritual fornication and departure from God!

How difficult, duly considered, is the Christian's passage through life! how marvellous his safe arrival in heaven! it appears indeed to be nothing less than one of the greatest continued wonders of almighty goodness and power.

If a man were commanded to put to sea by himself, in a small open boat, without any sustenance but what might fall from the skies, and with no direction but a chart and compass, and thus to pass over a wide and tempestuous ocean; it may give some faint idea of the Christian's voyage to heaven. He too, in a feeble bark, has no chart but the word of God, no compass but the Spirit of God, no provision but the daily grace of God in Christ, no safety from the raging waves of the world, or the roaring winds of the evil spirit, but the power of God, no ability to keep himself for one moment from sinking, but through faith in the mercy of God, and no hope of getting safe to the heavenly shore, but by the truth of God in Christ Jesus. Indeed, and indeed, when a Christian considers all these perils on the one hand, and his own weakness on the other, it seems an act of most astonishing love and omnipotence, that he should ever inherit the kingdom of heaven. He feels it to be mercy, and faithfulness, and rich bounty, and unspeakable kindness altogether, from beginning to end, and is at times lost in wonder, love, praise, and gratitude, for so great, so unmerited a salvation.

Seeing then, that these things are so, verily he ought to watch and pray, that he may "continue in faith and charity, and in holiness with sobriety," unto the end.

CHAP. XLI.

OUR HEART MUST BE GIVEN TO GOD.

If we could offer to God the whole world, and yet keep back our heart, it would be to him a worthless and an odious offering. He considers not the greatness or outward grandeur of human works, but the spirit by which they are performed. Some build hospitals, make noble endowments, give large donations, and do many other great and wonderful works; all which are not to be spoken against in themselves, because they are of use to the world, and especially to the poor: but it is possible to do all these, without a heart for God, without considering his glory, without faith in his mercy, or love of mercy to man, and without being in the least degree nearer to him or his holiness. A widow, with two poor mites and a hand and heart of faith, will be found to have done more than all these, in the sight of him who judgeth righteously.

If our heart be given to God, we shall not be barren or unfruitful indeed; but our fruit will not be for carnal vanity, but unto true holiness. "Christ in us the hope of glory," is a principle of such power, that it turns a man (as it were) out of himself, delivers him from his own selfish whims and intentions, releases him from a multitude of slavish fears and concerns, and causes him ardently to desire and delight in those things alone, which may exercise a gracious gratitude in showing forth the praises of his kind Redeemer.

CHAP. XLII.

ON LIBERTY OF SOUL.

The real liberty of the soul consists in a happy freedom from the absolute dominion of sin and Satan. The Christian, therefore, denies himself, because of sin in his mortal body; he shuns the spirit of the world, because by its sinfulness it promotes his inbred corruptions; he prays and watches against the evil one, because he is the grand tempter and stirrer of all iniquity, both in himself and others.

The more this frame is maintained, the more will the heart enjoy "the glorious liberty of the children of God." This is a holy and righteous freedom, which the Christian pants after continually, and which is most sweetly experienced when the soul is most abstracted from the low solicitudes and dull satisfactions of sense and time. The Father of mercies is the cause, the Son of his love is the means, and the Spirit of grace is the power, of all the spiritual freedom in earth and heaven, and of all the transporting blessedness resulting from it.

The world and the flesh are a dead weight upon the mind, in its possession and exercise of this delightful liberty; and, therefore, in the mind's struggles to gain and secure it, the world and the flesh must be brought down and kept down, having, like the devil's jailers, nothing about them, but miserable chains and fetters, wherewith to bind and imprison the soul.

CHAP. XLIII.

UPON SICKNESS.

All sickness and sorrow arise from sin. If we were not unholy creatures, we should not be unhappy creatures. Because of the ill habit, occasioned by transgression, every element fights against our health by changes and inclemencies; and the very food we eat, while it nourishes for a time, lays the foundation of disease in our bodies, already prepared, by their own weakness and ill temperament, to receive and increase it.

Sickness is a dismal scourge to the ungodly, and a painful spur to the gracious. To the one, it is the harbinger of terror and misery; but, to the other, a solemn remembrancer indeed, both of the vanity of all earthly things, and of the nearer and nearer approach of immortal glory.

When sickness comes, and grace can meet it; Oh what a just representation do they make to the soul, concerning the poor honours, riches, cares, and pleasures, of this transitory world! How unimportant do all the struggles for power, splendour, titles, wealth, and pre-eminence, which have employed or engaged the past and present ages, appear! How childish and mean these objects pass before us, for which men have lavished their time, and thrown away their souls! What bubbles, what nonsense, what glaring and horrid stupidity, have filled and directed, have engaged and overwhelmed, the counsels of the world; and all to no other profit than a little fleeting vanity, with a rapid descent to lasting oblivion or ruin! Thus the soul feels, when it is quickened by sickness to consider the low and passing affairs of earth and of time.

On the contrary, how inexpressibly great and tremendous do the things of God and eternity rise in full view to the mind! The worth of worlds, what are they, in some of these soul-searching moments? How is the mind astonished with the grandeur of God, and with the deep and wide importance of all that belongs to him! Rapt in the solemn contemplation of unutterable glories, how doth the mind tremblingly examine and carefully inquire into the truth and extent of its interest in them! and if grace seal an answer of peace upon the heart, how doth it flutter with gladness at its safety, and how will the whole frame be agitated with a new delight, in the sure prospect of an eternal concern in these valuable, these only valuable, things!

The Christian will be wakingly alive to all this, and more, if his disorder be such as can admit of reflection. Blessed be God, however, whether he can thus reflect or not; yet, being a Christian, his state is equally safe with God, through his gracious Redeemer. Whatever be the frame, the promise is sure, the covenant of God is ordered in all things and sure, and sure and faithful is God himself to perform it. It is comfortable, and indeed desirable, to have pleasant foretastes and feelings of grace and glory, under the pain or decay of the body, but they are not otherwise material to the true believer's security for heaven. If he hath not these perceptions during the short time of his sickness, he will have them abundantly after it, if it end in his dissolution: or if it do not thus end, the want of them is a loud admonition to "make his calling and election sure," in the days that may yet be appointed him.

If we cannot think of Christ, through the power of disease, O what a happiness is it to be assured, that Christ thinks constantly and effectually of us! He "maketh all our bed in our sickness;" that is, he turns the whole frame of our condition in it for our best advantage.

O Lord, leave me not, poor and helpless sinner that I am, in my most healthful state; leave me not especially, I beseech thee, in the low, the languid, the distressing, circumstances of infirmity and disease! Jesus, Master, thou art said to have borne our sicknesses, because thou barest the sins which occasioned them; take, take away from my conscience the guilt which brought disease, and then the worst part of its misery shall be done away too. And when, through my feebleness or disorder, I cannot act faith upon thy love, O catch my drooping spirit, carry me as one of thine own lambs in thy bosom, enfold me in thy gracious arms, and let my soul wholly commit itself and give up its all in quiet resignation to thee! If thou raise me from my sickness, grant that it may be for the setting forth of thy glory among men: if thou take me by sickness from this world, O thou hope and life of my soul, receive me to thyself for my everlasting happiness, and to be another monument of sovereign grace before the great assembly of saints and angels in thy kingdom of heaven.

CHAP. XLIV.

UPON DEATH.

It is an awful and a solemn thing to die; and I am sometimes amazed at myself, that, seeing it is not only awful, but sure, I can be so void of reflection or recollection, as I frequently am, concerning it.

Some talk bravely about death, and of encountering it with great natural courage, or upon high philosophical principles. These may indeed defy or meet the sting, but they can neither soften nor take it away. For a sinner to bully death with no spiritual life in his soul, and no everlasting life in reversion, is the act of a desperate madman, who laughs at a horrible precipice before him, and rushes down headlong to destruction.

Oh eternity! eternity! It is fearful indeed to burst the bands of life, and to break forth into the boundless and unalterable regions of eternity! Nature, in its senses, cannot bear the shocking reflection which death affords, either of being an everlasting nothing, as atheists talk; or of enduring everlasting misery, as sin deserves. It is grace only, which can inspire the heart with a hope full of joy and immortality, that, when this brittle transitory life is past, the soul shall possess a being, happy and long as the days of heaven.

Through Jesus Christ alone is death disarmed. When the Saviour speaks peace and salvation through his cross and righteousness, this last great enemy is no more the king of terrors. He gives up his fearful sting, and destroys nothing about the Christian, but sin, and the means of sin.

Oh how sweet is the smile of that Christian, who, dying in the body, feels himself just upon living for ever! "He is not sick unto death, but unto life" indeed. He quits his cares, his sorrows, his infirmities, and all that could distress or distract his spirit here, and looks calmly into the world before him, where he can meet with nothing but concord and joy, in the society of the redeemed, and of his Saviour throughout eternity. He is weaned from the earth, and therefore can part with it easily: he is fitted for heaven, and therefore longs for it earnestly. He cannot but desire that which is congenial with his own renewed mind; and nothing of that sort can truly and perfectly be found, out of the regions of glory.

They who afflict themselves (said a primitive Christian writer) about the loss of this life, are like infants unborn, who, if they could speak, might bewail their expulsion from the womb at the approaching time of their birth; foolishly considering it not as the means, but as the end of being. Men, in their natural state, may indeed deplore their removal from this world, for which only they desire to live; but the renewed Christian is privileged to have a more glorious hope of a life everlastingly pure like God's, and of a habitation wide and beautiful as the temple of heaven.

Lord, when I shall quit this clay, I know not, nor do I desire to know. It will be sufficient for me, if thou sustain me by thy grace now; and if I am divinely assured, that I shall be for ever with thee in the world to come. O that this invincible "joy of the Lord may indeed be my strength" when I lie down upon the bed of death, waiting from moment to moment for Christ, and for my own dismission hence to be with him.

Soon this body shall turn to the dust, from whence it was framed; but nothing can extinguish the life of my spirit, which hath no relation to earth, which cannot subsist by matter and form, and which, in all its faculties of will, understanding, love, and perception, is of kin to a brighter world. And, O how reviving is the thought! I am not only of kin to angels and heavenly spirits, by the very nature of my soul, but I am doubly related to them and to my God, by being born again, and renewed after his blessed image, or likeness, through Jesus Christ. I am made by this, a child and an heir of an everlasting inheritance. All that death, then, can do for me is, to tell me that I am of age, and to lead me forth from these chambers of darkness, to celebrate my birth-day in the palace of glory. There is in this view (what hath often been tasted) a kind of luxury in dying. In such a blessed, such an animating sense of death, I ought to say, that he deserves quite another name; or, rather, to exult with the prophet and apostle, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?"

Whence then, at times, is the shuddering reluctance I feel at the prospect of dying? Surely it is, because my faith and hope are not so lively as they are privileged to be; it is because I do not so steadily trust in the truth of those things which my mind apprehends, and which I profess to be waiting for. Earth is too real, and heaven too unreal; or I could not thus hesitate, or tremblingly stand, on the bank of the brook which keeps me from the fruition of God. The struggle of my heart would not be for longer and longer continuance here, if my spirit were as firmly persuaded, as it should be, of my inheritance and mansion in glory.

Thou blessed Saviour of poor sinners like me, on thee, and on thee alone, my eyes are fixed! In the solemn last hour of my pilgrimage below, O let my eyes of faith be yet more steadily and ardently fixed upon thee! And do thou, in the tender compassion of thy heart, which can sympathize with all thy people's woes, look down in my departing moments upon me. Soothe the pangs of death with thy rich consolation and care. Let me then see thee by precious faith, who to carnal sense art invisible, ready, willing, glad to receive my soul; and let me pour it forth, in an ecstasy of praise and desire, as into the bosom of love! O my God, thus to die, would not be dying; but only departing, to live and to be happy for ever!

So true are thy gracious words, O my Jesus, "Whosoever liveth and believeth in thee, shall never die:" no; "he shall never perish, but is passed from death unto life, and shall live for evermore." Glory be to thee, for this rich, this invaluable promise! Lord, I believe: O help mine unbelief!

CHAP. XLV.

THE RECOLLECTION OF THIS SECOND PART IN PRAYER TO GOD.

Enable me O Lord, my God, to examine myself, the state of my soul, and the reality and growth of my experience, seriously, deeply, and constantly. I am still clothed with a corrupt nature, and therefore am always inclined to favour myself; and nothing but thy grace can give me a faithful distrust of my own condition and attainments, or a holy watchfulness over all that passeth within me.

As I have received Christ Jesus my Lord, so I know it is my interest, privilege, happiness, and duty, to walk, to live, to grow, and to press forward in him. O keep me from spiritual sloth, or, as it may better be called, from carnal security, that I may run, with the loins of my mind always girt and disentangled, and with increasing faith and patience, the blessed race which thou hast set before me. Give zeal for every duty, wisdom and strength rightly to perform it, and a humble holy resignation of heart to leave all the success unto thee.

Make me wise to discern the motions within my soul, and to trace out from whence they proceed. O let me not be deceived by the will or the cunning force of the flesh, whenever, it would mingle in holy things; but let my spirit be thine own sacred temple, where I may find thee indeed, working in me, enlightening and enlivening me for all thy service and glory, and drawing me, with a single eye and a simple heart, to seek not myself, not my own pride, profit, or pleasure, but all I want, and all I can rightly have, in thee, and in thee alone. Draw me nearer and nearer to this just and perfect rule of action, to this sweet and blessed spiritual life; so that I may be able indeed to say, and with the increasing confidence of truth, I no longer live, but Christ liveth in me; and the life that I live in the flesh, is not after the flesh, but by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself freely for me. O let this be my humble and secret path of life, which none can know but those whom thou teachest, and which, for its narrowness, none can walk in, but those whom thou supportest by thy hand.

Thou knowest, O my God, that I am in the world, surrounded by temptations, opposed by men, attacked by devils, weakened by infirmities, and exposed by a corrupt nature to all manner of evils. Without are fightings, within are fears. How shall I get safely on to the end, or, rather, how shall I get on at all, unless thou art with me? I plead then thine own promise of truth, that thou wilt guide me by thy counsel, and at last receive me to glory.

Keep me, while I am in the world, from the envious, proud, hateful, dangerous, an unhappy spirit, which aboundeth in it. Let me have constant proof that indeed I am thine, by having thy life manifest in my mortal body, controlling and subduing it in all things to thy righteous will. So shall even the world own, that I have been with Jesus; and if it hate me upon that account, as it hated him, Oh welcome be it, and let me account it as one of my brightest evidences and greatest honours.

In all the circumstances and conditions of my outward life, O help me to look for thy special blessing, without which nothing can succeed in itself, without which everything may lead me astray. Help me to bear losses and crosses as thy dispensations, intended only for my good; and give me wisdom and grace to see thine intention, and to get the good thou meanest by them. If one of thine hands be laid hard upon me, let the other support and bear me up with the more firmness and security. Restrain all the murmuring and rebellion of my carnal nature against thy holy will, and lead my spirit, by all visitations, to nearer fellowship and sweeter communion with thee. So shall my earthly sorrows be turned into spiritual joys, and all the calamities, which can befall me here, shall become urging and successful remembrancers, to prepare me for my mansion in thy heavenly kingdom.

And when sickness and death shall come, as come they must in a very little while at the longest, O stand by me, my dear and only Lord, in my drooping and needful moments. Make all my bed in my sickness, and overcome the sorrows of nature by the lively joys of thy grace. Receive my spirit, which I commit unto thee, as thine only; for truly I am thine entirely, thine by purchase, thine by grace, thine by promise, thine by the immutable oath of all thine holy attributes. O carry me to the regions of peace, to the church of the first-born, to the city of God, and to Jesus, my Lord, my Life, and my only Redeemer! Whom have I in heaven itself, but thee; and what can I desire throughout all thy works, in comparison of thee? My heart and my flesh may fail; but thou, thou, even thou, art the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever!

PART III.

CHAP. I.

THE REAL CHRISTIAN LOVES HIS COUNTRY, AND IS THEREFORE THE BEST OF PATRIOTS.

Political hypocrisy hath made the laudable name of patriotism almost suspicious. But he that is sincere in the best things, and walks as in the sight of God, will, of all men, be faithful in lower matters, and carry a sterling integrity from religion into every duty of social life. On the other hand, he that regards not God, nor yet other men but as they are convenient to himself, may very justly be suspected in his fidelity to his country. Profit and vain glory, indeed, will carry some men very far, as they have done; but strip a worldly man of these, and where are his motives for promoting the national welfare?

The Christian is not a mere showy patriot, for lucre or for fame; but he is, what none but a Christian can be, a patriot in spirit and in truth, pouring out his secret and earnest prayers before God for the true prosperity of the land. The world, indeed, hath a low opinion of this artillery of heaven; but one, who is wiser than the world, hath told us, that "the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much." And if one such person, like an Elias, can be instrumental in drawing down public blessings, what may not be hoped for from the prayers of legions of Christians throughout the nation? We may read what the prayers of such men have done, in Heb. xi. 33, 34.

The Christian patriot will rejoice in all the good done to his country; though other hands rather than his have been employed in doing it. That man deserves not the name of a patriot, to whom the peace, honour, and prosperity of his country are valuable, only as they may contribute to his own.

As the Christian's patriotism is founded upon the pure principles of religion, he is more desirous of his country's prosperity in true worth and virtue, than in mere power and riches, which are often the dangerous fuel of luxury and pride both to states and individuals. He is no enemy to commerce, for a thousand reasons; but an utter enemy to commercial vices, for reasons infinite and eternal.

In wishing for his country all kinds of temporal blessings, he cannot forget to ask before God for a greater abundance of spiritual mercies. His heart's desire is, that the gospel and religion of Jesus Christ, happily countenanced and established by the laws, may for ever flourish through the land in all its genuine power and purity. Though he is not, and cannot be, an enemy to any man, yet he is a well-principled adversary to all wicked and blasphemous errors and opinions, and to all profligacies of heart and life, which flow from them, and which have over-run the country with guilt and shame.

The Christian carries religion into his patriotism, but not his patriotism into religion. The things of God are too holy and sacred with him either to be mixed with, or truckle to, the little low politics of men. He is the citizen of a better country, and a pilgrim in all others, though a peculiar friend to that in which he was born.

As he can say with Samuel, "God forbid that I should sin against the Lord, in ceasing to pray for his nation;" so he would act upon all occasions, as Samuel did, and endeavour to promote the welfare of his country, by being a good countryman. He will contribute fairly and cheerfully to her burdens, live in all godly quietness and honesty among his people, and pray faithfully and earnestly for the whole public weal as a Christian. Were all the subjects such patriots, the nation, with God's blessing, would have but small reason to be afraid of the most mighty and numerous enemies.

CHAP. II.

THE REAL CHRISTIAN IS CONSCIENTIOUSLY A DUTIFUL SUBJECT TO THE KING AND HIS GOVERNMENT.

He that said, "Fear God," immediately added, as one evident proof of the reality of his godly fear, "honour the king." Being chief magistrate, the king is God's first temporal minister, who is to bear the sword of justice and judgment, "for the punishment of evil-doers, and for the praise of them that do well." The Christian, then, living like a Christian, has no just cause to fear a wound. We are commanded by God to reverence those who act under the king for these ends; how much more then are we bound to regard himself! And if the Christian be concerned for his country, he cannot be unconcerned for his sovereign, who is more deeply interested in its welfare than any other man.

He prays publicly and privately for his king, for his family, and for all that are put in authority under him. It is his wisdom, interest, principle, and duty, thus to pray; because their prosperity is not only connected with his own, but their downfall would occasion the worst of hazard both to his country and his friends. He, who countenances strife and sedition, can no more be a true and benevolent Christian, than a real patriot and subject; for by these, confusion, rebellion, rapine, and murder, may overspread a land, to the destruction of millions, and to the reproachful hinderance of all godliness and piety. I can find examples of pardon for the most atrocious private sins in the Bible; but I do not recollect one instance of God's mercy extending to the public crime of rebellion. Possibly the reason is, because, as in an aggregate, it involves and induces every other wickedness, and is precisely that offence which first ruined the fallen angels, and through them brought all misery and mischief into this present world, as well as occasioned the irreparable sorrows of eternity.

A true Christian values private, public, and religious peace at too high a rate, ever to sacrifice it to the caprices and suspicions of selfish parties and worldly politicians. Corrupt as the world now is, he is thankful for the civil and religious liberty he enjoys, esteeming it a wonderful providence to him as a Briton above almost all other men: and therefore he is not captious and querulous that governors are frail mortals, like himself, and so cannot possibly please every one, nor be absolutely perfect in all things.

In cases of real oppression, the Christian hath a better God to go to than his own passions, or the violences of sinful men, or the evil god of this evil world, who kindles those passions and violences by his own. He doth not rave, but pray; not swear and curse, but bless; not strive to cut throats for his own self-will, but to subdue his own heart first to the will of God, and to soften the hearts of others by temperance of conduct, kindness of reason, and purity of life. "And who is he that will harm you, if ye be followers of that which is good? but if ye suffer for righteousness' sake, happy are ye: and be not afraid of their terror, neither be troubled: but sanctify the Lord God in your hearts.

The word of God is the Christian's rule of politics; not the false, fanciful, ignorant, and impracticable speculations of men, who know not their own hearts, and who, deriving all from their own stock, could not have true wisdom or grace, and consequently could not truly and really govern themselves. Whatever principles, temper, and conduct, cannot be "sanctified by the word of God and prayer," are absolutely unholy to a Christian, and strictly to be avoided.

CHAP. III.

THE REAL CHRISTIAN WILL PUNCTUALLY OBEY THE LAWS OF HIS COUNTRY, IN EVERY THING NOT OPPOSITE TO THE WILL AND WORD OF GOD.

Iniquity, not righteousness, is the object and occasion of law. Without law, so sinful is man, there could be no society, property, liberty or peace. And though real Christians would, as such, do nothing but right, were there no law at all; yet, as the number of these is few, and as the nature of man is frail, and requires order and direction; they cannot better show that they could live without laws, than by the most exact attention never to break them.

There is only one case in which a Christian can withdraw his obedience, namely, when the laws of men are directly opposite to the will, and word, and laws of God. But he ought to be very sure that they are so, and should rarely trust to his own single judgment; lest, instead of suffering for God by resisting men, he only set up his natural self-will against that of others, and so disgrace rather than glorify the cause of goodness and truth.

The laws of his country ought to be very dear, at this time, to a British Christian, because he is most unreservedly protected by them, in his liberty, property, and religion. He can now sit, and kneel too, "under his own vine," none making him afraid.

A professor in religion acts unworthily, when he strives to evade the spirit and intention of the laws, or to profit by secretly breaking them. It is no act of faith, either to smuggle, or to eat, drink, and wear, such things, as the prudence of the state hath forbidden. Persons who can allow themselves in this licentiousness, ought to examine the uprightness and sincerity of their own consciences, and whether they would not yet further contribute to the ruin and confusion of their country, if the punishment and force, meant for ungodly men, did not restrain even them. The Christianity of a smuggler, or shuffler of just duties and taxes, is as much to be doubted, as the honour and justise of a professed highwayman. It may be added, that the man deserves the highest blame, who, professing religion, can venture to do what both religion and reason uniformly condemn. By his profession, he renders himself both a cheat and a hypocrite; whereas, without it, he would have proved himself only a knave. These are hard and bad names; but they cannot be so bad or offensive to us, as the persons, whom they describe, most certainly are in the sight of Him, who hateth iniquity.

CHAP. IV.

THE CHRISTIAN'S DUTY TOWARDS THE CHURCH OF GOD.

The untamed corruptions and natural blindness of the human heart have introduced a great variety of disorders into Christian profession, and occasioned the whole multitude of sects and parties. All believers agree that there is but one spiritual church, the bride of Christ, and the mother of the faithful; but all believers do not act is if they really consented to this truth. What mischiefs hath not the carnal mind produced in all ages! Superstition, bigotry, persecution, pomp, parade, and intolerance, are all of them the proper fruits of an evil heart, uncircumcised, unsubdued, untaught by the Spirit and power of God. They are the evil and detestable weeds in the spiritual field, which do nothing but stifle, overrun, rob, and impoverish the corn.

There are real Christians, perhaps, in every Christian church or society; and it will scarcely be denied, that there are hypocrites, formalists, carnalists, and ungodly men, in all. Let the Christian's conscience be free, for God is his only master in these things; but to whatever particular profession he may belong, let his conversation be edifying to that, and let his charity be shown to all the rest. He should be willing to think the best things of any good men, considering the prejudices of education, the differences of situation, and temper, and the advantages which God hath given to some above others; and especially considering, that real Christians of all denominations are sincere in their views, and under deep concern, for the salvation of their souls. These considerations beget tenderness in every spiritual mind; and the want of this tenderness in any man is no proof that he is not yet carnal. "In things necessary, there should be unity; in things not necessary, liberty; and in all things, charity."

Whatever difference may be in the outward mode or form of real Christians, respecting their worship of God, their life and spirit of worship are one and the same. As believers under the law had the like grace of faith with those under the gospel, though there was a vast disparity in their outward dispensations; so these last have an inward and substantial unity, yea, and uniformity too, one with another. Let each then, in his several vocation, not so much strive for the honour of a party, the love of party being only the love of self; but to glorify Christ with all the gracious power which may be given him. It would be happy indeed for themselves, and honourable for the Christian religion, if all its professors were likeminded in all outward things; but as this is not to be expected, while evil can mingle with good, or darkness with light, they ought, however, to labour hard, on all sides, to keep "the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace."

Let him that useth ceremonies, be candid to him that useth them not; and let him that will not observe times, and days, and rituals, pray for, rather than revile, those who do. The love of Christ preaches this lesson, which the apostle of Christ, almost in so many words, enforces and confirms.

With respect to those of the same denomination, the Christian is called in a more especial manner to show forth his works of faith and labours of love, for their comfort and edification. He will see, that the true distinction of a believer in Jesus, is not to rise over all, and to set up himself as a great somebody, but to be the servant of all, showing all meekness, patience, gentleness, and truth. The infirmities of others he must not magnify, but pity and pray over, knowing that he himself also is in the flesh. The attainments of others he must not envy, because these are the free gift of God, which if a man can allow himself to envy, it is only because he doth not know this gift aright. Strength of spirit inspires another conduct: weakness of the flesh alone conduces to this. In fine, whether he be a public servant or a private member in the visible church, he will pray that he may demean himself according to the settled order, with all gravity and decency, that he may lay no stumbling-block in the way of the weak, and no offence before the eyes of the strong; but that he may be an example of godliness, humility, faith, resignation, and charity, to all about him.

This, surely, is far better than any nickname; for this is the true life and essence of the best name—a Christian.

CHAP. V.

THE RECIPROCAL DUTIES OF MINISTERS AND PEOPLE.

It would be presumption in me to offer to teach those, by whom I would most gladly be taught. My words, therefore, on this head, shall be few; and, I trust, they will not offend.

The faithful minister is the servant, the shepherd or pastor, the overseer, the teacher, the guide, the physician, the helper, and the comforter, of the people committed to his charge. It is not, consequently, a light business for light heads; but an awful and solemn concern, which requires all the grace, wisdom, prudence, learning, courage, faith, patience, and holiness, that are dispersed among the laity at large, to be collected, as much as possible, in one assemblage for one man.

The profit of the flock, not the profit from the flock, is the grand object of a true pastor's concern. It is the character of the hireling, "whose own the sheep are not," to care only for the fleece; and when he gets this, the sheep not being his, (which he proves by his want of care for their souls,) he is nothing better than a robber. The world swarms with these spiritual thieves, who sacrifice all the plunder to their idleness, avarice, pride, or pleasures.

What a character doth the Lord give of one whom he calls a foolish shepherd! "He doth not visit those that are cut off, nor seek the young, nor heal the broken, nor feed that which standeth still. Wo (continues he) to the idol (the false or foolish) shepherd, that leaveth the flock: the sword shall be upon his arm, and upon his right eye; his arm shall be clean dried up, and his right eye shall be utterly darkened." He shall be without strength or understanding. Zech. xi. 16, 17. See also Ezek. xxxiv.

When any congregation of people have the blessing of an able and faithful minister, how ought they to prize so scarce and valuable a jewel! Such a one is worthy of all honour, both for his work's sake and for his own sake; and those Christians are not wise for themselves, who do not all in their power to strengthen his hands, and to assist him in his ministry.

One good way of accomplishing this, is to pray earnestly and constantly in private for the pastor. This would draw down mutual blessings both on speaker and hearers, and much endear them to each other. The reason, probably, of the dissatisfaction and uselessness, which often arise between them, may be owing to the want of mutual prayer, which begets indifference and remissness, as well as discovers too lax a spirit of watchfulness and faith. And, then, on one side, how can the word profit; and, on the other, how can the preacher be approved?

The minister of Christ, who gives up all his time, labour, and expectations, to his holy calling, ought to be comfortably and honourably supported in it. The labourer is worthy of his hire; and the very beasts eat of the corn for which they toil. If the maintenance be voluntary, it ought to be the more liberal for that very reason: if it be settled, it ought to be punctually complied with. It is sad for ministers, whose business is of a higher kind, that the covetousness or dishonesty of their people should make it just and necessary for them to attend, with any anxiety, to lower affairs. Certainly it betrays a want of love to God, when men can suffer his ministers or his poor to starve by their dwellings. How can the pastor give himself up to the word and to prayer, when he is constrained to serve tables? And how can he minister without distraction, when poverty and care haunt and worry him all the day long? As a layman, I may ask these questions, without suspicion of any interested attachment to an order.

It is a melancholy fact, that the worldly pride and laziness of some clergymen have made the laity regardless of their sacred profession, and ready to treat it wrongfully; and that the spiritual ignorance and irreligion of the laity have rendered the situation of the clergy, in some respects, not so honourable or desirable as it should be, for themselves.

However these things may be, the Christian hath one security of hope, which can never fail; "The foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal—'The Lord knoweth them that are his;'" and, "Let every one, that nameth the name of Christ, depart from iniquity." God is our refuge and strength; we have found him abundantly so in trouble: therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea:

"there is a river, the streams whereof shall make glad the city of God."

Outward establishments may vary and fail; but the true temple of God shall endure for ever. Yet while Providence hath ordained these outward establishments, it seems the business and privilege of grace cheerfully to observe and support them.

CHAP. VI.

ON QUARRELS AMONG CHRISTIANS.

It is not grace, which genders strife, but corruption. If, therefore, my brother's corruption be raised against me, shall I oppose my corruption to his, and so enter into wrath; or shall I not rather beg of God, that his grace in me may invite the grace that is in my brother, and so we may settle the whole in peace? If we are real Christians, we must both desire only what is just and right, or we do not live like Christians; and if we both agree in desiring this as the end, how is it that we differ violently about the means? If either have done, or desired, the wrong; the other, who is more under the conduct of grace, should kindly and affectionately represent it; and, if he cannot be heard, should leave the matter to God, without raising the unholy and unhappy tumult of heat and resentment in his own mind. He, that can bear and forbear most, is certainly most the Christian. It is misery and deadness to a real believer to walk and to war after the base fury and discord of the flesh. When he deserves well, and patiently suffers evil, then he is like to his Master, and right in himself.

The apostle directs for believers, not the vengeance of the law, but Christian arbitration. Law is the last refuge, and can only be lawful, when right is not to be had by better means.

If Christians, who have a matter of difference, would graciously agree to meet with each other in prayer, and to pray together kindly for each other before the throne of grace; surely, if they meant the attainment of that right and truth which they prayed for, they might soon find it out, and settle it accordingly. But it is the flesh which comes in, and mars all. One cannot stoop; and the other will not. They are not so wise as Luther's two goats, that met upon a narrow plank over a deep water. They could not go back, and they dared not to fight. At length one of them lay down, while the other went over him; and so peace and safety attended both. Why should not believers try this method. But, alas! while grace remains idle or neuter, the world jeers and triumphs; the devil is busy and excites; good men mourn and lament; the weak are stumbled and turned aside; and a long train of inquietudes and jealousies fill the breasts of those, who humbly hope to dwell with God and with each other throughout eternity. These things ought not so to be.

If my brother be in the wrong, how shall I show myself in the right? By wounding him more than he hath wounded himself? By doing wrong likewise, and rendering evil for evil? No; let me pray, that God would open his eyes, and not shut my heart; that he would give him more grace, and me more patience to meet what is not gracious in him; and, at the utmost, that I may not be a partaker with him of anger, or of those sins which may follow upon it.

Am I in the wrong? What then shall I do? Shall I persist in it, and make myself more in the wrong? This would not be gracious; this would be bringing misery by heaps upon myself. Rather let me go first to God, and then to my brother, acknowledging my fault, or my error, to both. There is no shame in confessing our sins to God, nor any meanness in owning them to men. It is the mark of a noble and generous spirit in common life; and it is the wisdom, as well as the duty and privilege, of a much better life in the Christian.

O thou love of the brethren, whither art thou fled? We profess to believe in "the communion of saints;" but where are the saints, who have this communion? We talk of the unity of God's church with respect to its members; but where are those members, who live in this unity? O shame upon us, that we differ at all, that we differ on trifles, that we love to differ, that we urge and promote differences, and that the healing spirit is not more to be found amongst us! Lord, if thou shouldest differ with us at any time, as we are ready at all times to differ with others; O how should we stand before thee, or what could we answer for ourselves! Give, O give, more of thy grace, that we may be humble in our hearts, just in our desires, mild to others, and deeply submissive to thee!

CHAP. VII.

ON MARRIAGES, AND THE DUTIES OF THAT STATE.

It is the voice of reason and religion, that piety must not be yoked with profaneness, nor the true believer with an infidel. When persons have broken through this rule, they have always done it to their own sad cost; as abundance of examples can testify.

Some have ventured upon this transgression from mere carnal motives, pretending at least to hope, that they might be instruments of bringing the other side unto God. Many instances indeed occur, where both parties have married before they knew the grace of God, and have afterwards been called by it; but the example, perhaps, is not easily to be found, where a believer, acting directly against the rule of God, for temporal ends, hath been blessed with the spiritual advantage of a partner's conversion, but on the contrary, hath been vexed with trouble and mortification to the end of life. It may be expected that God will be faithful to his own word, and that they, who wilfully violate his order, cannot do it with his blessing.

The blessing of God is all in all; and if we have not this, whatever we have beside, it is nothing, or worse than nothing.

When the marriage contract is made graciously, and with grace, there is every reason to hope for success. The less water of earth, and the more wine of heaven, there is at the feast, so much the better.

After marriage, begins a life of care; and consequently the life of faith should be strengthened to bear it. It is a good way for married persons, not only to pray in the family, or privately, but together. Mutual prayers will improve mutual affections, and turn the very commonest blessings of life into spiritual mercies. If Christ dwell indeed in both their hearts, he will not only keep out disgust and variance, but subdue, or remove, the causes of them.

As this state requires much and strong grace to go through it properly towards God; so it demands a larger exercise of charity, forbearance, and kindness, than any other, that no duty fail between the first and dearest of neighbours, the husband and wife. These are more exposed to solicitude, trouble, and a thousand affecting circumstances, than persons in the single state: they are yoked inseparably to meet them, and inseparably must bear them. Now, if grace be not the living and conquering principle, in two persons thus circumstanced, there are so many imperfections in themselves, so many unavoidable mortifications from others, and so many evils on every side, that it will be impossible for them to live, in a due degree, as they ought, above the common disquietudes which overwhelm the world. But grace in the heart will double every temporal mercy, soften every temporal misery, and lead them on, with united hands, towards the kingdom of heaven.

What a comfort is it to true Christians, truly married in grace as well as nature, to reflect, that as they are helpers of each other's faith and joy in this world, so they shall be everlasting friends, in a more exalted way of life, in the kingdom of God. They can remain together in this state for only a very few years at the most; but there, no further separation shall ensue: being as the angels of God, they shall live with him and the whole church of the redeemed, in unspeakable joy for ever. Their present union of heart and grace faintly typifies the union of themselves and of all the faithful with Christ; and when they part here, they do not separate in the best sense, but only pass off, one after the other, to enjoy this union in everlasting perfection.

CHAP. VIII.

ON THE DUTY OF PARENTS.

The general rule of parental duty is, to bring up children "in the nurture and admonition of the Lord." It is true, we cannot give them grace, but we can lead them to the means of grace: we cannot give them a new life, but we can correct the old one: we cannot make them to know Christ savingly, but we can, and we ought, to nurture them diligently in the ways of Christ, and admonish them in the fear of God. Whatever we can do for them, either temporally or spiritually, we are bound to do; and when we have done all, we must leave them to the Lord. We must not repine, if we cannot mend their outward circumstances, for these are in God's disposal: nor should we faithlessly murmur, if all our prayers and diligence be lost for their spiritual good; for, as this is a gracious gift, we only seem to attribute too much to our own powers and affections, when we unduly lament, that our children have not obtained it by us. When we have prayed to God for them, we must trust God with them, and wait the issue in faith and patience. Nature will keep up our common endeavours, and grace will promote a thousand and a thousand prayers. These, when put together, will make up a good stock and foundation, and consequently no bad inheritance for them.

There is a promise of blessing to more than "the third and fourth generation" of a Christian's offspring; which love for them, and faith in the promiser, will ever be prompting him to sue out, that they may obtain. I had rather be a good man's child, covered by his prayers, than the son of the first emperor in the world, undevoted and unblest.

Some that never had children, and others that would be wiser than Solomon, or rather than God's word itself, have written books to show that chastisements should be utterly excluded from education. Doubtless, it requires prudence and temper to chastise properly, and it ought to be done with a secret looking to God for a blessing, as well as on any other duty; but those who have either taken up false principles of human nature, or have had but very little experience of it, who presume that it will do very well without the fear of punishment, or that it can be reasoned into all the irksome duties and toils of life. Such methods, we know, will not restrain even grown persons, who certainly can reason, and receive reason, better than children. Corruption is to be checked by all means; and if the gentler kind fail of effect, as they will in the far greater part of instances, the more severe must be used, but always without passion, and in moderation. It should be understood to be a parent's sad duty, which therefore can give him no pleasure, but on the contrary, pain and mortification. When it is thus performed, it will not easily be abused: when otherwise, it is not really performed at all. The parent's ill conduct deserves a severer chastisement from God, than any that can be due to the misdemeanor of a child.

CHAP. IX.

ON THE DUTY OF CHILDREN.

These are, to "obey their parents in the Lord, for this is right." Till children have learned obedience, they have properly learned nothing, and will probably be fit for nothing.

As they owe to their parents, under God, their maintenance, protection, introduction to the duties of life, and their very life itself; God hath laid it upon them, as what is necessary in the order of his providence, to honour and respect their parents. Children, who transgress this order, rebel against God. And it hath been matter of great concern to many gracious persons, after they have been brought to a true sense of things, that they have failed particularly in this just and important duty.

Their obedience is to be in the Lord, and for the Lord's sake. This is well pleasing to God, and profitable for themselves. The only exemption is, if parents are so ungracious and unjust, as to insist upon anything which God forbids, or to oppose anything which God commands. Here the most dutiful children must disobey, and can plead God's own absolution.

There is one great circumstance in life, which often strains the bond of filial duty. This is, marriage. Children ought if possible, to engage in this state with the full consent and blessing of their parents. On the other hand, parents should never constrain, and not always restrain, the affections of their children.

The two trying cases are property and religion.

As to the former; the discretion of parents is usually of great importance. Children are not to follow their passions into ruin; nor is it the duty of their parents to consent to it. On the other hand, mere lucre should not guide the parent's eye or mind, but the nobler considerations of character, worth, and piety. Where these are wanting, all the wealth in the world is nothing but a gilded curse.

As to religion, the unalterable rule for Christians is, to marry in the Lord. If a parent direct otherwise, the command of God must be first regarded; and, though he may have a right to put a negative perhaps upon almost any match, he cannot have a right to command one, which is contrary to the express word of God. He likewise hath not a right to sacrifice his child's natural affections in any marriage, even where no objection can be made upon a religious account; because the peace and comfort of natural life are concerned, and because the child must be the sufferer here, and be exposed in the event to some dangerous temptations. On the other hand, (to put the last difficult case,) where the child hath placed affections in a manner, that religion and all other circumstances will justify, but, because of religion, the parent withholds consent; it will be the best to try all means to gain that consent, to wait as long as possible, and with as much patience as possible, for it, above all to supplicate the Father of mercies to dispose the hearts of the parties concerned aright, and not at last to venture on an act of such apparent disobedience, but for fear of greater evils than what may arise from the unreasonable obstinacy, perverseness, or irreligion of the parent. The case is so nice, and may so vary in its circumstances, that the wisdom, uprightness, grace, and impartiality of the ablest Christian friends should be well consulted upon the occasion.

CHAP. X.

ON THE DUTY OF CHRISTIAN MASTERS.

It is far more difficult rightly to command, than dutifully to obey. To be a master, and a Christian at the same time, in the direction of worldly affairs, requires more grace than men usually imagine. The master may soon be acted, and people are commonly very fond of acting this, from the lust of power which rages in corrupted nature: but to command, under a sense of God's authority, the things which are just and equal, and not to be lifted up with the pride and passion of pre-eminence; this is to give a proof, that the heart indeed lives as in God's presence, and that worldly superiority, which generally begets insolence, can be maintained with true meekness and humility. But how can he, whom grace hath not made master of his own corruptions, expect obedience from others with all readiness and sincerity?

As in a higher case, so in this it may be asked of every Christian master, Who maketh thee to differ from another? Surely, God's providence never raised men into power, that they might show their pride only; but to do good, and to carry on, as far as their power may extend, the welfare of society. If any people act otherwise, they must one day be deeply convinced, that all the little distinctions of men have no natural reality in them, and that there is one common Master in heaven, with whom there is no such thing as respect of persons.

Many professing masters are exceedingly deficient in one great duty to their servants. They give them perhaps plenty of bread, and furnish them well in earthly things; but they neglect to hold out the best of all subsistence, the bread of life, to their souls. The omission of family worship cannot be excused on any account. This (as one said) like the hem to a garment, keeps all things together, and prevents other duties and affairs from ravelling out. Servants cannot have grace indeed, but by God's mercy; but they can easily see if their masters do not live graciously, and will readily notice it too; nay, sometimes make from their failures an apology, though a bad apology, for themselves. If masters would live and demean themselves like Christians indeed, and walk in the fear of God, their servants would mend their manners, if not their hearts, and we should have fewer complaints than we have, to the disgrace of religion and the discomfort of our lives.

CHAP. XI.

ON THE DUTY OF CHRISTIAN SERVANTS.

A professing servant should get by heart the following rule of the apostle, and in all his business keep it in mind: "Servants, be obedient to them that are your masters according to the flesh, with fear and trembling, in singleness of your heart, as unto Christ: not with eye-service, as men-pleasers, but as the servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart; with good-will doing service, as to the Lord, and not to men."

Our proud hearts do not naturally love obedience. We would all be masters, and set up for ourselves; and if God suffered this, corrupt as we now are, we should all soon be undone.

Is the master a man of the world? The Christian servant's light should so shine before him, that, though he may hate him for his religion, he may respect him for his diligence, dutifulness, uprightness, and truth. Some masters have been won to God by the gracious and upright conduct and conversation of their servants; and how do those servants live who say, that they shall not be so blessed? If the master be harsh, it is not likely that a servant's sauciness should reclaim his mind, or do good to himself, or bring honour to the cause of God. Let all be done, which can be done, without murmurings and disputings; and, if there be no other remedy, it is better to part, than to commit the sins of impertinence, or to live in the sins of anger and of strife.

Is the master a real Christian? The faithful servant will render him double honour, and rejoice to obey him on a double account: both because Providence hath made such a one his master, and grace his brother and friend. If he take any unhandsome liberties on that account, forgetting his own place and duty, he breaks the order and disposal of God, and lays for his own mind a foundation of much uneasiness. It is a sad mistake of their duty, when truly serious servants imagine, that by the grace of God they are to take up a new sort of natural boldness, and that, instead of putting on the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, they have from grace a privilege to be insolent, froward, rough, and disobedient. What a wretched thing is it to be said in the world, as it too often is, "I had rather have any kind of servants, than professors of religion, because they are always lazy or unruly." Or, "I had rather have any one for my master or mistress, than those who talk about godliness; they are always so gloomy, humoursome, and perverse: in their places of worship they seem saints; but at home, they are wolves, and bears, and very devils."—Oh this is a sad light indeed before men; or rather an unshining taper, that reeks only in a smoke and a stink! The laws of this country, above all others, are so much in favour of servants and the poor, that the Christian servant is obliged, in gratitude both to God and man, to conduct himself with the more zeal in his service to both. Servants are here considered by the laws as equally free in person with their masters, and are not to be defrauded or abused. How then should the Christian bless God that he hath placed him in such a country as this, where the gospel is freely preached and freely heard, and where he can enjoy his conscience with comfort and liberty! If he hath more work than his master (though that is not always the case,) he hath less care, fewer distractions, and is more out of the way of many deceitful and dangerous temptations.

CHAP. XII.

ON THE CHRISTIAN'S DUTY IN HIS CALLING.

In the conduct of all things, whether spiritual or temporal a Christian is called, not unto uncleanness, but unto holiness, and to be blameless and harmless, the son of God without rebuke, in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation. The methods and practices of evil men are to be no rule with him; but his outward life and conduct should be a luminous example unto them. He should remember, that though they cannot see or know his inward life or principle of action, yet they are very able judges of the action itself, and can easily discern whether his temper, honesty, sincerity, goodness, and charity, be such as become his profession.

The Christian's station, therefore, in this life, should be maintained for his Master's glory; for that is his chief business, not only in the church, but in the shop, the field, the house, the closet, and in all he hath and doth in the world; for which end grace must come into and superintend the whole. Be he rich or poor, high or low, if he live without grace in common life, he lives poorly to God, if at all, in spirituals, and (to say the best) at a very cold and uncomfortable rate within himself. For a Christian to think of getting satisfaction or happiness out of the creatures without God's blessing, argues a great want of faith and experience; and he cannot have this blessing, unless he carry grace with him into his circumstances, and subject his own will, his vocation, his industry, and all his carnal affairs and affections, to God's glory.

A Christian is as much a man of grace at the market or in the shop, as in the church or the closet. He deals fairly and conscientiously, neither defrauding in the nature, measure, or weight, of commodities, nor taking base advantages of the ignorance of others. The money gotten by fraud, hath a curse, that will either bring torment with it, or melt itself away. There is a maxim, "Buy cheap, and sell dear." And to carry this maxim on, men will wrongly undervalue and discommend, saying, It is naught, naught, in order to defraud the seller of the just worth; and they will overprize, and put into a false light by a thousand false words, what they have to part with, merely to take in the buyer. Thus shop lies, as well as custom-house oaths, are become proverbial, and therefore trivial, even with some, who should treat all such abominable practices with detestation. But how can he be thought an upright man with God, or in the church, who can pick another's pocket by words which he knows to be deceitful and unjust, in the poor concerns of this world?

The putting double prices upon goods is also dishonourble, and unworthy of a Christian. If a man give the higher price for that, which the seller can and will afford at the lower: the seller is a thief and a cheat, for all the money in the difference. The law of man indeed will not lay hold of him; but he should ask himself, What is that gain worth, which hath the curse of God upon it? He may be sure it hath not his blessing, because it is unclean and unjust. For aught he knows, it may bring a curse upon all his fair profits, and lay the ground of much future unhappiness if not of ruin. Would he do such things, if he were dying? How then can he dare to attempt them, when he knows not but he may die in the doing them? It is a laudable custom, which some worthy persons have set up, to put one fair sum upon their goods, and to take no other.

With respect to commodities of fluctuating value, the market must be the standard of demand; it being understood, that the market is neither enhanced nor depressed by any known artifice or design.

In all cases of traffic and business, every man oweth justice to himself and justice to others: and it is his duty to wrong neither. A Christian must be an honest man, and will not wilfully, knowingly, and perseveringly do wrong: and therefore, if any person will thus do, and continue to do wrong, he cannot deserve the name of an honest man, and much less that of a Christian. The counsels of the wicked only are deceit.

Whenever doubts arise upon any subject of this kind, let the Christian do as the Psalmist did, "set the Lord always before him." If a man walk closely in the fear of God, and mark his Saviour for his example, he will very rarely through ignorance be guilty of injustice to man.

I believe, further, that a Christian is conscientiously, though not legally bound, to supply all deficiences in former failures, whenever Providence may afford him the power. The Christian seems a very strange one to me, who needs the chain of statutes to bind him to duty; and, therefore, though it may be his case, and the case of many an honest man, to become a bankrupt, but certainly a credit to no man, yet, when his certificate is granted, and he is thereby become clear of the compulsive force of the laws; how can he delay with a clear conscience, to make good to the utmost any just losses, which others have sustained by him, as soon afterwards as God shall give him the ability? I have heard of some, and these too were mere men of the world, who, recovering from ruin, had the magnanimity and good sense (for indeed it is both when understood) to discharge all remainders to creditors, and, with those remainders, the interest accumulated upon them. And shall one, who calls himself a believer in Jesus, and a child of God, neglect, in a similar case, to do both himself and his Christian profession so beautiful an honour, only by doing strict justice to those unfortunate sufferers, who by their confidence in his integrity, have every sort of claim to expect it of him?—I should doubt the faith of the professor, who could hesitate a moment to do or to own so plain a duty.

There are also some professions, which no real Christian can dare to follow. It is not necessary to name them, because they fall under the stroke of one general rule, which every believer in Christ must approve. The trade, the calling, or the gain, which cannot be prayed over, be lived upon in faith, and carried on with thanksgiving, is, like Achan's golden wedge and Babylonish garment, a curse to the owner, and an abomination to the Lord. On the other hand, a small thing, which the righteous hath, is better than great riches of many wicked; and he is much safer, and happier too, who with grace in his heart hath no money in his purse, than he, who, with thousands of gold and silver, hath the wrath of God along with them.

It is the privilege and duty of a Christian to commit all his present concerns to the favour and blessing of God. He that prays, as well as works, loses no time by his prayers. He that works, but doth not pray, may often expect to labour in vain, as well as in sin, and to bring his affairs to no good end. "Duty hath much present comfort, and no curse in it;" which consideration alone is worth all the care of a Christian.

CHAP. XIII.

DUTIES ARE NOT TO BE MEASURED BY SUCCESS, BUT BY THE WORD OF GOD ONLY.

We have much self-love and self-righteousness in our fallen nature, which cause us to expect success from our spiritual and temporal duties, and to be mortified when we do not find it. Whereas if our minds were perfectly given to the will of God, or in this frail state could be so given; that will would be perfectly our own.

Let not the Christian grieve without hope, if, after all his attention to duty in his common concerns, they may not seem to prosper in his hands; for, however they seem, they do prosper for his real good, and especially if his heart and soul are drawn by any disappointments the closer to God. "God's promises are not to be measured by his providences, but his providences by his promises." The Christian, therefore, must keep in the straight path of duty, and leave it to God to appear faithful in the end, who can at no time be otherwise.

In religious duties, such as prayer and exhortation to his family, the Christian may likewise not always be attended with success; but is he, or can he dare, to stop their performance upon that account? He should remember what God hath appointed him, and he should pray to do it; but, as to the event, this doth not belong to him. It is God's concern entirely. He may indeed rejoice, when he seeth the hand of God; but he must trust and be doing, when he seeth it not. All will be well with him; and that surely is sufficient for him.

It hath been a sore trial to many faithful ministers, when they have worked hard in God's vineyard, and have not sped. But it is scarcely necessary to observe to these, that they shall be blessed in their labour, if not from it. They feel the comfort of God's promise and presence, or they would go on more heavily still. It is an old complaint, "I have stretched forth my hands all the day to a rebellious and gainsaying people." So Noah was a preacher of righteousness for 120 years, while the ark was in building; but it doth not appear, that he wrought upon one soul. He was not, however, the less blessed of God. Our Lord's apostles converted more than himself abundantly; and probably for this reason, that his faithful ministers should not afterwards be too much discouraged, when they see not an immediate fruit of their labours.

CHAP. XIV.

THE DEPORTMENT OF A CHRISTIAN TO OTHERS.

In the first place, as much as lieth in him, the Christian will, if possible, live in peace with all men. That blessed Dove, the Holy Spirit, harboureth not with contention and strife, but loveth peace, concord, and unity, yea, and unanimity too. It is by him that men are of one mind in their own house, and in the house of God.

As the Christian is no brawler; so, in his habit of life, he cannot be an arrogant, uplifted, conceited, and presuming person; because such a one, in this arrogant world, cannot possibly be free from brawling.

Not being a coxscomb of the world, the Christian hath nothing to plume himself upon for the admiration of others. He knows that the applause of men will not follow the true servant of Christ, and that, if it did, it is too dangerous a thing for him to meddle with, whose inward selfishness costs him a constant hard labour to subdue it.

He values men, and desires to value them more, as God values them. The family of the faithful are his relations for eternity; and he will spiritually esteem these above all other men. He is to live with them in glory. "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples (saith Christ) if ye have love one towards another."

His natural love to his natural friends is not extinguished by the love of God, but elevated, purified, and increased. He sees more of the real worth of their souls, and is more anxious accordingly for their best interest and immortal welfare. Those among them, who have obtained like mercy with himself, are more especially endeared. Those who want this mercy, have his fervent prayers and compassion, because they want it. When he cannot love them for Christ's sake, he will not cease to love them for their own.

Railing and evil-speaking, he will cordially detest. The good he knows of others, he will rejoice to mention; and the harm (unless for the prevention of further harm) he will study to conceal. It is a good rule, never to speak of men's faults to others, till we have first and faithfully spoken of them to the offenders themselves. This would prevent a world of mischief and slander, and perhaps save many from persisting in sin.

He will esteem grace, and even common virtues and worth of character, above all manner of riches. A rich wicked man is, in a Christian's eye, somewhat like a body bloated with unwholesome fat and disease; not very pleasant to look upon, but much to be pitied and deplored. Oh what an evil is fulness of bread, without emptiness of self, and fulness of grace! The Christian will behave to such with the decency that becomes himself, and with the respect due to their station: at the same time, he cannot be a partaker of their sins; nor ought he to miss the opportunity, if Providence give it him, to set before them better riches than they now enjoy, even God's "durable riches and righteousness." Though few of this sort do "put their necks to the work of the Lord," (Neh. iii. 5.) or shall be saved, and it is only possible with God to save any of them; yet the Christian will be more tender and compassionate to them upon this very account. If they are to have their whole "portion in this life," should not the anger, that may be felt from their insolence and pride, be turned into pity and prayer; since their riches will soon be corrupted, and not an atom of their pomp can follow them?

With regard to the poor, the Christian cannot, as a Christian, be wanting in commiseration or relief, so far as it lies in his power. The affliction of their circumstances will reach his heart most, when his hand can do least to abate it. No real Christian can despise the poor. He that doeth this, is under a worse poverty than theirs. "God hath chosen the poor of this world to be rich in faith, and heirs of his kingdom:" how then can those among the poor, who are thus blessed, receive contempt from any of God's children? Or how can the poor at large be treated with insolence and cruelty, when the Lord hath declared, that "he will avenge their cause?" If a poor man be wicked, he is doubly entitled to pity; because he hath nothing in this world, and worse than nothing to expect in the world to come. If a poor man be gracious, he is doubly an object of love, because he is now under many trials in the flesh, which the wealthy do not feel, and yet is dear to God, as his own blessed child, and future inheritor of his glory.

To men of every rank and station, the Christian will endeavour to render their due; "Custom to whom custom, fear to whom fear, honour to whom honour." Let his own situation in this world be what it may, he is the only gentleman in heart, whatever others may seem to be in outward grimace and manners. "He is gentle, showing all kindness to all men." This is the golden polish; and, without this, the rest is nothing but daubing or tinsel.

It will appear from hence, that the Christian school teacheth the most punctual good manners of any in the world. It inculcates the laws of the purest honour and integrity, and enforces every moral obligation, not by a harsh and unpleasant constraint, but by the far more prevailing and happy impressions of duty and love. It not only insists upon a decent outside, but leads to the correction of the heart, and to the strictest adjustment of all things into a right order within. No lax morals, no licentious conduct, no ill words, no indecent looks, no, nor yet one evil thought, are tolerated for a moment to the disciple of Jesus Christ. He would be, if he could, and he grieves because he cannot be, in this life, all holiness and perfection. Thus, though no part or cause of his final salvation depends upon what is done by him, or what is done in him; yet he desires to "abound in all the fruits of faith, which are by Christ Jesus, to the praise and glory of God." And if these things be so, how can any presume to say, "That the doctrines of grace are pregnant with immorality?"

CHAP. XV.

THE CHRISTIAN'S CONDUCT TO THE TEMPTED.

The members of the same body have a natural care and sympathy for each other; and so have the members of the church of Christ, which is his spiritual body. They cannot know of the sorrow and trials of a brother's soul, without some concern of spirit, or feeling of compassion.

Godly conference and discourse are often rendered the means of comfort and relief. The Lord indeed usually works in this way, that his people may see it to be their greater privilege and duty thus to help each other's faith, and so he joint partakers of their joy. This mutual regard and assistance tend also to unite the flock of Christ, and to make them more and more dear to each other. For want of this, many congregations are like scattered sheep, unaffectionate, disregarding, and careless of their brethren's true happiness and prosperity.

Whatever be the trial or the disorder, the word and promises of God are the appointed help and remedy, which must chiefly be used and applied. If God's word cannot relieve the troubled mind, vain indeed must be the word of man. But experience shows that this word, through the aid of divine grace, hath been blessed to the souls of his distressed people, when all other helps have failed.

And as the blessing must descend from above, so all discourses, if not begun, should at least be ended in prayer. Very often, in the prayer, the trouble shall be lightened, which the previous discourse did not seem in the least to remove.

There is not a possible case of distress into which a believer may fall, but there is something in the holy Scripture which can meet it. It is the wisdom, then, of a gracious person, in all conferences with the afflicted, to have a store of suitable passages with him, or in his mind, that out of it he may be able to draw what may tend, under God's blessing, to remove or to lessen the trial.

Where the body as well as the soul is affected, proper remedies must be administered to both, and especially to the latter, that it may be encouraged to support the frailer and the weaker part. Generally in cases of sickness, the mind above all things must be attended to; for if that be well, it will not only enable the person to bear the other better, but it will have this noble cordial within, that "all shall be well at the last." It is an abominable wickedness in some physicians, that they order all religious discourse out of the chambers of the sick and the dying, lest it should lower the spirits (as they think) and perplex the mind. Are the dying, then, to be deceived into death, if they are ignorant of God and salvation? Or, if they know God, are they to have no comfort of his word, when they have most occasion for it? It is equally wicked to flatter with life, when death itself is at the very door. I remember a man, who seemed to have some serious impressions from religious discourse, under a near prospect of dying; but, when a physician had assured him of his recovery, he threw away all concerns for heaven, received with disgust any mention of the state of his soul, and was found with cards and idle company in the very evening of that night in which he fell speechless and died. Did not such a physician contribute what he could to the murder of a soul? And is not this the worst, because the most lasting cruelty?

Certainly, religious discourses at such seasons should not be thrust in at random, but by discreet persons, or (if they can be had) by pious ministers, who will neither be too long at one time in their attentions, nor offer what may be unsuitable or impertinent.

When the soul is relieved and consoled, every one knows how much it will sometimes contribute to the health of the body. But, if it be the will of God to remove the party from this world, surely, in the acts of faith and of the comforts which faith brings, it is the more meet to ascend up to another. Why should a Christian go off thoughtless and sad to celebrate the marriage-supper in heaven?

All trials and troubles are meant to take out the dross from the Christian. By grace, they have this effect, more or less throughout his life; and all his distresses likewise are exactly proportioned to his need of them. The last refinement is in death, in which he is perfectly cleansed and purified from every corruption, and removed to enjoy that pure state, which is equally void of sorrow and sin to all eternity.

CHAP. XVI.

THE CHRISTIAN'S CONDUCT TO OLD AGE.

It is the Lord's express command, "Thou shalt rise up before the hoary head, and honour the face of the old man, and fear thy God." The experience and gravity, the judgment and wisdom, frequently found in old age, demand veneration; and even where these are in some measure wanting, the infirmities and inquietudes of that state call upon people of younger years to abound in compassion towards them.

I know not how it may be with others; but for myself I ever loved the company and conversation of the ancient, preferably to the gay humours of the young, and have been exceedingly delighted at their explanations and informations of circumstances and events, which no books could possibly have given me.

To this day, I cannot meet an aged person, especially if he be infirm, without feeling some kind emotions of heart towards him; and these are always heightened by an anxious pity, if it appear that he hath not yet felt any true concern for himself. All this may be mere nature, it is true; but, however, I do not wish to suppress it.

The gray hairs of the aged, those "church-yard flowers," (as one calls them,) call aloud upon them. and through them to all men, "Prepare to meet your God." They are remembrancers, to the eye and to the heart, of death at hand, and of eternity to come.

But the ancient Christian is especially to be considered as a venerable pile, respecting his soul, built up in a long course of grace for the habitation of God himself. The fathers in Christ having "known Him who is from the beginning," are to be revered, consulted, and (if need be) defended by the younger brethren upon all occasions.

The apostle, encouraging this tribute of respect to the aged, exhorts, "Rebuke not an elder, but entreat him as a father," even when his conduct should be such as is not to be approved. If these have tried grace and long experience, they have also increasing natural weakness and numberless infirmities, by which, it will be no wonder, if in some instances they should be overborne. Could a young man, with a very large portion of grace, change places with them for a day, it is to be doubted whether he would manage the case any better; though it is not to be doubted, that this experience would teach him extraordinary commiseration in future.

CHAP. XVII.

THE CHRISTIAN'S CONDUCT TO YOUTH.

A heathen could say, "that the greatest respect is due unto children." He meant, that nothing should pass before their sight, which might either lead them to vices, or encourage vices in them.

There is no need of gloom in any of the things of God. True seriousness wants it not, and is very foreign to it in its nature. It is particularly unnecessary to indulge this sullen and morose humour of the natural heart (for it is seldom little better) before youth or children. There is an easy cheerfulness and benevolence, remote from all silly levity, and highly consistent with grace and the best good sense, which ought to reside in a Christian's heart, and which he might exhibit particularly upon occasion to younger persons. These are to be drawn by the chords of a man, that is, with natural affections; and though it is not in man's power to render them truly religious, yet surely religion ought not to appear before them, or any body else, as a poor, miserable, dreadful thing, like a ghost, to frighten them away from her. They should see, as well as hear, by the example of real Christians, "that the ways of religion (or true wisdom, which is the same thing) are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace." Sourness may indeed be found very plentifully in nature; but there is not one single particle of it in all the being or exercise of grace. On the contrary, its tendency is to correct the natural moroseness of the human heart.

The psalmist gives this mild and gentle invitation: "Come, ye children, hearken unto me: I will teach you the fear of the Lord." But wherefore? That they might see good, and partake of the blessings which he immediately sets before them.

Our Lord's benevolence to children is above all comment. He gave an example of good-will and tenderness, in this respect, which not the greatest and wisest of his disciples can think himself too wise or too great to follow.

The sincerest faithfulness of their souls is consistent with the greatest good-nature of their persons; nay, we cannot be truly good-natured to them, unless we are faithful. Instruction, even in the best things, may be set before them in an inviting form, without the least deviation from the soundness of truth; and, by a little gracious skill, they may, perhaps, be led to perceive, how deep an interest and concern they have in them. If God is pleased to second the instruction, by giving them a true sight of themselves, it is a known case, that they will love and honour those, who gave the instruction, as long as they live. And if God doth not bless it to the desired end, yet the piety and well-meant kindness of the instructor will not fail of their approbation and respect; for none can choose but love those, who show any real or disinterested regard for themselves. Besides, who can tell, that the seed now sown in early age, though it seem buried and forgotten for many years, may not, in the secret workings of God, be brought forward into life at some future time? There are many instances of persons, who have been blessed by instructions received in younger days, and who appeared to have forgotten God, their instructors, themselves, and everything else that was good, for a very long portion of their life, and yet afterwards have been blessed and made happy, through grace, in the very recollection of those things, which, "like bread upon the waters," seemed to have been lost, but which were found, and found with great advantage, after many days.

Sin may be checked, nay punished, and yet the sinner be loved. The sinner shall love in return, when he perceives that love occasioned the correction, or rather, that there would have been no correction but from love. It is the same in a higher case: "Whom the Lord loveth, he chasteneth:" And he will not do this, but for those who are truly his sons.

It is very much their own fault, if there be not great weight in the conduct of parents and friends with young persons and children. These, it should be remembered, hear their words, but they watch their example. If the doctrine and life be the same thing, they will regard the former for the sake of the latter, with reverence; if the preceptor divide them, it is usual for them to despise both, and to treat him with censure, or derision, into the bargain.

CHAP. XVIII.

ON THE DISPOSAL OF PROPERTY.

Some people delay the testamentary disposal of their effects, till the time of sickness or the prospect of death; when the mind, if capable of reflection, which is not always the case, should surely be engaged altogether in eternal affairs; and therefore, for this and other reasons, they are either able to make none at all, or none with suitable judgment and deliberation. The folly and cruelty of this conduct, as it respects either a man's friends or himself, cannot escape the censure of heaven and earth. "Set thine house in order," is a divine command, in the preparation for eternity; and the laws of all countries solemnly respect this last instance of attention to social duties.

There are those who make arbitrary, or capricious, bestowments, slighting the rules of God's word, the proportional claims of nature, and those reasonable human prescriptions which are founded upon them, and which none but very strong causes, such as the wickedness, idiotcy, or certain misapplication of the parties expectant, can properly set aside. Such seem to forget, that being only stewards, and not absolute proprietors, they are as accountable for the disposal of their temporal goods, as for the acquisition of them.

Others are exceedingly liberal in bequests to public or private charities, who would spare little or nothing during their own life, or, in other words, from themselves. These pompous bestowments are but too often "the painted sepulchres of alms," raised up by covetousness for a worthless glory. And, if there be living and lawful heirs, or unexceptionable kindred, the whole is done at their expense, not the testator's, who has presumed to misapply what he could no longer grasp, and what, therefore, could be no longer his own, and to rob his friends for the sound of a name, which, in such a case, had been less disgraced, if entirely forgotten.

If a Christian should "set the Lord always before him," he is especially called to recollect his presence in a business, where he may be said to be acting after his death, and to be affecting very materially the actions and interests of others. When his will is in force, he himself is at the bar of God, accounting for its principle and effects. He should therefore renounce all humours, and, in the most solemn frame of a religious mind, ask himself, "Suppose I were standing before the Divine Majesty, would I devise what he committed to my charge, exactly as I have now devised it?" The "answer of a good conscience," and of a "sound mind," will generally exclude all foolish or perverse partialities, and determine what is honourable for the Christian, and right for those he leaves behind him.

Where there are no proper relations, or just claimants, people, at least pious people, may equitably dispose of their worldly matters with no other restraints but those of reason and religion. It would not be unseemly for persons in such circumstances to bequeath their property, either to pious friends, who may receive or do good with it, or to pious institutions, where it will be done; guarding, however, against idle ostentation, or the vanity of earthly fame. It would be poor, in a good man's view, to have this for his motive or reward. The distinguished Christian, whose honourable name is remembered near the front of these papers, and shall be remembered for ever in a way very superior to the words or memory of man, was a signal example of the widest benevolence, united, wherever the case would admit of it, with the closest and most humble concealment. Large sums of money were distributed, through various channels, to thousands of distressed persons, who never knew, and perhaps never heard of, the principal instrument of their relief. He seemed to have a just fear, if not abhorrence, of that dangerous applause, which all sorts of people are ready enough to bestow on persons of this happy character, whether or not they are solicitous to follow their example. It was God who gave him the affluent ability; and he conferred a greater gift, when he gave him the heart to employ that ability so entirely to the divine glory, and so diffusively to the good of men. It is possible indeed but for very few to extend themselves according to his measure; but this is encouraging to every one, who hath first a willing mind, that the performance "is accepted according to what a man hath, and not according to what he hath not;" and therefore it may not be improper, according to this rule, and their own measure, to remind professors of the true religion, that their Lord himself hath said, "Go, and do likewise."

CHAP. XIX.

ON THE DEATH OF RELATIVES AND FRIENDS.

It was the saying of a man, who had lost all his children and all his subsistence, and who found not one true friend to offer him the least real comfort, "Naked came I into the world, and naked shall I go out: the Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord."

This is the resignation of a believer. He refers everything to the will of God; and, having nothing of his own but sin, and nothing to lose by death but sin; all he hath, being by bounty and favour, should be freely offered up to the disposal of the giver. This consideration indeed, if by itself and alone, would not satisfy him; but there is another which ought, and, being set home upon his heart by grace, most certainly will: "All providences, whether pleasant or trying, shall work together for good to them that love and fear God." When God loves, and loves for the best end; and when God contrives, and contrives only the best means; why is the mind of any Christian overcharged with disquietude and lamentation, with murmuring or sorrow? Doth he not as much as say by it, "Father, not thy will, but my own, be done!"

"I have lost a friend," says some anxious mind. But who took that friend? Was it not the God who gave him? And hath he taken more than his own? And, if a pious friend, hath he not removed him to the best advantage? And is it not thy great privilege, after the enjoyment of such a one in this deplorable world, to live and be with him again, not here, but in a better? Besides, Christian, thou hast neither lost thy God, nor thy friend; no, nor yet will they ever lose thee. Thy, friend, at the utmost, is but surrendered, not sunk; lent, not lost, and shall be found again with advantage. Pray then against the over-strong impressions of carnal sense; for all this is the striving of animal life, of mere flesh and blood, against God; and desire thou to find thy will in the Divine will alone. Be silent when it strikes, contented when it denies, thankful when it gives, resigned when it takes away. It is not the gold in the furnace which bubbles and froths upwards, but the dross and the scum.

"I have lost a child," says another: but ask thou—who hath found him? Is it not that gracious Redeemer, who called little children unto himself when upon earth, and who gave them the highest of benedictions? Hath not this child escaped a thousand evils, and miseries, and sins, which it must have undergone or committed, had it lived longer among the miserable sinners of this world? And doth it not enjoy unutterable happiness with thine own best friend, with whom also thou thyself hopest to live for ever? And is it worthy of thy love to thy child, thus excessively to bemoan its deliverance from grief, and its possession of peace? Or, rather, is it not the selfish working of thine own too much impassioned heart, which lamenteth its own loss in the flesh, or seeketh its own pleasure more than thy child's happiness, or its own will more than God's? I believe, if thou examinest closely, thou wilt find something of this within thee; but, however, be it what it may, it ought not to be there. It is no fruit of faith; and it will render no profit or comfort to thy soul.

"I have lost a wife or a husband, the very desire of mine eyes, the outward comfort of my life, and my greatest outward support." I would not say, Do not feel any grief, but do not grieve beyond measure. When Lazarus died, even Jesus wept. Nature may suffer for its own losses; it may suffer for the losses of others; and in many cases it is decent to feel, and charitable to sympathize; but nature, if alone, is impatient and blind, especially in spiritual things, and makes all its reckonings from the outward senses. To say to nature, that grace gains where she loses, will never comfort her; and to say to persons, who are at any time greatly under the affections of nature, or more under her impressions than under those of grace, that their souls may profit where their bodies have lost, will be dull news, which then at least can scarcely find a hearing. The appeal, then, must be to grace itself; and nature, if not quite shut out, must at least stand nearer the door. As grace becomes strengthened and quickened, nature will be subdued and quieted, from her tumult and sorrow. And, therefore, under these trials it is, that it may chiefly be seen in believers, how strong or weak their faith is in the Lord. I knew a pious and excellent woman, now with God, who, with as much natural tenderness of heart as ever mortal creature had, and with as much affection for her husband as perhaps it is possible for human nature to feel for one every way worthy of her, received the account of his sickness and death without a murmur, or a groan, and with only some silent tears, which showed the greatness of her natural loss, the sense of her partner's gain, and the strong and lively hope which filled her soul, of living with him again in a blissful eternity. I saw this amiable and beautiful example of the power of grace, and was convinced by it, how much above all sickness and feebleness of nature it can rise, and triumph, and glorify God. Christian, couldest thou have seen this gracious instance as I saw it, it would have taught thee upon fact, how to mourn and bewail the same kind of loss, and how to live upon God; not without a feeling, for that is brutal insensibility, but without being stunned or stupified in the use of grace by the feelings of nature.

But, excellent as this example is, thou and I have a more sure word of testimony to trust in, that we may get the better of our natural losses and sorrows. God, who gathereth all the fathers, will gather us ere long to the fathers in his glory. If our relatives, our dearest relatives, be dead as to this world, they now thank God that they are so; and we may be reminded of the promise of our gracious Saviour, which assures us, that, respecting our souls, and the souls of all the faithful, they never shall, they never can, so much as "see, or taste of death."

Why then should we sorrow as those who have no hope? We ought to be ashamed of our selfish grief, and to beseech of God that he would at least turn it into tranquil resignation, if not into praises and joy. God hath wonderfully supported his people in all their extremities; and, if thou art one of them, why not thee? The youngest child may claim his father's bounty and blessing, though he may not enjoy so large a portion as the first-born. Trust then in the Lord; and entreat him to still in thy heart all the passionate and perplexing tempests of disordered nature.

The intended effect of these solemn dispensations to thyself is, to wean thee from time, and to set thy face towards heaven. There thou hast many friends indeed, and one great friend above all, who can never be lost; nor can the others, when met, be separated from thee again. They are thy friends, in that holy and unchanging region, not for such a shadow of a moment as thy time is here, but for a blissful and boundless eternity. With what transport shalt thou, one day, ascend to them: with what ecstacy will they all unite to receive thee! The very foresight of this joy throws into contempt all the poor affairs of this world. But O what shall the possession do! Could the possibility of descending again to earth, as earth now is, enter the views of the saints in glory; it would throw a damp into heaven itself, and beggar their unspeakable joys. And yet this is almost, if not quite, the wish and desire of every one, who murmurs at the departure of Christian friends; or who would, if they could, bring their souls back again into clay.

It was a noble saying of one, over a dear departed friend: "There he lies (says he), and with him all my worldly comfort; yet, if the moving a straw would bring him to life again, without the will of my God, I would not be the mover of that straw for a thousand worlds."

My dear fellow-christian, mayest thou be like-minded; and, instead of too much bewailing the departure of friends to heaven, let it be thy life of faith and preparation to follow them thither, that thou mayest enjoy, together with them, their and thy common great portion, the everlasting inheritance of the saints in light!

CHAP. XX.

THE RECOLLECTION OF THIS THIRD PART IN PRAYER TO GOD.

O my heavenly Father, when I calmly look back upon my conduct to others in this world, and consider how sadly I have failed in all my known duties to men, against thy holy word, and against the peace of my soul; I am humbled to the dust before thee. I have nothing to say for myself, but with thy contrite prophet, "Unclean! Unclean!"

I have not loved my country as I ought, because I have not prayed for its best welfare as I ought. Intent enough I have been upon its vain-glory, its outward pomp, its carnal dignity, and its carnal prosperity; but O how little have I been earnest with thee for the greatest of all blessings, that religion and piety might flourish in the land, without which no true happiness or welfare can be found.

I humbly implore thy blessing upon my sovereign, his family, and his government; beseeching thee to grant, with all outward good, the inward mercies of thy grace, and, in thy due time, the life for evermore. Pardon me also for any failures of my duty on this account.

In obeying those whom thy providence hath set over me, O teach me to see how I may best obey thee, and glorify thy goodness for a just government, good laws, and all the liberties I enjoy. If those in authority seem to fall into errors, (for what man is he that sinneth not!) keep my tongue from reviling, and direct my heart into praying for them, that thy wisdom may rectify what human ability could not apprehend or foresee. Deliver me from sedition and selfishness, from all the evils of political passion and resentment; and give peace, I beseech thee, in my time, O Lord!

Enable me to conduct myself towards thy church, thy ministers, and all who profess to know thee, so as to give no just cause of offence in anything to any man. I pray thee to heal all divisions among thy children, which may bring sad and deep reproach on thy gospel, or lay dismal snares and stumbling-blocks in the ways of men. O that they might love and pity each other, considering what infinitely tender pity and love thou hast manifested for them.

Help, O help me to fill up all my relations in life to thy honour and glory, and forgive me in the numberless instances wherein I have failed. Let the blood of Jesus cleanse me from all my sins to others; and do thou forgive as thou hast enabled me to forgive all their transgressions against myself. Grant me larger measures of grace in the days to come, that I may praise thee more and more throughout my whole life and conversation, and thus live and die to the edification of others, and, above all, to thy glory.

Keep me from all unreasonable and faithless grief, when thou art pleased, with equal wisdom and goodness, to remove the friends of my heart, or the outward comforts of my life. Enable me to give them up without reserve to thee, knowing that no good thing shall be lost either for them or myself, but that all things shall work together for our mutual, our real, our everlasting good.

Having these hopes, help me to be more and more purified from all uncleanness both of flesh and of spirit, and to endeavour even to perfect holiness in thy faith and fear. Lord, I am a blind and feeble worm, and of mine own self can think or do nothing that is good: O do thou, therefore, work in me to will and to do of thy good pleasure, that I may neither be barren nor unfruitful in thy word or work among the children of men. Help me to bear wrongs patiently, to speak every truth meekly, to carry as much as possible my whole conduct unblamably, with respect to others, that thy holy name and truth may be exalted, and they themselves be encouraged to seek the ways of thy salvation.

O Lord, I give up myself, all I have, and all I am, into thy blessed protection; beseeching thee to do for me and for mine, in all respects and at all times, exceeding abundantly above all that I can ask or think, for the sake of Christ Jesus, my Lord and my God; to whom with Thee, O Father, and Thee, O blessed Spirit, three persons in one and the same Jehovah, be all honour, grace, and glory ascribed, both now and for evermore. Amen.

LETTERS

DURING

IN

THE SUMMER OF 1817.

BY THOMAS RAFFLES, D.D. L.L.D.

OF LIVERPOOL ENG.

There will be, we doubt not, but one opinion among our readers as to the excellence of the following Tour. In giving it a place in the Christian Library, we have deviated from our general rule in regard to works of this class; viz, that of selecting from the most recent. Its peculiar value justifies the deviation. The incidents and descriptions contained in it are, with a very few exceptions, not of temporary, but of permanent interest. The distinguished talents of Dr. Raffles, his highly cultivated taste, his remarkably fine susceptibility to the beauties of nature and art, and his apparantly genuine and unaffected piety, peculiarly qualify him for the production of a work of this kind worthy of a place in every library.—Ed. Ch. Lib.

ADVERTISEMENT.

If I could have met the wishes of my friends in any other way than by the publication of these Letters, they had never seen the light. But after many attempts and long delay, I found it impracticable, and, therefore, with much hesitation and reluctance, I committed them to the press. My intention at first was merely to print, not to publish them, hoping thus to escape the charge of obstinacy from my friends, and that of presumption from the public; but I soon perceived that the plan of private circulation would only involve me in innumerable difficulties, and I at length found myself compelled to publish. Thus I am unintentionally and unexpectedly placed in a new character, that of a tourist, before the tribunal of the public, a character in which I was never ambitious to appear, and for the support of which I am well aware how slender are my qualifications. That my little unassuming volume will pass beyond the circle of my immediate friends I have not the vanity to believe: yet, even in its circulation amongst them, it may encounter the glance and excite the criticism of some individuals who know nothing of its author, or the motives in which it originated. I owe it to myself, therefore, to refer such to the above explanation, that I may not suffer under the imputation of sinister ostentatious views, which in this publication I utterly disavow.

If the perusal of these letters shall recall, with pleasing emotions, to the companions of my tour, the lovely scenes we have explored, and the happy hours we have passed together: If they shall communicate information and amusement to any of my young friends, into whose hands the larger and more able narratives of preceding or contemporary tourists may not have come: And, above all, if the facts here recorded, and the scenes described shall have awakened in my own bosom, or shall excite in that of others, a livelier feeling of devotion and gratitude to God, for those moral and religious advantages which we in this happy land enjoy, I shall be satisfied that I have neither travelled nor written in vain.

LETTER I.

Dieppe.

My dear ——

We landed at this place this afternoon about three o'clock, in excellent health and spirits, after a remarkably fine passage across the channel.

We sailed from Brighton at one in the morning, but the work of embarkation commenced at eleven the previous night—and an unpleasant and troublesome work it was. As there is no quay at Brighton, the packets cannot get within a considerable distance of the shore. First then we had to scramble through the breakers into a small boat, which conveyed us to a pinnace that lay a few yards from the land, which was gradually filled by successive boatloads, till with between forty and fifty on board we set sail for the packet. The wind and tide were both unhappily against us—and after vain attempts to stem them during more than an hour and a half, all hope of reaching the vessel that night was nearly abandoned, when the captain, who was with us, suggested the idea of getting a rope from the packet to our vessel, so that the people on board the packet might drag us to them. He accordingly jumped into the smaller boat, with which they were vainly endeavouring to tow us along, proceeded to the vessel—quickly returned with the rope, and we were soon all safe on board. The process of embarkation must have occupied nearly two hours.—The rolling of the sea—the crowd on board the pinnace—the fretfulness of some—the sickness of others—the drunkenness of a few—together with the darkness of the night, contributed to render it a truly dismal scene—and no very auspicious commencement to our tour, in the glowing anticipations of which, these little difficulties had been overlooked.

Behold us then safely on board—the carriage hoisted on deck—the ladies lodged in their berths—Sir S. —— wrapped in a blanket on the floor of the cabin—and I amidst a motley multitude of various ranks and ages, lying along upon some trunks, with a pillow not of the softest materials for my head, and you will have a tolerably correct idea of the posture of our affairs when we set sail for the port of Dieppe. It was but little that I slept—I rose and hastened upon deck. It was a fine star-light morning. I leaned over the side of the vessel—and where should my thoughts at such a moment linger but amid those dear domestic scenes which I had left behind. Presently the moon arose, and quickly after the dawn appeared. The objects were then extremely grand. The vast expanse of the ocean around us, and the bold promontory of Beachy Head behind—while the full sails, as though inspired with the spirit that animated the crew, stretched their canvass to the wind, impatient for the port.

It was long before the ladies arose—and when they did rise and come on deck, we were within sight of the coast of France. What sensations and reflections were awakened in my mind by the first view of the cliffs as they stretched along the horizon, I shall not attempt to describe. To record them would only be to repeat what multitudes have said before me—you may well suppose they were powerful and affecting. The land I had so ardently desired to see—the people with whom I had longed to mingle—the habits and the manners I had often contemplated at a distance, were now before me.—The scenes and transactions of twenty years of bloodshed—the bitterness of national animosity cherished through so long a period—the awfully interesting posture which the affairs of that country had in our own time assumed—and all the wounds, and concussions, and fearful struggles, by which she had been harassed and tormented, from the night when anarchy sat enthroned amid the horrors of the Abbaye, to the triumphs of death upon the plains of Waterloo, all rushed upon my mind—and never was an hour passed with greater impatience than that which we were compelled to spend before the harbour of Dieppe, till the rising of the tide should yield sufficient water for our crossing the bar and entering the port.

On entering within the pier, the first objects that arrested our attention were the women, of whom there were an abundance on the quay, and to whose officious and prompt assistance in towing the vessel up the harbour we were not a little indebted. Their dress—their language—their manners—their whole appearance, was quite new, and we felt in a moment that we were in a foreign land. It is scarcely conceivable that so few miles and hours should make so vast a difference in one's feelings, and completely excite all that can be conveyed by the word foreigner in one's bosom. It was not a little strange to hear a language which we had been accustomed to associate with every idea of polish and of elegance, chattered with amazing volubility by the motley groupe collected on the quay to witness our arrival. There were many military men amongst the crowd, or sauntering, with their arms behind them, up and down the pier. Their appearance, I must confess, did not excite a very favourable impression in my mind of the French military character or costume. Their dress was extremely mean and slovenly—and corresponded most unhappily with the expression of the countenance, in which one looked in vain for that bold and manly air—that dignified and noble independence, which are the usual indications of bravery, and generally associated with the profession of a soldier. Many were clad in brown great coats, certainly not the better for wear, while an immense cocked hat, without a feather, and a belt and sword, were the only indications of the soldier they could boast. Are these, thought I, the men that have made monarchs tremble on their thrones, and kept the world in awe—were they such men as these that bore the eagles of Napoleon to the gates of Vienna, and reaped the laurels of France on the fields of Austerlitz and Marengo!——

We soon discovered that we were in a Catholic country, for on the pier is an immense crucifix, on which the image of the Saviour is extended, carved in wood, as large as life, with the Virgin Mary weeping at his feet. At this image our pilot, a hardy, muscular old man, whose robust figure and weather-beaten countenance would form a fine subject for the pencil, crossed himself as he stood at the helm, and the vessel passed along. On reaching the place of landing, an officer of police came on board, and took our passports to be examined at the office established for that purpose. We were then allowed to disembark and take possession of our present quarters, at the Hotel de Londres.

LETTER II.

Dieppe.

My dear ——

We spent the evening in walking about the place—and, notwithstanding the contemptuous terms in which some travellers have spoken of Dieppe, I must say that it is, upon the whole, a fine town. It surrounds a spacious harbour, formed by an opening in the cliff, through which the tide passes, rising at high water into no mean expanse, though at other seasons it leaves the harbour almost entirely dry. The houses are built in part of brick and flint, and have a black and gloomy appearance. The streets are narrow, but the buildings are generally good. There is an air of humble magnificence about them—they look as though they had copied nobler models, and had seen days of greater splendour.

The entrance to our inn gave us no very pleasing idea of the cleanliness or comfort of a French hotel. We were conducted through the kitchen, amidst chamber-maids and cooks, up a broad staircase of red tile strewed with sand, into a large apartment, in which it is hard to say, whether the attempt at elegance, or the reality of meanness, was most apparent. The paper with which the walls were hung had been magnificent in its time—but was evidently much the worse for wear. The chairs were extremely mean, with rush bottoms—the side-boards had once been elegant, but their gliding was gone—while the richness of their carving only served, in their present state of neglect and decay, to render their appearance more wretched and forlorn.

Dieppe is famous for its carvings in ivory and bone, and the principal, I might almost say the only purpose to which the art is here applied, is the making of crucifixes, and virgins, for the churches and private oratories of the devout Catholics. These articles are to be had in great profusion and very cheap. Lots of crucifixes are to be seen cut in bone about the size of your little finger, and strung together like bunches of keys. I bought three of these for a franc, and a Virgin Mary with the infant Jesus in her arms, stuck in a little box, and a larger crucifix, for a franc each. We visited the church of St. Jacques, the principal ecclesiastical edifice in Dieppe. It is a noble structure, and being the first Catholic church I had seen in a Catholic country, I was not a little interested and effected by the various objects that arrested my attention. The church is surrounded by little chapels or confessionals, each of which has its altar, its crucifix, and its picture. The paintings are various, both as it regards their subject and the merit of their execution; the greater part of them referring, I suppose, to some actions in the life of the saint to whom the chapel is consecrated. I was much amused with one of them. It represents the miraculous draught of fishes—but the fish are all mackerel. Now this is a fish for which Dieppe is justly celebrated—we had some of them at dinner, the finest I ever saw—so that while the painting itself was devised in honour of Christ, the choice of the fish was probably intended by the artist as a compliment to his employers. By the high altar are some precious relics, preserved with the greatest care. The bones of St. Fabian, and St. Valentine, and of some other Saint, of whom I know as little as of these. Their bones, I suppose, have the power of working miracles, like the blood of St. Januarius at Rome. Here we also saw a Virgin Mary as large as life, with the infant Saviour in her arms, and adorned with a new muslin petticoat trimmed with lace. With these things, however, we were soon wearied, and we left the church, thanking that God who had cast our lot in another land, and taught us better things.

From the church we proceeded to the Boulevards, which are extremely mean, and uninteresting, as a public walk, and had a most forsaken and deplorable appearance. From thence we were shown the dock which Buonaparte had begun, for the improvement of this port. It was designed to receive vessels of 300 tons burden, and would certainly have added greatly to the commercial importance of Dieppe. The work however has been suspended since his overthrow.

At night the streets and the quays presented a most lively and imposing scene. They were thronged with people—all in motion—while the long windows of the houses, with their folding-doors of glass, for the most part thrown open, and affording a view of the interior of their several apartments, poured on the moving and variegated groupes below a flood of light, that gave the whole town the gay and brilliant air of a fête or carnival.

LETTER III.

Rouen.

My dear ———

We left Dieppe this morning, and reached Rouen, 42 miles, about 3 P. M. Before leaving Dieppe we took another ramble round the town. It was market day, and we were much pleased with the appearance of the people, especially the women. I never saw such beautiful women any where as in Dieppe; and the neatness of their dress is beyond praise. Their high caps of white linen, white as the driven snow—their cheerful and good-humoured countenances, and the native elegance and gracefulness of their manners, cannot fail most deeply to interest a stranger. The same, however, cannot be said of the men. There is a meanness, and slovenliness, and an air of wretchedness and misery about them which exceedingly disgusts. I can truly say, that I did not see a single man in Dieppe that had, to my English eyes at least, the appearance of a gentleman.

I was not a little amused at the ceremony which took place at the office of police at the granting of our passport. Sir S. —— was the only one of our party closely examined and described. He was surveyed from head to foot—his look—his height—his dress—his age—the colour of his eyes—his complexion—all were most accurately ascertained and minutely described by the clerk in office—who was, withal, an extremely civil and obliging man, and whose manner of performing it tended greatly to diminish the disagreeable effect of the scrutiny he was obliged to institute.

The road from Dieppe to Rouen, affords some pleasing views, and must interest the traveller, from the highly cultivated state of the country through which it passes. The soil of Normandy is extremely rich—nor did we see a single spot of which the cultivator had not made the most. Here and there the prospect was enlivened and diversified by gentle hills and extensive woods. The only appearance of desolation and neglect was in the chateaux. We passed many of them, but the greater part seemed to have been deserted by their tenants, and abandoned by their owners to decay. The windows covered with boards, and the gardens and orchards overgrown with weeds, had a melancholy appearance, and could not fail to suggest, to the reflecting mind, the bitter curse and dreadful consequences of war. To this source of miseries and crimes may be traced much of the desertion which we noticed. Many of the owners of these mansions had probably fallen in battle—while some, it may be, had fled their native land, and the inheritance of their fathers at the time of the revolution, never to return. Nor was there anything remarkably neat or pleasing in those which were inhabited. Nothing of the compactness, and neatness, and snugness, and comfort, of our country retreats, nor of the taste and magnificence of the mansions of our nobility. We saw no park or extensive pleasure-ground—no well-arranged plantations, and smooth-shaven lawns—no graceful serpentine walks, neatly gravelled, and shaded from the sun.—But every thing in the appearance and arrangement of the houses and grounds was coarse, and stiff, and formal, and dirty.—How unlike the chateaux, and enchanted castles of romance—such as the writers of novels and tales have painted them! They seemed to say, "we are foreign—we are not to your taste;" I took the hint, and passed them unenvied by.

The approach to Rouen is extremely pleasing.—The windings of the Seine through a fertile valley, and amongst populous villages, and well-built and extensive manufactories, present a variety of enchanting pictures to the traveller's eye. For the factories are not here, as in the North of England, a deformity to the landscape covered with smoke, and surrounded by black roads—dirty cottages—and rude and filthy inhabitants—but being generally white and remarkably clean, they harmonize with the verdure of the country, and, besides being ornamental, afford animation and variety to the picture. For about a mile before entering Rouen the road is lined on either side with stately trees, which nearly meeting in the centre overhead, afford a most cool and refreshing shelter from the heat of the noon-day sun. Lamps are suspended over the middle of the road by ropes and pullies from the branches of the trees.

We have taken up our quarters at the Hotel des Princes, in the place Pucelle D'Orleans. In the centre is the statue of this famous personage, erected upon the spot where she was burnt. The house in which she was tried and condemned is close by.

We have already witnessed, in this city, the Roman Catholic worship in all its pomp. We were at the cathedral this evening, and heard the vespers. To-morrow is one of the greatest festivals of the Romish church, the Fête Dieu, and the most magnificent procession in honour of it is to take place. The Cardinal Archbishop of Rouen is to grace it with his presence. The people are lining their houses with carpets, sheets and tapestry—and strewing the streets through which it is to pass with flowers. It is to move at four o'clock in the afternoon. Adieu.

LETTER IV.

Rouen.

My dear ———

This city was formerly the capital of Normandy, and is now the first city of the department of the Lower Seine. It has six suburbs, and is said to be seven miles in circumference. The houses are chiefly built of wood, and the streets are narrow and crooked. It is at present famous for its manufactories of cotton, &c. and is to France, almost what Manchester is to England. It contains about 80,000 inhabitants, and is delightfully situated on the northern bank of the river Seine, over which there is a bridge of boats, that rises and falls with the tide. This bridge being esteemed a curiosity, of course we went to see it; but it by no means equalled our expectation as to its appearance. Its utility, however, must be obvious, as the tide rises so high, and runs with such rapidity, that no other bridge has ever been able to resist its force.

Pursuing our ramble through the city on Saturday, and suddenly emerging from one of its dark and narrow streets, we burst in a moment upon the sublime and stupendous front of the cathedral. The effect produced by the instantaneous and unexpected developement of so much magnificence, may be more easily conceived than described. We were riveted for some minutes in silent admiration to the spot. The front of the cathedral is equal, if not superior, to any thing I ever saw, not excepting even York Minster. The workmanship of it is most exquisite. One can scarcely imagine it possible that stone can be wrought so highly, rivalling, as it does, the delicacy of paper and the fineness of lace.

It has two towers—that to the north is most ancient, and is Saxon in its architecture. The whole of the front, with this exception, is Gothic, and perhaps one of the purest and richest specimens of this style of architecture in Europe. The spire is remarkably lofty. It is built of wood covered with lead. It was burnt down about fifty years ago, and is now eighty feet lower than it was previous to that conflagration. Its great defect is that it does not harmonize with the rest of the edifice, it being Grecian. We were informed that it is 420 feet in height—but the correctness of this information I am inclined to doubt: for that would make it higher than St. Paul's in London. It is certainly, however, a very lofty and elegant spire.

The church of St. Ouen is also a most magnificent edifice. In some respects it is superior to the cathedral; for though its front is less highly wrought, and not perhaps so vast in its dimensions—yet it has greater uniformity, and the building, as a whole, is more solemn and majestic. The first view of the interior, on entering the great western door, is extremely grand and imposing. There is nothing to interrupt the sight—but clusters of Gothic pillars, towering to an amazing elevation, stretch, in prolonged perspective, on either side to the eastern window, which is the richest exhibition of painted glass I have yet beheld. There is an air of gloomy grandeur about this building that strikes one with awe; and combined with the pomp and splendour of Catholic worship—the voices of the chanters—the pealing of the organ—the chorus of hundreds and thousands suddenly rising till every arch and every pillar rings with the sound—and then sinking into the softest and tenderest notes again, captivates the senses and absorbs the soul.

Yesterday morning we repaired first to the cathedral. High Mass was performing when we entered. The church, spacious as it is, was crowded in every part—the body of it was entirely filled with the military. The attire of the priests was most splendid. Those of a superior order wore a magnificent mantle, richly embroidered with flowers of various colours on a ground of gold. We were present at the elevation of the host, when all in the cathedral fell upon their knees, and, the censers being thrown aloft, the richest odours were diffused throughout the edifice. We remarked that none of the military were uncovered during this most solemn ceremony of their religion. We were told they would not. While these rites were performing in the chancel of the church, a venerable old man, in the attire of a priest, came through the crowd with a basket full of bread broken into small pieces, which he distributed amongst the people. This is the bread of charity. Loaves are presented by individuals to the priest, who breaks them and blesses them, and then they are thus dispersed to all who choose to take. I observed one soldier who took a piece—smelt at it, and then turned up his nose most contemptuously before he ate it.

From the cathedral we went to the Protestant church, and heard a good sermon, as far as it went. The church is large, and has been magnificent; but it is sadly neglected and gone to decay. The congregation was small, but serious and attentive, and the whole service was conducted with great decorum and solemnity. A clerk read from a sort of desk, at the opening of the service, select portions of the Scriptures, including the ten commandments—and also the Apostle's creed. They sung the pslams of David. The minister used a form of prayer in part, and in part prayed extempore. There seemed to be much elegance in the composition of the sermon—and it was gracefully delivered. I regret that this is the highest eulogium it merited.

In the afternoon we saw the procession of the Fête Dieu. The host was borne under a magnificent canopy through the streets, which, in honour of the procession, were strewed with flowers: while the fronts of the houses were hung with carpets, tapestry, and linen. Every body was out of doors—and as they proceeded to elevate the sacred wafer at the various altars which pious individuals had raised before their houses in those streets through which it was to pass, the people with one accord fell upon their knees, while the ascending censers filled the air with perfume. Solemn music—a long train of military, and a vast number of priests of various orders and in splendid robes, attended and made up the pageant.

From witnessing this procession we proceeded to a convent, and saw the ceremony of the repose of the host. The altar was extremely splendid, and one blaze of light, from the many tapers that burned upon it. On one side of the altar was the Chapel of the Nuns. We saw the Lady Abbess and one of the Sisters, by pressing close to the railing of the altar; the rest were concealed from our view. The chanting of the nuns, in the vespers, was most thrilling, and the responses of the female choir in the organ loft not less captivating. At one period I was wrapped in a delirium of delight, and could scarcely deem it earthly music, so superior was it to anything I had ever heard, or conceived, of the power of the human voice before. We were to have seen the convent, which is also a school for young ladies, but it being a day of such extraordinary solemnity, the nuns continued at their devotions in the chapel during the whole of it. There are several English girls in the school, and we were introduced into a gallery hung round with specimens of their work.

Before the revolution there were forty-two convents and thirty-three churches in this city. There are at present but five convents and twenty churches. Thirteen of the convents are converted into ware-houses, and post-houses, and are thus rendered much more serviceable to the public. The monastry of St. Ouen, attached to the church of that name, is converted into a library, which contains 70,000 volumes, a museum for paintings, and public offices of various kinds. Near the last-mentioned church lived that notorious infidel Voltaire. His house is at present occupied by an attorney. I must not omit to remind you that this city was the birthplace of William the Conqueror; and that the heart of Richard Cœur-de-Lion is in the cathedral. But I shall weary you of Rouen—I have only to add, that there is a man here to be guillotined in the course of the week, for cutting off his wife's head a few days after their marriage, because she had carroty hair—and also a man to be tried for pretending to be the dauphin of France, and heir to the throne.

LETTER V.

Paris.

My dear ——

We left Rouen early yesterday morning, and reached Paris, between 90 and 100 miles, by nine o'clock last night. You would have supposed, however, had you seen our cattle and harness at starting, that we should have been two or three days, at least, performing the journey.—The horses are taken, just as they happen to be wanted, from the field, the cart, or the plough, and yoked to your carriage, with ropes fastened to their backs with wretched straps, that altogether cut a worse appearance than the most miserable hawker's cart in the streets of London. Nor does the postilion make a less extraordinary figure than his horse. His enormous boots, weighing from five to seven pounds each, in which there is room for two legs of ordinary size—his powdered hair and long pigtail—his enormous whip, in the smacking of which he makes the most wonderful evolutions over his head, and the most terrible noise that can be imagined, and by the regulation of which, on principles known to themselves, he apprizes the postmaster as he enters a town or village, whether the travellers be French or English, and whether they pay well or ill—altogether make up so grotesque a figure, that, though often described, I could not deny myself the pleasure of sketching its outline. With all these disadvantages, however, the road is in your favour, being generally straight and level—kept in excellent repair—soft on either side, with pavement in the centre—and usually lined with trees, sometimes in double rows.

About four miles from Rouen, looking back from the summit of the hill, is seen one of the finest views in France. In the foreground is the Seine, winding through a luxuriant valley, and studded with a variety of little islands crowned with the richest woods. Rouen with its towers and spires, appears in the distance, and all around an almost boundless extent of country rich in cornfields and exquisite in beauty. Indeed, nothing can exceed the height to which cultivation is carried everywhere in Normandy. The land does not appear to be, as it is with us, in the hands of mighty lords and wealthy commoners, nor let out in immense farms of many hundred acres—but rather occupied by humble cultivators of the soil, who have no more than enough to maintain their families, and must, therefore, make the most of what they have. Hence arises one circumstance which, in some parts, certainly injures the picturesque appearance of the country. The land is cultivated in little formal patches, and straight lines; here a stripe of clover, and there a stripe of wheat, and then of potatoes, and so on—this is by no means pleasing to the eye, and gives the sides of the distant hills the appearance of a tailor's pattern book unfolded. But the industry and prudence it indicates sufficiently atone to the lover of mankind, for the loss that is sustained by the lover of the picturesque.

About forty miles from Rouen we first saw vineyards, and I must confess I was greatly disappointed in them. One of our hop-gardens, when the hop is in blossom, is a far more beautiful object. They were in their infancy it is true—the plants were young—and they will attain a greater height and luxuriance. But they never suffer them to grow many feet from the ground, but bend them over from stick to stick, at the height of about three feet from the surface. At present they have a curious appearance up the sides of the hills, for as yet little more than the sticks are seen, so that they look more like fields of broomsticks stinted in their growth than vineyards. But we shall probably see more of them, and my opinion may be altered by a better acquaintance.

We passed two chateaux, near each other, on opposite sides of the road—one of them the residence of Marshal Suchet, the other of Marshal Victor. They were neither of them distinguished by elegance or grandeur, and would pass for nothing more than good country houses in England. We also passed Rigney, formerly the seat of the great Duke of Sully, and now the country residence of Talleyrand. We dined at Nantes, a town of some importance upon the Seine, with a magnificent church.

At Saint Germain en Layne we stopped to take a view of the Palace. It is a gloomy structure, built of a dark-coloured brick, and has more the appearance of a prison than a palace. It was the retreat of the fugitive James II. of England; and here, worn with vexation and grief, he expired. It was originally designed by its founder, Francis I. as a hunting seat for the kings of France, when they enjoyed the diversion of the chase in the adjoining forest of Laye. It has been much neglected of late, however, and has greatly suffered from the Prussian soldiers, by whom it was occupied as barracks during the late war. From the terrace is a very extensive prospect, and Paris is distinctly seen in the distance. The city of St. Germain is chiefly built of stone—the streets are wide—the houses, generally, are on a grand scale, and there is an air of magnificence about the whole. The approach to it by a spacious avenue through the forest is extremely fine. In this forest Napoleon took great delight, and there he used frequently to hunt.

About half way between St. Germain and Paris, we passed, on the right, Malmaison, the favourite country retreat of Buonaparte. The gardens seemed to be very rich and extensive, but the appearance of the house was mean.

The entrance into Paris, by this route, is truly magnificent, and excites in the breast of a stranger the highest expectations of the metropolis he is about to visit. An immense avenue of trees, upwards of two miles in length, and down a gentle declivity, conducts you to the triumphal arch erected by Napoleon, but not yet completed. Round it the road forms a circle, and passing through the Barriere de Neuilly, formed by two temples, in the finest style of architecture, enters the Champs Elysées.—There the eye, wearied with the monotony of a level country and a dusty road, is relieved by the richness of the foliage—the depth of the shade, and the variegated groups, and numerous equipages, that move in the animated scenes around—till in the Place Louis Quinze, where it terminates, all the magnificence of Paris seems to burst in a moment on the enraptured sight. Immediately before you is the great gate of the gardens of the Thuileries, with the grand avenue leading to the chateaux—to the left is the palace of Louis the Fifteenth, a majestic pile, of the Corinthian order—on the right, over the Seine, which is there crossed by a handsome bridge, (Pont Louis XV.,) the Palace de Bourbon, a most chaste and classical structure, now the Hall of the Chamber of Deputies—and beyond, the gilded dome of the Hotel des Invalides—all these buildings are in the highest style of magnificence—and it seems as if architecture had done her utmost in emulating the grandeur of former times to adorn this favoured spot.—The square, from the centre of which these objects are beheld, is immense, and you may judge what must have been their effect, when contemplated for the first time, and glowing amid the splendour of the setting sun. The grandeur of the buildings—the elegance and number of the equipages—the variegated groups of people—the richness of the woods and gardens—the softness of the air—the serenity of the sky—and above all, the thoughts and reflections that crowded on my mind, on entering this most interesting city, absolutely overwhelmed me, and I was glad to find repose in the refreshment and retirement of a comfortable hotel.

LETTER VI.

Paris.

My dear ——

You will not expect from me anything like a close and accurate description of the various objects which attract the notice of strangers in Paris. They are far too rapidly surveyed, and blended too much together, for that minuteness of observation or distinction of impression which such a task would require. Where every object is vast, and includes within itself a variety of individuals, each attracting in its kind, and presenting its own peculiar claims upon your attention and regard, you are rather confused than delighted with the rapid survey which a visitor obtains; and the review of the day, when you sit down calmly to retrace its scenes, is more pregnant, perhaps, with vexation than with pleasure. So much has been omitted, which you wish you had observed—so many inquiries have been forgotten, or did not occur at the moment, which you might have made—the effect of each object has been so much weakened by the rapidity with which it succeeded its predecessor—and the whole impression on the mind is so mingled and confused—that all you have heard, and seen, and felt, has scarcely the air of reality, but seems more like the rapid incidents of a vivid and recent dream.

You will not, therefore, form too high an expectation of the length or minuteness of the descriptions I shall give you during my stay in Paris. They must be but sketches. The filling of them up by conversation, or from books, will be a pleasant employment for hours of future leisure. In the mean time I shall be happy if, from so rude an outline, you can form anything like a correct conception of the original.

We are comfortably settled in our Hotel, (Hotel Mirabeau,) which we understand is one of the best in Paris, and which promises to justify the good character it has obtained. It is in the Rue de la Paix—perhaps the broadest, cleanest, and most elegant street in the city. Some, it may be, will except the Rue Royale, which runs parallel with it, and connects the termination of the Boulevard Madeleine with the Place Louis Quinze. The Rue de la Paix connects the Boulevard Capucines with the Place Vendome, and is continued on the opposite side of the Place Vendome by the Rue de Castiglione, a street of equal breadth, to the gardens of the Thuileries. We are, therefore, in the centre of everything, and the Thuileries—the Louvre—the Palais Royal—the Boulevards—the Champs Elysées—the Bridges—the Institute, and the University, are all within a few minutes' walk.

The Rue de la Paix was called, in Buonaparte's time, the Rue de Napoleon—and, in the centre of the Place Vendome, is the famous triumphal pillar, which he caused to be erected to commemorate the successes of his arms in Germany. It is in imitation of the pillar of Trajan at Rome. It is surrounded with bas-reliefs representing his various victories, and composed of the cannon taken from the vanquished. The figures are three feet high, in groups of as many feet in length, and pursue a spiral direction round the pillar from the base to the entablature. It is said there are 2000 figures on the column. They depict, in chronological order, the principal actions of the campaign of 1805, from the departure of the troops from Bologne to the battle of Austerlitz. A band is raised from the pillar separating each range of bas-reliefs, and bearing on it the record of the action each cluster represents. On the summit is a gallery, which is approached by a staircase within, and the whole was surmounted by the statue of their, then victorious, leader. This offensive object has, however, been removed by the present possessor of the throne; and the pillar itself would have shared a similar fate, had not its extraordinary strength baffled every effort to displace it. The pillar is 133 feet high, and 12 in diameter, which is the exact measurement of its model. The pillar is the combined production of M. M. Lepere and Gondouin, architects—Denon, the sculptor, and Burgeret, who designed the bas-reliefs. The whole expense of its erection was 1,500,000 francs. It is a truly magnificent object, and stands, in spite of themselves, I had almost said, an imperishable monument to the French nation, of the greatness from which they have fallen. At present the white flag waves upon its summit.

LETTER VII.

Paris.

My dear ——

We began our survey of the public edifices of Paris, as you may well suppose, with the Louvre. No description can do ample justice to this Palace of the Arts. There they seem to reign in all their glory, in pomp and magnificence, of which their admirers may well be proud. The edifice itself is the most immense pile of building in Paris, where everything is on a grand scale, and one part of it, when completed, will rival, in magnificence and beauty, the finest specimens of modern architecture in the world. I allude to the Court of the Louvre, in which all the graces of architecture, simplicity, symmetry, and elegance, seem to be combined.

The early history of the Louvre is involved in great obscurity. The name of its founder, and the period of its erection, are alike unknown. Its original design embraced but a portion of the present edifice, and for a long while it was separated from the Thuileries, at a considerable distance, by the walls of the city. It was enlarged and beautified, however, by the taste and munificence of the kings of France, who from Charles IX. to Henry IV. made it their principal residence. From the last-mentioned monarch, whose assassinated body was dragged bleeding through its apartments, and there treated with indignity and neglect, it became the seat of several academies and scientific bodies. At length the proud magnificent Louis XIV. resolved to complete the palace, by finishing the court, of which a part only was erected, and the grand gallery along the banks of the Seine, which was begun by Henry IV. for the purpose of connecting the Louvre with the Thuileries. For this purpose, his Minister, Colbert, sent for the famous architect Bernin from Rome. But, though a man of unquestionable genius, and justly celebrated for the many beautiful buildings he had designed, all his plans were finally rejected: while the honour of completing this great national edifice was reserved for Claude Perrault, who, though bred as a physician, excelled as an architect, and has immortalized his name by this lasting memorial of his skill. "The façade of the Louvre, which was designed by him," says Voltaire, "is one of the most august monuments of architecture in the world. We sometimes go a great way in search of what we have at home. There is not one of the palaces at Rome whose entrance is comparable to this of the Louvre; for which we are obliged to Perrault, whom Boileau has attempted to turn into ridicule." The gallery is nearly a quarter of a mile in length, and, for the grandeur of its design—the immensity of its extent—the beauty of its architecture—and the richness of its contents, is unparalleled by any edifice in modern Europe. This gallery, the court above described, and the palace of the Thuileries, already form three sides of an immense parallelogram, which Buonaparte had intended to complete, by carrying out a line of building uniform with the gallery from the opposite extremity of the Thuileries to the other side of the court of the Louvre. The work, indeed, is considerably advanced, and many of the houses formerly occupying the intermediate space are taken down. The area thus laid open is called the Carousal. It was at the termination of one of the streets leading into the Carousal, that the attempt was once made upon Napoleon's life, by setting fire to some barrels of gunpowder, placed there for the purpose, as his carriage passed along. An iron railing runs across the Carousal, to form the court-yard of the Thuileries, and in the centre, before the principal pavilion of the Palace, is the triumphal arch, on which he placed the four bronze horses, so universally admired, taken originally from Corinth to Constantinople—thence to Venice, where, for many centuries, they adorned the place of St. Mark, and thence transferred to Paris, to swell the spoils of the Corsican conqueror.

Part of the ground floor of the Louvre is devoted to the specimens of ancient sculpture, of which there is an immense collection—many of them most exquisite, and some of colossal size. There is something awfully sublime, in the impression produced upon a contemplative mind, passing from hall to hall, and gallery to gallery, filled with these noblest efforts of the human genius, wrested from the oblivion of long departed years. As you enter every apartment, a new era in the history of the world seems to dawn upon you—and you find yourself surrounded with the most illustrious beings, by whose genius and whose actions it was distinguished and adorned. Centuries there dwindle into hours and minutes—you pass from age to age as you move from room to room, and, in the lounge of a morning, you seem to have communed with the greatest characters that have appeared upon the busy theatre of the ancient world. Instead of days—months and years might be devoted to the examination of these most interesting objects; and, after all, the eye of the connoisseur, and the mind of the christian philosopher, would discover new beauties, and suggest fresh trains of thought.

The number of apartments devoted to sculpture is in all fifteen, including the Vestibule and Corridor. Their names are chiefly derived from the nature of the subjects they contain. The halls are extremely spacious, and the finishing of of the interior most appropriate. The arrangement of the statues and sculptures, and the distribution of the light, have been objected to as injudicious—but the objection did not occur to me when upon the spot. Everything seemed well to accord with the character of the exhibition and to heighten its effect. The number of articles is at present three hundred and fifty-five, and ample information respecting them is contained in the catalogue, composed by the Chevalier Visconti, Member of the Institute and Keeper of the Statues, which is sold for two francs at the doors.

Ascending from the sculptures by a most magnificent, and what might almost be denominated a colossal staircase, you enter the rooms devoted to the works of mordern artists. This collection is extremely fine and very extensive. Our Somerset House is not to be compared with these anti-chambers of the Louvre. But when you enter a gallery nearly a quarter of a mile in length, hung on either side with the finest works of all the celebrated masters that have ever flourished, you can scarcely conceive the scene a reality. It is like some splendid effort of enchantment—the mind is overwhelmed and bewildered by such sublime combinations of art—the eye is lost in the vast and original perspective—and it is long ere you can recover from the impression of so much grandeur to fix your attention on any individual portion of the stupendous whole. As you advance, the genius of every age and every nation of modern Europe appears to instruct, entertain, and delight you—you cease to regret the loss of men who were the boast of their country, and the glory of their times, for here they survive, immortal in their works—while, by their magic power, the events of remotest ages and their illustrious dead, rise to meet your enraptured gaze, and look intently on you from the canvass they have made to live.

The gallery is divided into nine compartments—the first three comprise the works of the French school—the second three the German, Flemish, and Dutch—and the last three the different schools of Italy. The number of pictures in the gallery is eleven hundred and one. They are many of them of immense dimensions, and for the most part in a high state of preservation.

Imposing, however, as these wonderful collections of the Louvre always must be, a connoisseur would tell you that they are shorn of their brightest glories, and that the Louvre now has but few attractions, compared with those which invested it when the spoils of subjugated Europe were deposited within its walls. 'Tis well for Europe, however, that these attractions are no more—If, with the eagles of Napoleon, the glory has departed from the Louvre, a milder genius and a happier emblem has succeeded—the dove, with her olive branch, has visited the fields of Europe, over which his ill-omened bird had hovered through so many years of oppression and of terror—and liberty has dawned upon the nations he enslaved. The Louvre as it is, then, must be an interesting object to the lover of mankind, while the best feelings of the heart triumph in a loss, which taste and genius may be permitted for a moment to deplore. But I am not a connoisseur—my pleasure, therefore was, in this respect, unmingled—and I enjoyed those wonderful collections as much as if the Laocoon, and the Apollo, and the Venus, which have returned to their respective countries, had been there. Berlin and Vienna—Venice and Rome—Cologne and Brussels, have claimed and received their own. I could not but exult, as I surveyed the places they had occupied, that my own country had nothing to claim!

But, to a contemplative mind, a visit to the Louvre must be always pregnant with the deepest interest, connected, as that edifice has been, with some of the most important and affecting scenes in the history of France, and some of her greatest and most celebrated men. Nor could I forget, as I passed through its apartments, that round the walls of that very palace, now the peaceful retreat of genius, and the consecrated asylum of the arts, the groans of the dying protestants arose to heaven for vengeance, through five successive days of massacre and blood—while "kill, kill, kill," was the incessant cry of the accursed Charles IX., who stood at the windows, a demon in human form—to animate his ruffians when weary of their work, and fire upon the miserable fugitives that came within his reach. This carnival of death began 24th of August, 1572, but the stain is indelible upon the cause that engendered and the name that patronized it!

But the subject and the time alike admonish me to close my letter. I have made too free with the latter for your patience—and should write too warmly, perhaps, on the former for my own reputation as too meekness and prudence.

Your's, &c.

LETTER VIII.

Paris.

My dear ——

To-day we have visited the Jardin des Plantes, the Botanical Garden of Paris. It requires not the eye of a botanist to be interested with this delightful place. The precision and formality of science are relieved by the judicious grouping of the plants, and the graceful distribution of the walks and lawns. Every region of the globe is here presented in miniature, rich in its own productions, and with such embellishments as harmonize with the scene and heighten its effect. The menagerie and aviary are rich and well worthy attention: but the galleries of the museum, devoted to the specimens in Zoology, Entomology, Mineralogy, &c. astonish while they delight.—The extent of the collections—the rarity and richness of many of the specimens—the high state of preservation in which they all appear to be—and the perfect classification and skilful arrangement of the whole, as they surpass conception, so they are beyond all praise. Sir S. —— was surprised to find the productions of Java and the Eastern Islands, with which he is so well acquainted, but which, to the generality of Europe, have been little known, all in this wonderful collection.—Scarcely a creature exists —not a stone—or a metal—or an earth—or a crystal, in any of its forms or combinations, that has not its example here; while the different compartments of the garden are made to harmonize with the respective countries whose productions they contain, and thus, in this extraordinary place, you seem surrounded with the varieties of every region, and, in the course of an hour or two, to make the tour of the globe.

The Jardin des Plantes should certainly be visited immediately after the palace of the Louvre: for the former must have a tendency to correct any undue impression of the greatness and the power of man, which may have been excited by a survey of the latter. Here the builders of palaces, and the masters of the chisel and the pencil sink into insignificance before the grandeur—the symmetry—the beauty—the variety of his works, who built all things, and is infinitely excellent in all he made. The humming-bird and the butterfly, the topaz and the sapphire, throw a dimness and a coarseness over the delicate touches of a Titian, and the rich colouring of a Claude: while the haughty Louis might see the splendour of his coronation robes eclipsed by many a simple flower that blooms within these fair retreats.—"Oh! Lord, how excellent are thy works, in wisdom hast thou made them all."

This garden owes its origin to La Brosse, physician to Louis XIII. who, in 1636, induced that prince to found an establishment for the cultivation and study of medicinal plants. It was afterwards enriched by the voyages of Tournefort in the Levant—by the botanical labours of Jussieu and Vaillant—but it is indebted for the present consummation of its glory to the munificence of Louis XV. and the genius of Buffon.

There are two gardens, the upper and the lower—in the former is an artificial hill, the ascent to which is by a winding path—and on whose summit is a neat pavilion. There the visitor may repose himself after the fatigues of the morning, and survey, at leisure, the enchanting scenes immediately beneath—or the majestic edifices and busy streets of the capital all around him.

After our morning's ramble, a hint was dropped by Sir S. —— which was eagerly caught by the whole party, and has issued in a determination, with which I, you may be sure, am unspeakably gratified, that is—to make the best use of our time here, and instead of lounging about Paris, to proceed, as soon as we shall have seen the cream of its interesting objects, immediately to Geneva—and thence to the glaciers of Savoy—across the country to Basle, and down the Rhine to the Netherlands. Thus my most ardent wishes will be gratified—and, wearied in this place, as I soon shall be, with the works of men, I shall have the long desired opportunity afforded me of seeing some of the sublimest works of God. We are already amply furnished, through the kindness of friends, with letters for such a tour; and our banker, Mons. Barillion, a most intelligent and obliging man, assures us of its perfect practicability within the period we propose. We might even take Lyons on our way, but I rather think we shall choose the nearest road, by Dijon, that we may have more leisure when amongst the Alps.

Our party are at the Theatre. They are gone to hear themselves laughed at, for I understand the play announced is "Les Anglais pour rire."—Having myself no taste that way, I devoted the evening to a ramble—and strolled across the Place Louis XV. over the Pont Louis Seize, and along the banks of the Seine, to the esplanade of the Hotel des Invalides. I stopped in the centre of the Place Louis Quinze, to recall the mingled associations connected with that dreadful spot. There stood the guillotine, by which the unfortunate Louis suffered, with a majesty that became him as a monarch, and a meekness worthy of a saint. As you wish to participate with me in the emotions and reflections excited by the objects that interest me, I need make no apology for awakening your recollections of that tragical scene by a quotation from the simple and affecting narrative of the Abbé Edgeworth, which now lies before me.

"The carriage proceeded thus in silence to the Place de Louis XV. (called the Place de la Revolution during the reign of terror,) and stopped in the middle of a large space that had been left round the scaffold; this place was surrounded with cannon, and beyond an armed multitude extended as far as the eye could reach. As soon as the king perceived that the carriage stopped, he turned and whispered to me, 'We are arrived if I mistake not.' My silence answered that we were. One of the guards came to open the carriage door, and the gens d'armes would have jumped out, but the king stopped them, and leaning his arm on my knee, 'Gentlemen,' said he with a tone of majesty, 'I recommend to you this good man; take care that after my death no insult be offered to him. I charge you to prevent it.' The two men answered not a word; the king was continuing in a louder tone, but one of them stopped him, saying, 'Yes, yes, we will take care, leave him to us;' and I ought to add, that these words were spoken in a tone of voice that must have overwhelmed me, if, at such a moment, it had been possible for me to have thought of myself. As soon as the king had left the carriage, three guards surrounded him, and would have taken off his clothes, but he repulsed them with haughtiness: he undressed himself, untied his neckcloth, opened his shirt, and arranged it himself. The guards, whom the determined countenance of the king had, for a moment, disconcerted, seemed to recover their audacity.—They surrounded him again, and would have seized his hands. 'What are you attemping?' said the king, drawing back his hands, 'To bind you,' answered the wretches. 'To bind me,' said the king, with an indignant air, 'No! I shall never consent to that; do what you have been ordered to do, but you shall never bind me.' The guards insisted, they raised their voices, and seemed to wish to call on others to assist them.

"Perhaps this was the most terrible moment of this most dreadful morning. Another instant and this best of kings would have received, from his rebellious subjects, indignities too horrid to mention—indignities that would have been to him more insupportable than death. Such was the feeling expressed on his countenance. Turning towards me, he looked at me steadily, as if to ask my advice. Alas! it was impossible for me to give any, and I only answered by silence; but as he continued this fixed look of inquiry, I replied—'Sire, in this new insult, I only see another trace of resemblance between your majesty and the Saviour who is about to recompense you;' at these words he raised his eyes to heaven with an expression that can never be described. 'You are right,' said he, 'nothing less than his example should make me submit to such a degradation.' Then, turning to the guards, 'Do what you will, I will drink of the cup even to the dregs.'

"The path leading to the scaffold was extremely rough and difficult to pass; the king was obliged to lean on my arm, and from the slowness with which he proceeded, I feared, for a moment, that his courage might fail; but what was my astonishment when arrived at the last step, I felt that he suddenly let go my arm, and I saw him cross, with a firm foot, the breadth of the whole scaffold: silenced, by his look alone, fifteen or twenty drums that were placed opposite to him; and, in a voice so loud that it must have been heard at the pont Tournant, I heard him pronounce distinctly these memorable words, 'I die innocent of all the crimes laid to my charge; I pardon those who have occasioned my death; and I pray to God, the blood you are now going to shed may never be visited on France.'

"He was proceeding, when a man on horseback, in the national uniform, waved his sword, and, with a ferocious cry, ordered the drums to beat. Many voices were at the same time heard encouraging the executioners. They seemed reanimated themselves, and seizing with violence the most virtuous of kings, they dragged him under the axe of the guillotine, which, with one stroke, severed his head from his body. All this passed in a moment."

I remember, Dr. Moore relates, that the Abbé kneeled with his face near to that of the king, and, as the blow was about to be struck, pronounced aloud, "Child of St. Louis, ascend to Heaven!"—The face of the confessor was sprinkled with the monarch's blood.*

In the review, and on the theatre of such scenes as these, every feeling abandons us but that of pity and of horror. The foibles of the man, and the errors of the monarch, are lost in the remembrance of his agonies—the sympathies of our common nature stir within our bosoms, and a thrilling sensation of awe is excited, while standing on the spot which drank his blood.

There must be some bitter emotions in the breasts of the present family, especially the amiable Duchess d'Angouleme, when from the palace whence he was dragged, they look out upon the place where a father, an uncle, and a brother suffered. The grand avenue of the Thuileries perpetually presents it to their view—while the beautiful woods of the Champs Elysées, in which the prospect from the windows of the palace terminate, must lose much of their loveliness, as imagination and memory ever interpose the headless trunk of their unhappy predecessor. Moreover it seems to me, that the consciousness that they sit upon a precarious throne, and, probably, are only sheltered by the bayonets of foreigners from a similar fate, must be another bitter ingredient in their cup of royalty.—Who that values his repose of mind, would wish to share it with them!——

* The Abbé Edgeworth was the son of an Irish gentleman, who became a convert to the Roman Catholic religion, and settled, with a part of his family, at Thoulouse. The Abbé was bred to the church, and having received orders, commenced his labours in the city of Paris. He resided in the seminary of Les Missions Estranges, and soon distinguished himself by his virtues, his talents, and his eminent services in the church. He was at length recommended, by the superior of that establishment, as confessor to the Princess Elizabeth, and by this means became known to the Royal Family, and so prominent a figure in the closing scene of the king's life.

But 'tis time to change the scene and abandon these reflections. Here, in this immense area, Te Deum was sung, for the triumph of the Allies, and the restoration of the Bourbons, when the principal Monarchs of Europe were present at the ceremony. This must have been a most sublime and imposing spectacle. No place can be conceived more suited to such a purpose. The buildings and the gardens that surround it are in the highest style of classic elegance and grandeur, while the recollections of the spot at once marked it as appropriate, and must have contributed greatly to the effect, and enthusiasm of the ceremony.—But the Place Louis XV. is now all life and gaiety. It appears to be a favourite resort of the Parisians. These recollections, if, indeed, they occur at all, seem by no means to diminish the pleasure which the beauty and the bustle of the scene impart.—No stranger to their history, that pauses, and observes the gay and animated groups that pass across it now, would imagine that, in the memory of many of them, it had been a theatre of horror and of blood, and that, but yesterday, a foreign army had encamped in the adjacent woods. But the history of Paris, for the last thirty years, had been like the ebbing and the flowing of the sea—the impressions of one revolution, however deep, have been rapidly effaced by the quick succession of another—and whether the tide has ceased its dreadful alternations, is, with some, a doubtful question, but one by which the majority of the people are, perhaps, but little troubled.—Let them have their amusements and their pleasures, and it is enough for them—the Theatre—the Palais Royal—and the Boulevards, absorb and captivate them.—The dice or the armour afford sufficient occupation for the mind—and with pursuits like these they are content and happy, if, indeed, the artificial gaiety which they awaken can deserve the name of happiness, till the voice of some commanding intellect arouse them, and they turn from their pleasures to abet the schemes of his ambition, or to follow in his career of blood.

LETTER IX.

Paris.

My dear ——

We have been much gratified this morning with a visit to the Luxembourg, the most perfect and beautiful of all the palaces in Paris. I shall not weary you with its description—suffice it to say—that it is distinguished by the boldness of its design, and the symmetry of its proportions: more uniform than the Thuileries, and more finished than the Louvre—its general aspect is extremely chaste and elegant. It is built upon the model of the Palace de Piti at Florence, by Desbrosses, an Italian architect. Its name was derived from the Duke of Luxembourg, who had a hotel upon the spot, and from whom the land was purchased by Maria de Medicis, the founder of the present edifice. It became the property of Louis XIV., by purchase from the Duchess of Guise, and was given by the unfortunate Louis XVI. to Monsieur, his brother, the present monarch. Like most of the royal edifices of this city, the scenes of revolutionary fury have disgraced it. It was used as a prison during the reign of terror, and the Senate held their sittings within its walls.

Within this palace is the Chamber of Peers. The throne on which Napoleon sat is still standing—but a most ridiculous and contemptible metamorphose has been made on a grand emblematical painting which covers nearly one side of the hall. The figure of Buonaparte formerly appeared in it as genius of France; the head of the Ex-Emperor, however, has been taken away, and that of Henry the Fourth put in its place. You may well imagine how ridiculous the head of the Bourbon looks upon the Corsican's shoulders.—Surely there is a childishness in this which must excite the pity and contempt of surrounding nations. If the image of the usurper was an offensive object to the present monarch, viewed from that very throne on which he sat during so many of his years of exile, why did he not remove the piece immediately from the hall. But if his vanity was flattered by the possession of so fine a production of the pencil, why, in the eyes of an observant and susceptible nation, betray that weakness, and suspicion, and doubt, which such a measure as the displacing of the head of Buonaparte indicates; as though the demon of anarchy still haunted his troubled mind, and he feared lest the usurper should exceed the former miracle of his uninterrupted march from the coast to the capital, and start from the very canvass, again to dispossess him of his throne.

The apartments of the Luxembourg are most superb, and the paintings in the galleries extremely fine. They have been considerably thinned of late, of the works of the old masters, to supply the deficiencies in the Louvre. The living artists are doing their utmost to fill up the vacancies which thus occur. There are already many pictures from the pencil of David—whose works are universally and deservedly admired. His subjects are, chiefly, classical, and his figures and draperies exceedingly appropriate—while there is a sobriety in his colouring, which is well adapted to the antiquity and majesty of the scenes and transactions he delineates. It struck me, however, that there was too much stateliness in his figures, and that the effect would, in many cases, have been much finer, if a little more ease had been given to the form, and a little less formality to the drapery. But you will suppose that the air of Paris has had the same effect upon me, as upon many of my countrymen, who were quite as unpromising subjects for such a change, and that I am actually turning connoisseur—but, if I am, the metamorphose is still far from complete, and I fear that you will smile at the awkwardness of my first attempt in so new and different a character.

There is one picture, however, in the Luxembourg, which has haunted me ever since I saw it, and the impression of which I shall not easily lose. Its subject is the flight of Cain. There is a terrible sublimity throughout the piece, which transfixes the spectator, in astonishment and horror, before it. Every expression of terror—of remorse, and of anguish, is thrown into the murderer's countenance, and there is agony in every muscle of his distracted frame. Every living thing seems to recoil before him as he flies—and all nature is terribly illumined by the lightnings of Almighty vengeance that flash upon the wretched fugitive.

The gardens of the palace are spacious, and laid out with the accustomed formality of broad straight avenues and square parterres. We thought of the ill-fated Marshal Ney, who escaped the arrows of death in so many well-fought fields and arduous campaigns, to pay the forfeit of his adherence to the hopeless fortunes of his exiled master, by an ignominious death in a retired part of these gardens.

In our way from the Luxembourg to the Palais Royal, we met with a curious specimen of French politeness. We stopped at a celebrated patissier's, in order to refresh ourselves with some ices, in which the confectioners of Paris undoubtedly excel. They had none; and we were all turning to leave the place, when every one in the room—the mistress, the waiters, and her customers together, burst into a loud laugh at our disappointment, which was kept up while we got into the carriage.—As I put my foot upon the step, however, I could not but look round to repay the compliment, and we drove off not a little amused with such a sample of the polished manners of the French.

The Palais Royal is an immense mass of buildings—but more remarkable for the beings that haunt it, and the scenes exhibited nightly within its walls, than for the beauty of its architecture, or the vastness of its dimensions, though, in these particulars, it holds a respectable station amongst the palaces of Paris. It is the property of the Duke of Orleans, but a part of it only is inhabited by him. The rest, comprising an immense parallelogram of uniform and massive building, with shops and piazzas on the ground floor, is devoted to business, to pleasure, and to vice. Within the area, are gravel walks and grass plots, the resort of the idle by day, and the vicious by night. In the centre, a noble fountain throws up its sparkling waters, and gives, to the variegated groups that saunter round it, an air of refreshing coolness, amid the dust and heat of a summer noon.

The shops in the Palais Royal are chiefly for the sale of jewellery, clocks, toys, &c. Many of the articles they exhibit are extremely rich and curious. There are musical snuff-boxes of most exquisite workmanship—magnificent and beautiful time-pieces of classical design, and of the purest alabaster—watches, emblazoned, enamelled, and studded with pearl, to awaken the envy, and adorn the persons of the fair—and, in short, every device that ingenuity could conceive, or patient industry execute.

These articles, however, are by no means cheap, considering the duty to which, on importation into England, they are liable. One hundred and fifty Napoleons was the price of a snuff-box, set with diamonds, from which, on opening the lid, there started up a beautiful little bird, that sung a sweet tune, and then suddenly disappeared. With such toys as these the wily Parisians amuse John Bull in his visits to their capital—the temptation is irresistible—and few, perhaps, repair to the piazzas of the Palais Royal, without leaving some substantial memorial of their visit in the hands of one of these skilful artificers.

The first floor is chiefly composed of coffee-houses, eating-rooms, and apartments for gambling; while the upper stories exhibit scenes of licensed debauchery, beyond the power of the filthiest pen to describe. Pleasure, impurity, and fraud, seem to have made this their strongest hold—their favourite resort. From these haunts of villany—these last retreats of the ruined and the desperate, the flames of the revolution were abundantly supplied with fuel. Many a frantic monster, during that dreadful period, rushed from these cells of infamy, raging like a demon from the bottomless pit, to scatter around him "firebrands, arrows, and death"—to exult in the ghastly spectacles of the guillotine—to laugh amid the shrieks of the Abbaye, and to shout vive la nation, vive la republique, as the warm blood of his neighbours and friends, perhaps even of his kindred, flowed at his feet! And still this nest of impurity retains its dreadful pre-eminence above all other haunts of vice; and many an unhappy youth, cursing the hour that he entered its infernal gates, in darkness and despair, hurries from its gambling table or its brothel, to consummate his misery in the waters of the Seine.—Of this fatal issue, melancholy instances are perpetually occurring. A building is appropriated for the reception of the bodies discovered in the river; and scarcely a morning dawns that does not add to the disgusting group, and bring some broken-hearted parent to recognize the lifeless body of a lost and ruined child!

The quantity of vice in Paris is, indeed, immense, and its varieties are almost unbounded. Every species of impurity and crime that can or cannot be conceived, is perpetrated here without apprehension or restraint, and I have heard of things at which decency crimsons and humanity turns pale, as by no means rare or secret, but of notorious and habitual occurrence in its haunts of vice. To speak of a "state of morals," in connexion with such a condition of society, were only to degrade the term. They seem to have no moral sense—no external standard or inward perception, or feeling of right and wrong. Inclination and expediency appear to be the two great laws by which they act, and whatever these may dictate they immediately perform—"working all manner of iniquity with greediness." I speak not of robbery and murder, or the vulgar vices of intemperance—for these they seem to have but little taste, and drunkenness seldom disgraces their streets, but refer chiefly to the vices that connect with avarice and lust—that gather round the gaming-table, and crowd within the precincts of the brothel. Still, however, these, black and abominable as they are, under any circumstances, do not stalk abroad, as in some cities of the Continent, at noon-day, and utter their horrible shibboleth—their dialect of death in your ears as you pass along the streets, but they abide in their own execrable haunts, and await, in the deep recesses of their polluted temples, the coming of devotees to their accursed shrines.

From this circumstance, the city of Paris appears to be more pure than it really is.—You may walk up and down its public streets and most frequented avenues without offence or disgust—pity, indeed, may be excited, at the frivolity, and gaiety of a people, who, if they felt their national degradation before their fellow men, and their moral delinquency in the sight of God, would clothe themselves in sackcloth, and weep, if it were possible, in the anguish of their spirit, tears of blood. But what they are in the sight of God, is a thought, perhaps, that never occurs to them. With regard to the estimation in which surrounding nations hold them, however, they seem to have some concern. Yet, even here, their natural gaiety comes in to their relief. They know that they are an enslaved and conquered people, and they groan, inwardly, beneath the oppression of foreign armies, subsisting on their soil.—Yet still they talk and laugh themselves into a persuasion that they are independent—that they were never subdued—that they freely recalled the present sovereign and his family to the throne—that they are contented and happy beneath his reign—and thus they dream and talk of freedom while they wear the fetters, and dance, like the maniac, in their chains. The wise and the prudent amongst them, it is true, think and speak differently.—"We know," say they, "that we are enslaved—your armies keep the Bourbons on the throne—we were willing to resign the former leader, but not willing to take your choice of a successor. It is an insufferable degradation, that other nations should guide the destinies of France—and insulted and vanquished as we are—prisoners in our own country—with foreign armies consuming our produce, and forbidding the expression of our feelings—is it to be imagined that we can endure all this unmoved, and not, in the silence imposed upon us, meditate revenge?"

What I have written is not what I have supposed to be the feelings of the thoughtful and intelligent, but is the substance of a conversation with a man, whose rank and information give weight to his opinions.

LETTER X.

Paris.

My Dear ——

I alluded, in my last, to the feeling that prevails amongst the thoughtful and enlightened, respecting the present state of France. To what I then said, I ought to add, that the general impression is in favour of the King. He is considered a mild and benignant prince—anxious for the welfare of his people.—But alas! the people are restless and turbulent, and a monarch of less amiable qualities would suit them better. The exploits and enterprises of their former ruler have rendered them a martial people—their ears have been accustomed to the shouts of victory—their eyes to the pomp and splendour of military spectacles—and their vanity has been flattered by the spoils of conquered nations collected in their capital. Destitute, then, of that moral principle which exults when the wrongs of the injured are redressed—and those domestic habits and attachments which are favourable to the cultivation of the arts of peace, how can it be expected that they should sit down at once, contented in the tranquillity that has settled on the ruins of their independence—that throws them back upon themselves to brood upon their national degradation—and gives them leisure to contemplate the proud and giddy eminence from which they have fallen. It must be expected, that after the cessation of such a tempest, a considerable agitation should long be felt, and it will be well, indeed, if the elements are not gathering strength for another storm. Perhaps, while the present monarch lives, no immediate danger need be apprehended. If he should adopt a liberal and enlightened policy—if he should unshackle himself from the fetters which a superstitious and a mercenary priesthood are striving, but too successfully, to rivet on him—if he should adopt efficient plans for the instruction of the rising generation in the principles of the Bible, which are those of morality, loyalty, and peace—and if God, by whom kings rule and princes decree justice, should spare him for a few years, to foster and to cherish these wise and salutary measures, the danger will be greatly lessened. By the influence of such an education, pure and upright principles will be instilled into the minds of the rising population—domestic virtues will be inculcated, and domestic habits formed—the national character will become more benevolent and mild—and the people, recovered from the wild and feverish dreams of anarchy and conquest, will learn how much more conducive to their real interests and genuine happiness, is the calm and steady process of affairs, beneath the auspices of a legitimate and paternal prince, than the impetuous torrent that hurried them along, in wild and giddy transport, in the guilty schemes and boundless projects of a proud usurper.

With respect to the other branches of the family, except, perhaps, the amiable, but superstitious, Duchess D'Angouleme, the public feeling is by no means as favourable. It is to be feared, therefore, that the death of the present monarch, should it happen before the public mind is more generally tranquillized and settled, would bring a dreadful day to France! I should not wish to be in Paris, at that period.—There is certainly no great love for the English in the breasts of our French neighbours—nor can it be expected that there should be. They tolerate us, however, for our money—they feel the circulation of our cash throughout their capital, and they are contented for a season, to bury their deep-rooted animosity in their coffers, while they return us secret curses for the wealth we squander. Here and there, they show their spite in ridiculous caricatures, and theatrical exhibitions, with, now and then, a haughty look and a disdainful sneer—like the snarling of the mastiff at the hands that supply his food and rivet his chain!—But, if ever the mastiff should get loose, wo to the objects of his long-smothered and deeply-cherished hate. Much, indeed, of the cringing servility of the French manners is gone. The immense crowds of clerks and apprentices, and coarse and unmannerly clodhoppers, who, fired with the ambition of seeing foreign parts, and laughing at the French, have poured into the Boulevards, and jostled through the streets of Paris—swearing and blustering at the waiters in the cafès and restaurateurs—exclaiming against extortion and imposition in the shops of the tradesmen, and, not unfrequently, taking what they call French leave, without a sufficient token of remembrance in an unpaid reckoning left behind—have much sunk the English character in their estimation. Milord Anglais is a sound at present but seldom heard—at least my ears have not been saluted with it—and our countrymen are unquestionably held in very different estimation now, to what they were before the revolution, when every Englishman that travelled on the continent, was received with the respect and honours of a prince.

With regard to the higher classes of society, this observation cannot apply. The superior sort of English move about in their carriages, and reside, chiefly, at their hotels—and if they mix in company at all, it is, of course, in that of their own rank.

One is very much struck, in walking through the streets and public places of Paris, with the number of men that meet you with orders of knighthood in their coat. The sentinels on duty are almost constantly in action, presenting arms to them as they pass along, for every one that wears the insignia receives this honour. But some of them are mean and contemptible enough in their appearance: and I have scarcely seen one, by a comparison with whom, any of our city knights, much as they are despised, might not deem himself degraded. Indeed, poverty and splendour—nobility and meanness, seem to be constant companions here, and, I am told, that a court day at the Thuileries, presents some curious illustrations of the combinations. The noblesse of the old régime have been restored, many of them, to their titles, but alas! few to their estates. The lean kine that rose up from the troubled sea of anarchy and blood, have devoured them—and the unhappy fugitives, on their return, receive again the empty title, and the proud insignia, but not the full purse, and the fair domain. Hence, many a peer may be observed, creeping down from an upper room in one of the dark and narrow lanes of this crowded city, and with his bag-wig and sword, making the best of his way through the muddy streets, to the audience-chamber of his prince. But is it not in the power of the monarch to relieve them by a comfortable place, or a more comfortable pension?—Alas! there are so many to be served—and there is so little to spare. On the one hand, the harpies of the church are so clamorous—on the other, the members of his own family—those that have not, are so eager to get, those that have, are so anxious to retain—the public coffers are so exhausted, and so immense an army is still to be maintained—while there are no resources now to be anticipated from the plunder of other nations, or the lawful spoils of war—that many, it is to be feared, have no brighter prospect, than to drag on the declining years of life in splendid misery—stealing, more like spectres than men, about the palaces their ancestors contributed to rear, and exiled from the mansions in which their better days of childhood and of youth were passed in gaiety and splendour.

LETTER XI.

Paris.

My dear ——

A circumstance occurred just before our arrival here, the lesson to be derived from which is very obvious—caution. An American gentleman, a friend of Dr. K.'s, has been residing in Paris for some time, for the purpose of study. He has always, in his own country, and especially here, avoided any interference in politics, or expression of political sentiment, and has devoted himself entirely and exclusively to literary pursuits. As he sat at breakfast, however, not many mornings ago, four gendarmes entered his room, and, demanding his keys, instantly proceeded to examine his papers. Finding nothing of a suspicious nature amongst them, they turned to his books, and meeting with some volumes in Arabic, they instantly seized them, concluding, no doubt, that nothing but sedition and treason could be concealed under such strange and outlandish characters, and were proceeding with their wonderful discovery to the police, when the gentleman exhorted them to look on the covers of the book. They did so, and there, to their astonishment, beheld the royal arms. They had, in fact, come out of the royal library. At sight of these indisputable proofs of innocence, at least so far as the volumes in question were concerned, they relinquished their prey, and left the agitated student with a caution, saying, that so long as he should continue in Paris, he must consider himself as under the surveillance of the police!*

The American gentlemen here, many of them, wear eagles in their hats. The emblem is mistaken for that of Napoleon, and hence terrible fracas frequently arise. One occurred this morning at the gate of the gardens of the Thuileries. The sentinel on duty snatched at the eagle, to tear it from his hat, as the American passed. The American thereupon planted his clenched fist in the soldier's face—a scuffle ensued, they fell, others came to mingle in the fray, and words and blows were dealt unsparingly, by more than the original combatants. What was the issue I have not heard. There can be little doubt, however, but that the American would obtain redress, for the action of the sentinel must be considered as a violation of both decency and duty. All this happened just under the windows of the palace.

We took horses, and rode this morning to the heights of Montmartre, a name and a spot pregnant with disgrace and infamy to France, and which they would gladly obliterate for ever from the annals of their history, and the surface of their soil. From the top of the telegraph, which we ascended for the sake of the prospect, is a magnificent view of the city on the one hand, with its adjacent woods and gardens, and highly cultivated fields and orchards, and on the other, immense plains, stretching to an almost imperceptible horizon, with the venerable towers of St. Dennis, the ancient burying place of the kings of France, in the distance. We found the man who keeps the telegraph intelligent and communicative; but you will feel as little interested in reading, as I should be in writing, could I correctly record it, all he told us of the movements of the allied armies, whose advance to the gates of Paris, by this place, fixed an indelible stain upon the military character of France, and, at the same time, put the FINIS to the career of the usurper's glory. For the afterpiece, which terminated on the plains of Waterloo, and whence the actor retired to his lonely dwelling on the ocean, had more the appearance of a galvanic struggle, a convulsive after-pang, than the cool and steady efforts which express the functions, and bespeak the influence of a principle of life. The houses about Montmartre are mean, though it is to Paris, what Everton is to Liverpool, or Highgate to London. But the houses of the wealthy here are all immured in courts, and shut in from the view of every object, by enormous gates, just like Burlington House, in Piccadilly—only that the courts are far less spacious, and the streets far less wide. They seem but partially to appreciate the beauties of prospect, the advantages of situation, or the salubrity of air. They have nothing like our neat country boxes, and genteel and pleasant villages, scattered here and there, within a few miles round the city—to which the wealthy tradesman might repair, to enjoy, in domestic retirement, a sweet seclusion from the noise and bustle of the great metropolis. But they all live—princes and peers, artists and literati, tradesmen and merchants—crowded together in tall and thickly-inhabited houses—close and narrow streets, filled with perpetual bustle and incessant din, with no relaxation, but a stroll in the Champs Elysées, or the public gardens—and no amusement or variety, but that which is derived from the café or the theatre—the cards or the dice—the light and airy forms of dissipation that flutter in the Boulevards, or the more desperate and determined fiends of vice that brood in the deep recesses of the Palais Royal. And even if they leave the city, and ramble a few miles into the adjacent country, it is to some one of those scenes of pleasure or receptacles of vice, with which the environs abound, and without which, even the beauties of nature, and the freshness of the air, would have but little to captivate and charm!*

* This reminds me of a curious fact, which was related to me by a foreigner from the North of Europe, and which occurred while he was at Bourdeaux, during the reign of Buonaparte. As it illustrates the state of perfection to which the system of espionage was carried at that time, I am induced to record it here. A party sat down to dinner at a public table, when a gentleman sticking his fork into a fowl, began to dissect it, and as he cut off the head, he said, with a laugh, "Here goes the head of the Emperor."—No observation was made, and they proceeded with their dinner; but in the course of it, the waiter came, and, tapping the gentleman on the shoulder, told him, he was wanted in the hall. On entering the hall, he was accosted by a gendarme, who asked him, if he was not the gentleman who, in cutting off the head of a fowl at dinner, had said, "Here goes the head of the Emperor"—he replied he was, but "What of that"—"You must come," said the gendarme, "with me."—"With you,"—he exclaimed, and putting his hand to his pocket, presented it full of money to the officer, and was turning away—"Stay," said the man, "I am not to be thus dealt with—you must instantly obey my summons." "Alas!" said the gentleman, "am I then to be torn from my wife and children, and hurried to a dungeon, for such a trifle as that—my life and liberty are most precious and important to my family—I will give you—" and he named an enormous sum, "to liberate me, and for ever conceal the affair" "No," said the inflexible gendarme. "I am above the largest bribe you can offer, and you must instantly go, for I dare not parley with you any longer." The gentleman then took a card from his pocket, which he held up to the view of the gendarme, who immediately made his obeisance to him, and departed.—Now the fact is, the gentleman himself was a superintendent of these spies. The waiter at the tavern was in the pay of Government—he made the observation respecting the head of the emperor in the hearing of the waiter to prove his vigilance—he was true to his charge, and directly apprized one of the gendarmes of the seditious and treasonable words that had escaped from the stranger's lips.—He then tempted the gendarme with those liberal offers, and finding him faithful, his object was accomplished; and informing him, by the card which he carried about him, and which bore the secret sign, who he was, there the matter ended, to the satisfaction of all the parties concerned.—Who would live in such a land as this!

Perhaps the secret of all this, in a great measure, is, that there is nothing like domestic life in Paris. You will hardly find a comfortable family circle there. Marriages are, for the most part, contracts formed for convenience and not for love. From such connexions, what can be expected but alienation and distance—infidelity and adultery.—Accordingly, I am informed it is no uncommon thing in Paris, for a married woman to have what is called her L'ami de maison, who visits her as often as he pleases, without any interruption from the lady's lawful husband—to whom the boudoir of his mistress is always sacred—and who is so necessary an evil in the house, a thing so generally tolerated, that, in many cases, he actually bears his part in the expenses of the establishment. The lady, of course, allows to her husband the liberty she takes, and he is sent abroad to find a similar post of honour in some other house, to that which he suffers the beloved of his wife to occupy in his own. From such a state of things, therefore, every shadow of domestic intercourse and association is excluded. A family table is seldom spread—a family circle is seldom gathered.—They repair to the restaurateurs to dine—to the cafés for coffee, and to the theatre, or even worse resorts, for the evening's occupation and amusement. Thus they live in public—eat and drink in public—and one might almost imagine, from their fondness for publicity that they would sleep in public—or never sleep at all.—Pleasure—exhibition, and intrigue, seem to be the great ends of their existence.—To the nobler pursuits and occupations, that become a rational, accountable, and immortal creature, they seem utterly lost. With the being of a God, or a future state, there is nothing, above ground, in Paris, that has the remotest connexion, except, indeed, the churches, which are the haunts of the deadliest superstition, and consecrated to the pompous worship of the image of the beast.—From the classic air of the public edifices, and the mingled superstition and impurity of the people, one might almost fancy one's self in ancient Athens, surrounded by a thousand temples and a thousand altars conceerated to the deities of lust and pleasure: and a population, the fundamental maxim of whose practical, if not avowed atheism, is ever present to their mind, and ever operative in their conduct,—Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die!

But I have been almost unconsciously, led to the same disgusting topic, upon which, I fear, I have already dwelt too long in a former letter. To a superficial observer, perhaps, one who merely contemplates the city of Paris, through the medium of its works of arts, or scenes of gaiety and amusement, the pictures I have drawn may seem too strongly marked and deeply coloured—but it can be so regarded only by a superficial observer. For my own part, my heart sickens at the review of what I have written, when I think how far beneath the reality any description, of which my pen is capable, must be. The circumstance that the grosser forms of vice are wanting in the public haunts, mark, if possible, a deeper dereliction of principle, and renders the scene more dangerous. In our own metropolis, alas! there is enough of vice, and crimes are perpetrated of the deepest die.—But, then, vice is recognised as vice and shunned and abhorred by virtue.—It keeps its own form, uses its own language, and preserves its own limits.—But here, vice has the language and the forms of virtue—walks hand in hand with virtue—is adorned with the same attire—admitted into the same society—occupies the same seat—and, I had almost said reposes on the same couch.—She is to be found in the shop of the respectable tradesman, in forms that in London would be shrouded with the greatest secresy, or, if discovered, brand the vender with deserved infamy—but here, the softer sex become the ministers of lust, by exposing them to such as choose to purchase, and that too with unblushing countenance, as if they were the simplest articles of lawful commerce—the fine arts have lent their aid to decorate and adorn the monster, and to give a soft and classic air to her most disgusting expressions—while the brilliant genius and the exuberant imagination of the author, have invested it as with dazzling gems and a gorgeous robe.——

But all these considerations apart—it is enough for a man that has any principle of religion, or integrity, or humanity within him, to walk the streets of Paris, and reflect, that he is passing through a city, in which, a little more than a quarter of a century ago, the oracles of God were publicly disowned, the Christian Sabbath utterly abolished, reason elevated to the throne of the Supreme, and liberty declared to be the only God—that he is surrounded by a people, who, after having embrued their hands in the blood of their lawful prince, and filled their capital with enormities, at the recital of which, the whole civilized world shuddered with a thrilling horror, while all was consecrated by the sacred name of liberty and freedom—at length placed the crown they had dashed to the earth upon an upstart's brow, and fell prostrate, in all the abjectness of submission, to lick the dust beneath the despot's feet.—A people, that followed at his beck through seas of blood, intoxicated with spoil and glutted with gore, while they yielded to him as to their destiny, and plighted their homage to him as their God—till the great ruler of the nations was pleased to reverse his fortune, and who then, with one consent, abandoned him to his fate—an exile on the ocean, and the shadow of a king.—A people too, who could repeat their servility and their treachery, when his fortunes brightened once again, and again grew dark—and who are now sunk in the arms of superstition and sensuality, as deep, as deadly, and as gross, as that from whose embrace they rushed to the wild extremes of anarchy, and the cold breast of atheism—I say these reflections are enough to quicken the footsteps of a man, who has the fear of God or the principles of humanity within him, lest the earth should open, and swallow up a city which has been the theatre of such enormities, and is still the haunt of such pollution and impiety!

LETTER XII.

Paris.

My dear ———

We dined to day at Veres, in the Palais Royal, the most celebrated Restaurateur's in Paris. Our object was to have a fair specimen of French cookery, of which one has heard so much; and also to observe the mode of proceeding in one of these temples dedicated to luxury and appetite. We were rather early, and amongst the first of the devotees: thus we had leisure to survey the scene, and make our observations on the place. Everything here is contrived for effect, and art has done her utmost to give to the eating-house an air of gaiety and elegance. On entering the room, the first object that arrested our attention was the mistress, a young and beautiful woman, most elegantly dressed, reclining at her ease on an elevated seat, commanding a view of the spacious apartment. There was nothing of the coarseness, and hurry, and officiousness of the landlady about her—but delicate, dignified, and easy, she seemed as if enthroned, the presiding genius of the place.—Around her the waiters gather to receive her orders, and to make reports, from time to time, of the progress of affairs; while from the mirrors that surround the room, and reflect the parties, in a most amazing variety, upon each other, she can perceive, almost at one glance, how all her customers are occupied. The next thing to which our attention was drawn, as you will naturally suppose, was the carte, or bill of fare, at the immensity of which, a London epicure—a city alderman, would have started! What a boundless variety!—Fish, flesh, and fowl—rôti, bouilli—fricassée—fricandeau—soups—sauces—inconceivable combinations—indescribable compositions—unutterable names—"earth, air, and ocean plundered of their sweets," and all decked out, combined—adorned—and wrought up to the highest pitch of flavour and of goût, to quicken the most languishing appetite, and win the admiration of the most fastidious epicure. The time advanced—the devotees came in—the shrine of the divinity, for such the fair one that presided seemed, was surrounded, and the mysteries began. The tables were rapidly filled, and as quickly covered, and every party seemed determined and prepared to do his best in discharging the duties and honours of the place. I observed that most performed their part with astonishing rapidity—plate after plate was quickly emptied—dish after dish was rapidly discussed and dismissed—glass after glass of hermitage or burgundy, from the bottle, placed, for coolness, in a vessel filled with ice, thrown off; and, in truth, with all the elegance and refinement with which it was tempered, there seemed to be as great a quantum of actual, downright gormandizing in this temple of luxury, as I ever witnessed in any of the chop-houses about the precincts of St. Paul's. Nor were we altogether inactive; appetite received an additional stimulus from curiosity, and many things were tasted for the sake of ascertaining what could be contained beneath the disguise of names and forms that had never saluted the eye or the ear before. The wines were excellent, and the whole was crowned with a sample of the costly liqueurs, and a rich dessert.

* What I have here written is from my own observation, and the observation of others, better informed than myself. Merchant's Guide to Paris, indeed, informs us of a few villages, remarkable for their commanding prospects and the beauty of their villas, to which the merchants of the capital resort. They must bear, however, a very small proportion to the population of the city, and be very different in their character to the generality of buildings which I have seen in its neighbourhood. I am still of opinion, that, in the vicinity of Paris, the neat, snug, compact cit's country box, which bespeaks domestic comfort, and the rational enjoyment of well-earned competence, is utterly unknown.

I was not a little amused and interested with the scene; not merely from its novelty and gaiety, but because it also added another feature to that expression of national character, a correct and lively remembrance of which I am anxious to retain. Still, selfishness, sensuality, and vanity prevail. Coarse as they deem the English, and refined as we consider the French, I question whether any tavern in London could produce such a bill of fare as that at Veres, though all the cooks of the metropolis should lay their heads together for months, unless assisted by some of their continental brethren in the culinary art. They seem to have studied, if one may so speak, the philosophy of cookery, and to have applied no ordinary knowledge, in the principles of chemical combination, for the pampering of the appetite. Nor, in this gratification of the palate, does their fondness for display and publicity seem to be neglected. By the artful distribution of the mirrors, in the panels of the room, the groups are multiplied, almost to infinity. Every glance of the eye gives to you some animated party, with all the gesture and grimace of the flattery or compliment that may be passing at the time, or in all the deep devotion to the matter in hand, for which a Frenchman can consent for awhile to suspend even these—and thus they have the satisfaction to know that they are seen by almost every eye, without encountering the vulgar gaze of any individual to whom they might directly turn. Here too, the ladies mingle with the gentlemen, without confusion or timidity—a novel sight, indeed, to an English eye! Madame le Countesse sits beside Monsieur le Count, at one table—an English barber, who has come to Paris to see the fashions, and must of course dine for once at Veres, with his party, perhaps, occupies another—while people of all ranks and characters, or no rank and character at all, meet and mingle in the motley crowd—talk—laugh—eat—drink—look gallantry at each other—and then turn out to meet the kindling glories of the Palais Royal—where pleasure lights her thousand lamps, decks her in gay attire, puts on her bewitching charms, unfolds her deep recesses, and waits to lure her victim to the verge of ruin—till, dazzled with the blaze, and giddy with the constant whirl, reason, thought, reflection, all forsake him—and yielding to the delirium of delight, without an effort of resistance, he is engulfed in the dread abyss.—"Oh! my soul, come not thou into their secret, to such mine honour be not thou united,"—"whoso end is destruction—whose God is their belly—whose glory is their shame—who mind earthly things."

This morning we visited the edifice appropriated to the meetings of the Institute of France. Although this institution may be considered in its infancy, not having existed more than eleven years, yet it has attained a high degree of eminence amongst the learned societies of Europe. It is divided into four classes—the first, devoted to the study of natural philosophy, chemistry, and the mathematics—the second, to the cultivation of French literature—the third, to history and ancient literature; and the fourth, to the fine arts. It comprises the most eminent literary and scientific characters of the day, and corresponds with the learned of every nation. We had introductions to some of its members, especially to Baron Silvestre de Sacy, and the Chevalier Langlès, Professors of Oriental Literature. To the polite attentions of the last-mentioned gentleman, we were greatly indebted. The lecture room is a very good one, it is the only room I saw worth mentioning. It is, however, altogether, a noble pile, worthy the purpose to which it is devoted. The front is a semicircle, with a fine dome in the centre, which is not the least ornamental object amongst the many that adorn this majestic city.

From the Institute we proceeded to the Royal Library. Here, in this immense depot of learning and of art, are three hundred and fifty-eight thousand printed books, in all languages, and seventy-two thousand volumes of manuscripts and public records—besides five thousand volumes, containing the works of the most eminent engravers from the invention of the art to the present time.

The library is open to the public, who enjoys its advantages without trouble or expense. I was truly interested to see how good a use is made of so great a privilege. There were several hundreds of persons reading in the different rooms—many seemed busy in making extracts from the books, and the librarians appeared to be very attentive in providing the volumes as they were wanted.

No wonder that France possesses so many authors and scientific men, when the rich treasures of learning and of art are thus freely open to all ranks of people, and the meanest plebeian can as much avail himself of their inestimable treasures as the monarch or the peer. Paris has much the advantage of London in this respect. Besides, that she is much richer in these things, she is also much more free in the exposure of her intellectual wealth. No Englishman can visit the French capital without making the comparison, and feeling its force.—It is true, that the British Museum, and Somerset House are open to the public, but then, in the former, you are paraded through the rooms in groups, with a man in office by your side, and no opportunity afforded for observation or for study—and in the latter the admission is not free.—But in the Louvre—in the Jardin des Plantes—in the Royal Library, you go as often and stay as long as you please—no one interrupts or questions you—and you feel as though, to all the purposes of use and of enjoyment, every object that you contemplate were your own.

It is rather humiliating, however, to be obliged, in some measure to account for this difference, by a difference of national character and propensity. In the first place, there is not such an interest in the works of literature and art pervading the public mind in England, as in France. The great mass of the population, with us, care but little about them—their taste is of a far less refined and exalted character; and the common people in London had much rather give eighteen-pence to see the wild beasts at Exeter 'Change, or some of the gay exhibitions at Bartholomew fair, than the pictures in Somerset House, or the minerals in the British Museum. But, in Paris, the lowest orders of society are tinctured with a love of philosophy, and fired with the admiration of the arts—and the meanest stalls in the Boulevards and upon the quays, contain literary treasures, and specimens of art, to attract the scholar and interest the connoisseur. I need only instance a book stall close by the gate of our hotel, where, amongst a good deal of trash, is a splendid copy of Rapin's History of England, in the original French, with remarkably fine impressions of the plates, and handsomely bound in twelve to fifteen volumes quarto. This work I could purchase, perhaps, for forty francs—the man asks but fifty for it: and the other day I was detained nearly half an hour looking over a stall near the Institute, whence I might have procured some rich materials for my projected museum, at a very moderate price. There were many Chinese and Oriental deities, many gems and curious specimens in mineralogy, and a vast variety of interesting and valuable curiosities. But London has no such allurements for the virtuosi as they traverse her streets; and, with the exception of a few respectable booksellers, who expose their books on stalls before their windows, there is little to be met with but toys, and gingerbread, and rubbish. Can anything more strongly mark the public taste than this? But another reason why these receptacles of literature and art are thus freely thrown open to all ranks in Paris, may be, because the people in Paris never abuse the privilege. Nothing is purloined, or touched, or injured. The propensity to meddle and deface, much less to steal, is unknown. There is no rudeness, or roughness, or incivility in the company, though they may be of the lowest class; and if it were possible for the whole population of the metropolis to pass through the galleries in a single morning, and examine every interesting object they contain, the probability is, that not one of them would sustain the slightest injury or receive a single spot. Unhappily, this is not the case with us. The lower classes of the English are a meddling people—they are impelled by curiosity, and not by the love of science, in their investigations; they must know the inside and the substance of everything; and even in classes of society, where the mere vulgar feeling of curiosity could not be supposed to operate, the violation of the tenth commandment has sometimes been followed by a violation of the eighth, and the breach of the sixth has succeeded in cases where mutilation is absolute destruction. It is a grievous thing that there should be any bar upon what literary and scientific treasures and resources a country may possess, and a lamentable thing, indeed, that the rudeness of an idle and ignorant curiosity, a propensity for pilfering, or a love of mischief, should operate, in any measure, as the cause.

A profound silence reigns in those galleries of the library devoted to study, and the strangers who visit them, merely for the gratification of their curiosity, are expected not to interrupt it. Amongst the objects that arrest the attention, is a curious model of the hill of Parnassus, with the geniuses of France at different stages of the ascent—Louis XIV. being in the character of Apollo on the summit; a fine bronze statue of Voltaire; a plan of the Pyramids of Egypt, in relief; and an immense pair of globes, constructed by Coronelli, the famous mathematician and geographer, who was employed by Cardinal d'Estrées to make globes for Louis XIV. They are the largest he constructed, and were painted by the celebrated artist Le Brun. They are eighteen English feet in diameter, and stand in a room built on purpose to receive them. They are considered as being rather curious than useful. They have been put up about twenty years. Amongst the MSS. are many ancient copies of various portions of the Scriptures. With these, you may suppose, I was deeply interested.—Here is a MS. of the Epistles of St. Paul, written so early as the seventh century—it is called the Codex Regis. Here is also a MS. of the four Gospels, written in the eighth century. I was much struck with a beautiful MS. in letters of gold, of the fourth or fifth century, but I could not make out what it was, and I had no one at hand to inform me, as I had lingered long behind the rest of my party, to gratify a taste, which, in this instance, seemed peculiar to myself. We, however, are fully as rich in treasures of this kind, by far the most precious of all that antiquity has yielded us—for the Alexandrine manuscript in the British Museum, which was written, perhaps, about the fourth or fifth century; and the Codex Besæ, in the University of Cambridge, which is considered, by some, of equal, if not higher antiquity, are probably the oldest MSS. of any portion of the Scriptures in the world.

In the Cabinet of Antiques are some very rich and curious articles. I particularly noticed a vase of one of the Ptolemies—an immense agate, deemed the finest in the world, richly carved, brought from Jerusalem——but there would be no end to an enumeration of these things!———

Amongst the National Institutions of Paris, there is none more interesting than the Hotel des Invalides. It is for the reception of old soldiers, on the plan of our Greenwich and Chelsea Hospitals. As a building it is, upon the whole, inferior to Greenwich, but the church, with its magnificent and gilded dome, surpasses anything that Greenwich can boast. The church is exceedingly spacious, and the dome immense. It is covered with beautiful paintings on the stone, representing the battles of Louis XIV. which, viewed from below, have the appearance of the most exquisite tapestry. Round this dome were hung the colours which had been taken from the enemy. They exceeded three thousand in number—and such was the enthusiasm of the hardy veterans, who repose within the asylum from the toils of war, and many of whom had bled to gain these trophies of military glory, that when the Allies entered the capital, rather than see them retaken, they tore them down and committed them to the flames. The dome and the spire that rises from it are gilded without. This was the whim of Buonaparte, and 'tis said he caught the idea from the Kremlin at Moscow. Some are of opinion that it is an instance of bad taste in the ex-emperor, and greatly disfigures the building. Certainly, when near, and viewed individually, it has a gingerbread and tawdry appearance, and does not harmonize with the general sobriety of the edifice—but when viewed at a distance, blended with the many spires and domes of this magnificent city, it has a fine effect, and gives an air of splendour to the whole picture, of which it then constitutes a part. In the front of the Hotel is a magnificent vista to the Seine. On either side are rich plantations, beneath whose shade it was the intention of Napoleon to have placed the statue of every celebrated hero of ancient and modern times. Thus the worn-out soldier might have passed the evening of his days in a military elysium, communing with the shades of the illustrious dead; while succeeding generations would have been roused to emulate their deeds of glory, by these tokens of national admiration and gratitude.

The number of inhabitants in the Hotel des Invalides, is at present four thousand men, besides three hundred officers. We saw the tables laid out in the hall where the officers were about to dine.—They were circular tables, capable of accommodating a party of a dozen each. Everything was very neat and clean, and the whole economy of the institution appeared to be judicious and well conducted.

There is another institution at Paris, of a more private nature, indeed, than the last, but the principle of which is well worthy attention. It is an asylum for the aged. Every individual who has paid a certain small sum, by monthly instalments, from the age of ten years, increasing gradually, and regularly advanced, till the whole amount raised from each contributor is about £50 may, at the age of seventy, claim as a right the benefit of the institution, which allows to each a separate bed-room, with a sitting-room between two. They dine in a common hall, and their table is amply furnished with plain and wholesome food. There is also connected with the establishment an hospital, where the sick have every necessary attendance, and the best medical advice.

From the Hotel des Invalides we proceeded to the Pantheon. It is called a church, but it has not much the appearance of a sacred edifice. It is an immense pile, and in the finest style of classic elegance and grandeur. It was reared as a mausoleum for the ashes, and a temple for the monuments of the illustrious men of France—and the edifice is well worthy the purpose to which it is dedicated. It is built in the form of a cross, and has a dome of vast dimensions. We ascended to the gallery that surrounds it, from whence, perhaps, is enjoyed the finest view of the capital. It is certainly superior to that from Montmartre, as the principal objects are nearer, and the panorama is complete. We were much astonished at the purity of the atmosphere, though it was the middle of the day, and we were in the centre of an immense metropolis. Every building in Paris was as distinctly seen, as if the sun had but just risen upon it, and not one of its teeming population had been awake. This is owing, in a great measure, to the burning of wood, besides, that the atmosphere is much purer in itself. How unlike the view from the top of St. Paul's, in London.—There, every building is black with smoke, and you look down as upon the steam and mist of a boiling and tumultuous sea. But, from this elevation in Paris, nothing can exceed the magnificence and grandeur that everywhere press upon the eye. There is no uncertainty, or indistinctness, or confusion in the view. Every palace, and every temple, and every public edifice stands before you in its own individual majesty, and urges its peculiar claims upon your admiration and respect, as though it were the only object worth remarking in the scene: while the complete panorama, the coup d'œil, surpasses anything I had ever imagined of a majestic city, and such as, in ruins, I could not but conceive, would rival Palmyra or Persepolis of old: for the ordinary houses being all of stone, unsullied by a smoky atmosphere, uniform and lofty, and relieved by distance—their massive clusters and prolonged perspective, give them the appearance of distinct and separate edifices—while the palaces themselves, occupying so large a portion of the space—the mighty length of the Louvre—the gay pavilions of the Thuileries—the brilliant dome of the Hotel des Invalides, mingling with innumerable other roofs, and domes, and spires, and beautiful facades, and varied lines of architecture, stretching along the banks of the Seine, encircled by the magic groves of the Boulevards, intermingled with the bright foliage of innumerable gardens—and presenting the chaste and spotless grandeur of stone wrought after the noblest models, and white as from the quarry, in contrast with the more sober aspect and deeper hues of the surrounding country—altogether compose a spectacle that transfixes the spectator in astonishment, and calls up the most powerful and affecting associations to the contemplative mind. Where are the hands that reared these palaces—and, when another hundred years have rolled away, where will be the men who inhabit and frequent them?—This vast population that breathe and move beneath me—and whose noise ascends like the throbbings of the heart of a mighty empire: what are their pursuits—their expectations—and their aims?—They are immortal—there is a life beyond the grave—there is another city and a fairer land! Are they alive to their high and eternal destiny—are they conscious of their responsibility at the tribunal of God—are they seeking the riches—the enjoyments—the habitations—and the honours of another world? It is said of Xerxes, that he wept when he surveyed the millions that surrounded him on the plains of Asia, and reflected, that in a hundred years they would be no more. The Redeemer of mankind, from a far nobler motive, had compassion on the multitude when he saw them as sheep without a shepherd. And well may the Christian philanthropist weep, when he contemplates the infidelity, frivolity, and vice, in which that vast population are sunk, upon whose majestic city he has gazed with admiration and delight. But I dare not trust myself with reflections such as these. The theme is inexhaustible—and I have already put your patience to too severe a trial.

LETTER XIII.

Paris.

My dear ——

Yesterday we were at Versailles. We proceeded through the Bois de Bologne to St. Cloud, the favourite residence of Buonaparte and his empress, Maria Louisa. I must not omit to mention, that on this occasion we were driven by the postilion who drove Napoleon eleven years, and who, of course, had many times conducted him to that very palace, when Emperor of France. The Bois de Bologne, is to Paris something like what Hyde Park is to London. It is a favourite drive of the Parisians. It has, however, been shorn of its beauties by the British troops, who were encamped there, by whom many of the trees have been cut down and destroyed, so that little else but brushwood now remains.

St. Cloud is pleasantly situated upon a commanding eminence, about six miles from Paris. It is embosomed in delicious woods, and surrounded by all the sylvan beauties which nature, in conjunction with art, can yield. The gardens are tastefully laid out, and considered as equal in beauty, if not in extent, to any the royal palaces can boast. In short, it possesses every attraction as a country residence for a monarch—a retreat, always at hand, from the business of a throne, and the bustle of a court. It consists of a noble front, with two wings, forming three sides of a spacious court, and possessing a delightful view of the capital, and the intermediate country. The style of finishing and ornamenting within is very princely and magnificent, and the furniture is superb. Yet there is a chasteness and a delicacy pervading the whole, which bespeak the highly cultivated mind, at whose suggestions these last touches were given to this favourite resort of fallen greatness. The gallery is peculiarly splendid, and the paintings on the ceiling are remarkably fine—as are those of the saloons bearing the names of the four seasons of the year. The bed-chamber and the boudoir of the ex-empress, are universally admired—the most refined taste pervades the apartments, and the Graces themselves might not scorn to repose upon the sofas. The walls of this palace were enriched with the noblest productions from the Louvre, which were changed as often as the caprice of its master dictated. It is now preparing for the reception of the Royal Family, who intend to make it their residence for a few weeks. In fact, it needs but little preparation, for Napoleon has left them everything that luxury could wish, and they have only to enter and enjoy it—if they can.—But alas! the splendour that surrounds them is a memorial of their sufferings, and they must sometimes start from their repose when they reflect, that they press the very couch on which the usurper lay.

We drove through the park of St. Cloud to the village of Sèvres, where we stopped to see the Royal Porcelain Manufactory. We passed through the show-rooms, and were much pleased with the rich and beautiful specimens of art which they exhibit. The painting and enamelling are most exquisite; yet I do not think the workmanship superior to that of the Worcester china. We were particularly struck with a table composed altogether of porcelain, ornamented with the most beautiful landscapes. The price of it amounted to nearly three thousand pounds of our money. Indeed, things were too costly there to be looked at with composure, and I was not a little pleased when I saw that we were all well out; for I was fearful, lest, by an unlucky turn, some one of our party should have upset and broken one of these precious articles, by which a deeper impression would have been made upon the pocket than the beauty of the paintings had produced upon the mind.

Leaving the Porcelain Manufactory, which, by the by, I should have told you was established in 1745, and was purchased, in 1759, by Louis XV. from which period it became a royal establishment, we proceeded to Versailles.

Of this famous city and its magnificent palace, so much has been said and written, that I scarcely need to occupy my paper with a single remark. Still, however, I know you will expect something from my pen respecting it, as I have been there, and, therefore, I proceed cheerfully to gratify your wishes, without cherishing the vain conceit that in so doing I shall increase your information.

The partial and hasty view of the city of Versailles, which I obtained in passing through it, did not impress me very powerfully in its favour. The streets are straight, and wide, and uniform, but they are dull, and forlorn, and comfortless—and afford but little indication of the bustle which once pervaded them, or the magnificence to which they still conduct. But the palace is a wonderful structure. It is stupendous and magnificent in the extreme, and reminded me more of the productions of the ancient Romans than anything I have yet beheld in this land of palaces and mighty works. We were first conducted to the library, which is apart from the palace, and separated from it by the street. It is an immense collection of books, bibliographically arranged, and deposited in a suit of spacious rooms. From the library we proceeded across the street to the orangery. The collection of orange trees is very large, and many of them are of an immense age. One was pointed out to us that was nearly four hundred years old. Having passed through the orangery, we ascended, by a flight of more than a hundred steps of enormous width, to the grand terrace. There is another flight of steps, equally stupendous, at the opposite side of the orangery, conducting to the same terrace, which is, therefore, as wide as the whole space between them. Arrived on the terrace, a range of building presents itself to the astonished eye, vast in extent and exquisite in beauty. For my own part, I was powerfully affected by it, and stood for some seconds, overwhelmed by the spectacle, and utterly unable to express my emotions. It is more than eight hundred feet long—of the finest stone, and in the noblest style of Grecian architecture. There is a want of perfect correspondence, however, in the roofs of the wings, by which the uniformity of its appearance is, in some measure, destroyed. This, it seems, Buonaparte had intended to correct. The roof of the chapel, too, in the left wing, is in a barbarous style, and ill accords with the general chasteness of the edifice. With these exceptions, the palace of Versailles must be pronounced a most sublime structure, and altogether, unequalled in the productions of modern times. We passed through the principal suites of rooms, but to attempt a description of them would be absurd. Hall after hall—saloon after saloon—gallery succeeding gallery, in an almost infinite variety of magnificence, met the dazzled eye, and bewildered the mind with their immensity and splendour. The grand gallery is, perhaps, the richest room under the sun: all the pomp and luxury of fiction, the richness and exuberance of eastern tales, are realized in the embellishments of its walls, and all the glories of the arts seem concentrated in the paintings of its roof. The artist was the celebrated Le Brun, and the subject, the actions of Louis XIV. the builder of the palace. You may form some idea of the grandeur of the place, when I tell you, that Buonaparte, in the height of his ambition and the zenith of his glory, deemed it too vast and sumptuous for his residence. What an instance of humility and modesty, you will say, on the part of the emperor! How is it, that in this particular, also, he did not imbibe the spirit of his predecessor, to gratify whose vanity the edifice was raised—and who once said to his ambassador, "The King of England may know the extent of my force, but he cannot measure the elevation of my mind. Everything to me is contemptible in comparison with glory." And was not this the very spirit of Napoleon. Did it not breathe in all his manifestoes, and animate all his conduct. As he had the ambition and the vanity of the Bourbon, I wonder, that he did not aspire to inhabit his palace also—but 'tis well for him that he did not. The glories of the Thuileries—the beauties of St. Cloud—the classic elegance of Malmaison—and the romantic grandeur of Fontainebleau, are enough to compare with the wretchedness of Longwood and the rock of St. Helena, without the superadded splendour and magnificence of Versailles.

The gardens are on a scale of magnificence corresponding with the palace, but laid out with the usual formality. There are innumerable fountains, woods, lawns, parterres, canals, temples, grottoes, and all that art, in concert with nature, could devise, to render them worthy the monarch of a mighty empire. The playing of the fountains is a great object of curiosity at Versailles, and it costs a prodigious sum to set them in motion. We might have witnessed it had we chosen to violate the sabbath for the gratification of our curiosity. Wearied with so much magnificence, and disgusted with the character of its author,* whose vanity is marked by every object that meets the eye, and whose baser passions are indicated by not a few, we returned to Paris. Our coachman took us home another route, chiefly along the banks of the Seine, which afforded us as we approached the capital, a fine view of the bridge, erected by Buonaparte to commemorate the victory of Jena, and also the foundations of the palace which he had begun to build for the infant King of Rome.

I must not omit to mention how much we were all delighted with the mistress of the hotel where we refreshed ourselves at Versailles, and where I was compelled to repose for awhile. There was a kindness, and frankness, and artless simplicity about her, which exceedingly interested us. She was free, affable, and easy, without being frivolous, cringing, or obtrusive; and her anxiety to please, seemed to spring more from the amiableness of her disposition, than from interest or politeness. Nor shall I easily forget the feeling of sympathy with which she regarded my indisposition, and prepared a sofa for my repose. She was the first human being, except our own party, upon whom I have looked with emotions of confidence or pleasure, since my leaving England; and there was about her an air of maternal tenderness and unaffected sincerity, which seemed to warrant that confidence, and could not fail to touch me, under circumstances of indisposition, and in a land of strangers.

LETTER XIV.

Paris.

My dear ———

We have been over the Thuileries. I was much struck with the magnificence of the interior. Although here is not the exquisite taste of St. Cloud, nor the massive grandeur of Versailles, yet the apartments are sufficiently splendid in their furniture and decorations, to render them worthy the residence of a monarch. To enter into a description of the exterior of the palace, would be a waste of time. You have heard or read, again and again, that it is a long range of buildings, erected at different periods, and exhibiting various orders of architecture, differing in height and ornament, connected together and terminated by elegant pavilions. If the laws of symmetry and proportion are violated by this curious architectural mixture, it must be confessed that there is an air of romantic beauty pervading the whole, and that the appearance of the pavilions, and those portions of the palace which are occasionally seen above the foliage or through the avenues of the gardens, is extremely gay and fascinating. Of this palace, where everything seems to have risen as by enchantment, to flatter the vanity, and administer to the luxuries of its inmates, Madame Bertrand was once the mistress: all that it contained was at her command. I was much affected, as we were surveying its magnificence, with an anecdote of her, which was related by Sir S. ——. When he was at Longwood, Madame Bertrand exceedingly interested him by the amiableness of her manners. He was touched by a survey of the miserable hovel to which she was there confined—and still more, as. looking round the wretched apartment, she shrugged up her shoulders and said, "Ah! Monsieur, voici les Thuileries!" What instructive lessons do these palaces read to those who visit their beautiful galleries and magnificent saloons, if they are but disposed to consider them aright—and none more impressive than the Thuileries. What a horrid tragedy was acted within these walls on the night of the memorable tenth of August: when the wretched king and queen were compelled to leave the palace of their ancestors, miserable fugitives in their own capital, and seek a shelter from the brutal fury of the populace in the hall of the National Assembly—what a refuge!—only to meet there with indignities less supportable than death—while the hours of darkness that succeeded were occupied in deeds of slaughter, and the morning dawned upon the mangled bodies of the slain lying exposed in the halls, and on the staircases, and about the avenues of the Chateau. The more sober politicians of those times hailed the approach of the revolution, as a kind and generous being who would give them liberty and peace. They little thought that they were letting loose a many-headed monster, whose music was dying groans, whose element was blood, and who would lead them over the bodies of their murdered citizens, to the vassalage of a still fiercer despotism. Like the incendiary, who desires to destroy only the property of his enemy, they saw the conflagration spread far wider than they contemplated, and bidding defiance to every effort to extinguish it, involve friend, and brother, and neighbour, all in one horrible and promiscuous ruin! Then, indeed, like our first parents, their eyes were open, but it was only to gaze on misery and wretchedness. Then they discovered that the people were not ripe for the boon they would have imparted: but, dazzled with the light that dawned too rapidly upon them, the promised liberty was soon converted into madness—and freedom, to use the language of an elegant writer, "perished like a garland in the grasp of popular fury."

But I have wandered from the Thuileries—and no wonder: its history, for the last few years, exhibits such strange vicissitudes, that the mind must wander, that reflects at all, as it meditates upon the scenes and personages with which its apartments are connected. Five and twenty years ago, abandoned by the monarch whose ancestors had reposed within it for many generations, it became the bloody theatre of revolutionary fury. Murder stalked up and down its magnificent staircases, and strewed its splendid halls with the mangled trophies of its triumph. By and by. a new and more despotic tyrant rose, whose very name, at that time, was scarcely known in Europe, and planted the symbol of his tyranny on the spot where they had drenched the fleur-de-lis of the Bourbons in blood. After a lapse of not many years, that tyrant falls, and the brother of a murdered king is restored to the palace of his fathers. Again the Bourbon flies and the Corsican returns—again the Corsican is driven from this palace and his throne, and the banners of the Bourbon once more wave from its pavilions. What a romance!—what a fairy tale would it be deemed, had not our eyes witnessed it, and the truth been too plainly demonstrated in the blood and treasure which all these revolutions have caused to flow! I could not but think of the story of the Sultan and the Dervise—a house with so many changes in its inhabitants, is not a palace, but an inn!

We saw the state bed-room in which Napoleon and the empress slept. The room is used by the king, but not the bed—he is too unwieldly to get into it, but lies on an iron bedstead, brought in nightly for his accommodation, and placed at the foot of the state bed. The decorations of this apartment are very costly and magnificent.

On entering the suite of rooms through which we were conducted, we passed through the hall in which the king's body guard, Garde du corps du Roi, are in attendance. They are remarkably fine young men, and all of them gentlemen of the highest rank, junior members of the first families of France. They do the duty of common soldiers about the person of the king.

---

* It seems that the haughty Louis was somewhat dissatisfied with it himself before his death, for he is said to have exhorted his successor to the following effect: "I have been too fond of war, do not imitate me in that, or in being too expensive. Take advice on all occasions, and endeavour to discover the best, that you may follow it. Relieve your people as soon as you can, and do that which, unfortunately, I could not do." He also rejoined upon him not to be forgetful of his duty to God. Such advice from the lips of such a man, and at such an hour, is affecting and powerful. None, since the days of Solomon, had lived in greater splendour, or pursued more eagerly the gratification of his passions; yet, to the king of France, as well as to the king of Israel, it was all "vanity and vexation of spirit." What different views we have of the scenes and occupations of life, on a dying bed, to those which lured and fascinated us in the gay and giddy vortex of dissipation and of pleasure. Let, then, the dying speak, while the living listen to their voices.—Let the gay and the dissipated hear their testimony, and give it all its weight, for every one of their own poets saith,

"———that tongues of dying men enforce attention
Like deep harmony——
For they speak truth who speak their words in pain."

The gardens of the Thuileries are a favourite promenade of the Parisians. They are abundantly supplied with chairs, the accommodation of which, together with the perusal of a newspaper, is afforded for four sous. Whenever I have passed through the gardens, I have observed vast numbers enjoying the repose and information obtained at so cheap a rate: while the solitary politicians, seated here and there, with their favourite journal in their hands—the cheerful and animated groupes, engaged in conversation, to which the joke or the compliment seemed to add their enlivening influence—the solitary passenger gliding in the dimness of the twilight which the thick foliage of the trees sheds over the interior of the gardens at noon-day—and the gay and giddy crowds that saunter up and down the more public avenues, merely to see and to be seen, various in costume, in expression, and in manner, always presented to me an interesting picture, and awakened the liveliest sensations in my mind. What scenes have those gardens witnessed—by what beings have they been haunted—what demons in human form have stalked along their avenues—how has the sound of the tocsin invaded their deep recesses at the stillness of the midnight hour—when shrieks and yells of agony and horror ascended from their groves, and the paths were red with the blood and strewed with the bodies of the slain. He must be a stranger to feeling that can walk unmoved upon spots immortalized by deeds of horror, and not shudder as he compares the wanton gaiety that now pervades them, with the dark transactions by which they will be strongly and indelibly marked in the page of history.

LETTER XV.

Paris.

My dear ———

We have passed another Sunday in this heathen land. A Sunday in Paris!——You are anxious to know how it was spent—what we saw and heard on that holy day—and whether there was anything in the public services we witnessed in which the heart could find satisfaction, consolation, or repose. There was nothing. Sunday it might be called—the heathenish name may well be affixed to the first day of the week here, but 'twas no Sabbath to me: and, if what I have seen may be taken as a specimen, I am fully justified in saying, that, in the city of Paris, a Christian Sabbath never dawns. Can that be called a sabbath which is devoted to pleasure, to amusement, and to vice? But you are anxious to know how we spent it. I shall hasten to gratify your curiosity, reserving any remarks I may have to make on the state of religion, to the close of this letter, or to another epistle.

Upon going out into the street, which I did pretty early, in order to wait on Monsieur B. to whom I had a letter, and who was not at home when I called the preceding evening, I saw similar preparations to those which I had witnessed at Rouen. The houses were lined with tapestry, carpets, sheets, and linen of various sorts, with wreaths and garlands of flowers, in honour of the procession which was to take place, it being the day on which some of the parishes in Paris were to celebrate the Fête Dieu. The rest had celebrated it the preceding Sunday. The procession, which had then taken place, was graced by the Duchess D'Angouleme; and some said she was to walk through the streets on the present occasion, but this proved to be a false report. I found Monsieur B. and enjoyed half an hour's conversation with him. He is a pious, intelligent, and amiable young man, and the first individual, of congenial spirit with myself, with whom I have met in this strange land.

I could not make a long stay with Monsieur B. having engaged to be home early, to accompany our party to the chapel of the Thuileries, to hear high mass performed before the Royal Family and the court. At the hour appointed, a royal footman appeared at the gate of our hotel to conduct us to the Thuileries. Thus honourably escorted, we arrived at the palace, and were received by the Père Elysée, first surgeon to the king, who politely introduced us to the officer who has the care of arranging the company in the galleries of the Chapel Royal, for no visitors are allowed to remain below. To the condescending attentions of that officer we are much indebted, and the kindness of his manners, which evidently arose from the sweetness of his disposition, I shall not easily forget. He is the first Frenchman whose physiognomy has pleased me, and with his we were all exceedingly delighted. By him we were placed next to the royal gallery, which is in front of the altar, so that we were close to the king and his attendants, when they made their appearance. The front seat of the side galleries are reserved for the ladies of the court; behind them the company are ranged, with one of the garde du corps, placed at the back of each seat. None of the visitors sit. The company was very numerous, and many were disappointed, not being able to obtain admittance. At length symptoms of preparation appeared in the royal gallery—the folding-doors which communicate, with the other parts of the palace were thrown open —the chairs and cushions were adjusted—two men, most curiously and gorgeously attired, as heralds, in the costume of two or three centuries back, made their appearance, and everything indicated the approach of royalty. But the king delayed. Meanwhile, every eye was eagerly fixed upon the door by which he was to enter, and expectation was at its highest pitch, when a commotion was heard in the adjoining apartments—a gentleman hastened to the front of the gallery and cried, Le Roi! when the king entered, supported by two marshals, and attended by the Duke de Berri, the Duke and Duchess D'Angouleme, and about thirty or forty nobles, ecclesiastics, marshals and generals of his court. The full choir, composed of all the celebrated musicians and opera singers in Paris, instantly thundered, and the mass began. It was an august spectacle; and the impression of the moment was more than I can describe. High mass in the palace, and before the court of a popish prince, with all the fascinations art could lend, to bewilder the senses by the splendour of its decorations, to overwhelm the mind by the burst of its music, or to ravish the soul by the more thrilling notes of the human voice: the brother, the daughter, the nephew of a murdered king, worshipping in the sanctuary and in the palace, which had witnessed their predecessor's sufferings, and been wet with the blood of his attendants: an assemblage of personages who have been, more or less, connected with all the wonderful and tremendous revolutions by which Europe has recently been agitated, whom we have contemplated at a distance with awe, and whose names will be immortal on the page of history: all these things were perfectly new to me, and I must have been a stoic, indeed, if I had not felt, in some degree, the influence of such a singular combination of objects, with the interesting associations they awakened in my mind.

The principal figure in the groupe, on more accounts than one, was the king, his amazing corpulence would have rendered him so, had other circumstances been wanting. It was with the greatest difficulty that he walked to his chair, the possession of which was not accomplished without some inconvenience to himself, as the evident panting for breath which the exertion occasioned sufficiently indicated. The two gentlemen by whom he was attended on his entrance, took their stations, one on each side of the back of his chair, and whenever he sat down, lifted up for him the laps of his coat. The effect of that ceremony was rather ludicrous. This occurred but once or twice in the course of the exhibition, for the whole seemed little else, as the king retained his seat during the greater part of the service, while the rest of the royal party frequently rose and kneeled. I presume the king's infirmities have obtained a dispensation for him from the ecclesiastical powers, whom, as a good catholic, he is bound in every particular to obey. At the elevation of the host, however, the whole court kneeled, the monarch not excepted; we were the only parties standing in the place. It was an affecting sight to see a prince and all his courtiers bending before the King of kings in the act of solemn worship—or rather it would have been an interesting spectacle, could I have been persuaded that the homage was spiritual and sincere. But, alas! the reflection, that in the monarch, and his family, and his court, I beheld the victims of superstition, of infidelity, and of vice—and in the worship in which they were prostrate, the idolatrous adoration of the image of the beast, came powerfully upon my mind; the charm was dissipated, and the emotions at first awakened, were succeeded by those of pity, abhorrence, and disgust.

There was something in the expression of the king that exceedingly touched me. There was an air of dejection in his countenance, and a melancholy wildness in his eye, that spoke unutterable things. He looked around him, as if uneasy and distressed—as if suspicious of some lurking danger—as if in pursuit of some object on which his eye might fix with confidence and pleasure; but disappointed in the search, he retired again into himself, and was absorbed in his devotion. He appeared like some prodigy brought out for public exhibition and surrounded by his keepers—the mere image and representation of royalty; but his looks, when he surveyed the company, seemed to say, "I am indeed a king, but, oh! how reluctantly; how happy should I be, could I escape from this distressing pomp, this splendid misery—mine is an uneasy throne, and a crown of thorns." I may be wrong, but this was my interpretation of his looks; and on communicating with the rest of our party, I found that others had put on them a similar construction.

The Duchess D'Angouleme is an interesting woman: her figure is tall and graceful, and her dress was simply elegant. She was deeply engaged in the service during the whole of the performance, and seldom took her eye off the breviary which she held in her hand. Her husband, however, was not so devotional. He is a thin, active looking man, not very tall, with a physiognomy by no means prepossessing, but a quick and piercing eye. He was very restless during the ceremony—was perpetually looking about him, and then, as if suddenly recollecting himself, he returned to his breviary, and seemed to run over his prayers with great rapidity, making the appropriate crosses and gestures with prodigious haste. The Duke de Berri is a taller and a stouter man, more sedate and thoughtful, with features strongly marked and approaching to sternness. He was more occupied with the service than his neighbour, the Duke D'Angouleme.—The rest of the party seemed little concerned in the matter, and, except that they kneeled at the elevation of the host, appeared to take no interest whatever in the service; and as they stood during the whole of the time, and were a sort of exhibition to the company, they looked not a little pleased when it was over. At the close of the ceremony, the monarch was with difficulty lifted from the chair, and having moved respectfully to the company, he turned—took the arms of his attendants—the princes and nobles followed, and the whole pageant passed away. Sic transit gloria mundi. A few minutes ago, the eye gazed upon royalty—the ear drank in the most delicious and ravishing tones of music—the mind was dazzled and bewildered by the pomp of Catholic worship and the splendour of a court. But now the dream was ended—the sort of pleasing delirium into which the mind was thrown, was dissipated; and as the gay and giddy multitude passed away to some new exhibition, some fresh object of attraction, began to review the scene by which it had been captivated. I am not at all surprised at the influence which the Catholic religion exercises upon the minds of its votaries. To those who never think upon the subject of religion, but are wholly absorbed in the pursuit of pleasure or of vice, and such, it must be allowed, are the great body of the French people, it must possess peculiar and powerful recommendations. The service being in an unknown tongue, at once intimates to them that they have no concern but with the repetition of the words, they need not meddle with the ideas the words convey, the priest thinks for them, and that is sufficient: while the pomp and splendour of the exhibition gratifies their vanity and meets their love of show. "Why do you read your prayers in Latin," said a friend of mine to a French lady, "do you understand Latin?" "No, sir," said she, "it is very ridiculous that we do, but we cannot help it." "But why persevere in a custom which you think ridiculous?" "Ah?"—said she, and a significant shrug spoke her meaning. "Do you think the Bible enjoins all these ceremonies?" "The Bible, sir,—I don't know, I never read the Bible." "Never read the Bible, and yet profess to be a Christian!" "Ah! you know we are Catholics." "But is a Catholic anything different from a Christian?" "Oh! I don't know, we leave all to our priests." "The priests, then, fill a very responsible situation?" "Ah! but this is our way, and Catholics don't trouble themselves much with these things." True it is, like Gallio, they care for none of these things, and this woman is a specimen of thousands, and tens of thousands in France. Multitudes care so little, that they never go to mass at all; and those who do deem it enough to go and mutter over the appointed prayers, with the appropriate crosses and gestures, and return—and thus infidelity and superstition divide the land between them, and shed over the thoughtless, and ill-fated population the stupor and apathy of spiritual death.

From the Chapel Royal we proceeded to the Oratoire, in the Rue St. Honoré, the Protestant church. It is a very spacious and venerable edifice, and was well filled with an elegant congregation, consisting chiefly of ladies. Monsieur Manod was in the pulpit, but I could not get near enough to hear distinctly his discourse. From what I could hear, it appeared to be upon the greatness of God. His manner was animated—his action sufficiently abundant, but not remarkably graceful, and his voice by no means well managed. He seemed to preach memoritor, and he made frequent and long pauses between the paragraphs. In the little that I caught, there was no allusion to the grand and fundamental doctrines of the gospel, repentance towards God and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ; and those of our party who were nearer to the preacher, and who heard distinctly, informed me that in these respects it was lamentably deficient.

There are three ministers in the Oratoire: the opinions and the sermons of two of them are much in unison with those of the rational Christians, or Unitarians of our own country. The other, however, whom I had not the good fortune to hear, is of a different cast, and his preaching is said to be decidedly evangelical. Besides these, there is Monsieur B. who, though he does not preach, studied at the seminary in Gosport, and is employed under the auspices of the Missionary Society, in doing what he can towards the establishment of schools and the distribution of religious tracts. It did not appear to me that he had done much, or that much at present is likely to be done, except in the instruction of children. The school connected with the Oratoire, however, is by no means large—I think not more than one hundred children altogether.—With respect to the distribution of religious tracts, there seems to be a prejudice in the minds of the people against those printed in England, merely from the circumstance that they are English; if any extensive circulation of them should take place, it must be through the medium of the French press.

But, alas! alas! Paris is a hopeless scene—populous and splendid as it is, and rich in the sublimest productions of human genius, it is a spiritual desert, of moral waste. The life of God does not animate its people—the voice of prayer is not heard in its dwellings—its public haunts are thronged by practical if not avowed atheists. Those who are called religious, are the victims of the grossest superstition—those who bear the office and wear the habits of the priesthood, are, many of them, the secret votaries of infidelity. Such as call themselves Protestants, are sunk in the coldest indifference, and awfully fallen from the doctrines and the spirit of the reformers; and perhaps, it is not exaggeration to say, that a man of lively devotion and of genuine piety, in Paris, is as great a rarity as a civilized being in the wilds of Africa: while the light of true religion, if it be not utterly extinguished, shines like the glimmering taper in a sepulchral vault, struggling with the noxious vapours that everywhere surround it, and scarcely distinguished amid the deep and palpable darkness upon which its feeble rays are shed.

The state of religion amongst the Protestants, where one should naturally look with some degree of confidence, may be pretty correctly gathered from the circumstance, that they are quite as indifferent to the sanctification of the sabbath-day as the Catholics—and in this, it is awful to relate, their ministers set them the example. The Protestant clergy in Paris, may be seen on the morning of the sabbath, discharging the most sacred duties of their office, and in the evening sitting at the card-table, and deeply engaged in play. I could not have believed the report, had I not been informed of the melancholy fact by several persons who had seen them so occupied at that season, and I might have witnessed it myself, had I chosen to profane the sabbath by going to the parties in which they visit. Nor is the case with regard to the violation of the sabbath by the Protestant clergy of Paris singular, and to be attributed to the superior dissipation of the capital. At Nismes, concerning which we have heard so much lately, and the sufferings of whose persecuted Protestant inhabitants cannot too deeply excite the pity and abhorrence of mankind—at Nismes, two gentlemen, friends of mine, were absolutely ridiculed by the Protestant ministers, for refusing to travel on the sabbath day. I am aware that it may be urged as their apology, that the continental sabbath terminates with the morning service; that there is no obligation at all upon the consciences of the people, with respect to the evening of the day. It is true, this is the case with the Catholic population; but from their errors these men profess to have separated themselves, and from them we have a right to expect better things: and, I need scarcely observe, that better things would be seen, if the principles, whence only they can issue, were imbibed and felt. But what must be the tone of religious feeling, if it be proper to use the expression, in connexion with such a state of things, when it is not sufficient to maintain, in the ministers of the reformed churches, an outward separation from the dissipations of the world, or a decent respect for the sanctity of the sabbath-day! There is something in travelling on the sabbath-day, abhorrent to the feelings and convictions of a pious mind: there is something in the devotion of that day to business, at which a man of ordinary moral principle would shrink; but in the prostitution of those sacred hours to cards, and that, too, by the ministers of religion—ministers of the Protestant faith!—every sense of propriety, every idea of decency, established by education and maintained by habit, in an English breast, is violated; and men who make no pretentions to piety themselves, start from such a dereliction of principle and decorum with disgust. Does not the command, "Remember that thou keep holy the sabbath-day," extend its obligations to the continent of Europe? Have we, in our little island, and amongst our rigid professors of religion, misunderstood the extent of that command, and stretched it to the whole of the sabbath, whereas it only intended half? One would almost be induced to think, by a comparison of our English sabbaths with those of the rest of Christendom, that we had: but yet, the edict stands upon the inspired record, and so plainly written, that the wayfaring man, though a fool, need not, cannot err, in his interpretation.—Remember that thou keep holy the sabbath-day.

If the old adage be correct—"like priest, like people,"—if the flock in general follow the footsteps of the shepherd, and the congregation take the standard of their religion and morals from their pastor, what can be expected from the great body of the people bearing the name of Protestant. Alas! it is the name only—the principles and the spirit with which it was once associated, which animated the founders of their churches, and rendered their martyrs triumphant at the stake, are gone; and I have heard the observation from many whose long residence in France, and intimate acquaintance with the people of both communions, have enabled them to form an accurate opinion on the subject, that if there be any vital godliness in this country, it is not amongst the Protestants, but the Catholics. A gentleman, who knew them all intimately, assured me he did not believe there was one decidedly pious family in the Oratoire at Paris. When a few of them, who professed a regard for religion, were presented by an English lady with some religious tracts, they paid not the least attention to them, but said, "Ah! Madam, these things do very well in England"—and then, throwing them down, with a shrug of the shoulder, which, with the French, is infinitely expressive, told her, that they were not worth a perusal.

If, shocked by the melancholy state of morals and religion amongst the Protestants in France, we turn to the Catholics, the grieved and afflicted mind obtains no relief. There, however, we form no expectations, and are certainly spared the pain of disappointment. It is not enough to say, that the sabbath is with them like every other day; it is more gay, more dissipated, more devoted to pleasure and to vice. On that evening, above all others, the stage throws out its fascinations, and twenty theatres with their unfolded doors receive the giddy multitudes. 'Tis then that the public walks are most thronged—that the boulevards are the gayest—that the cafés are the fullest—that the haunts of pleasure and of vice, are most crowded with votaries—while the various assemblies and parties of the higher classes, complete the scene of dissipation, and perfect the circle of the vices that desecrate in this abandoned city, God's most holy day. It is the females chiefly who attend mass and confession on the sabbath morning—and this only to make way for every indulgence during the rest of the week. The men pay but little regard, even to the external forms of their religion; while multitudes of those whose profession and interest attach them to the church and compel their observance, secretly despise them: so that the Catholic religion in France is little more than infidelity under another title—scepticism attired in the habit of a monk—and the same system, with the name of Voltaire erased, and that of Pius the Seventh inserted in its stead!

When I contemplate the present state of France—when I see one part of the population the victims of the grossest superstition, and under the deadly influence of a mercenary and an artful priesthood—when I see another part, bowing at the shrine of infidelity, and devoted only to the gratification of their sensual appetites and basest passions—when I see the few who profess a purer system, and who ought to show a better way, sunk in the arms of a spiritual apathy, as dead to the things of God, as unconcerned about the Redeemer's kingdom, as indifferent to their own eternal interests, as gay, as volatile, as much the lovers of pleasure, as the rest, and think of the introduction of the gospel amongst them, and their moral and spiritual improvement, I am ready to exclaim, if the Lord should open windows in heaven, this thing might be: but to all human probability, it is an era far distant, and against its arrival, the most formidable obstacles seem to have arisen. I limit not the Holy One of Israel—I know that all things are possible with God, and he that breathed upon the slain in Ezekiel's valley of vision, can quicken into spiritual life, even in this abandoned city, an exceeding great army, to profess his name and propagate his word, and, if necessary, to seal their testimony with their blood. Let British Christians feel for the melancholy state of the neglected continent; and while multitudes of their countrymen are repairing to it for the various purposes of amusement and of pleasure, and often leave no very favourable traces of British piety, or British morals, or even British honesty, in their passage through it, let others visit it with a more benevolent aim—to promote amongst them the circulation of the Scriptures, to excite their attention to the word of God, by conversation and by tracts, and to forward, by their contributions and their advice, the establishment of schools, for the instruction of the children. Divested of the habits and prejudices which are deeply rooted in the hearts and lives of their parents, they present a more hopeful scene for the cultivation of the moral and spiritual philanthropist. There, by the blessing of heaven, the seed that is sown may germinate, and future generations reap the abundant harvest. Though there are many discouraging circumstances, and the case may seem desperate, to the contemplation of an ordinary faith, yet I am persuaded much may be done in this way—and while success has crowned the exertions of Christian benevolence in every other quarter of the globe, and the moral wastes of India and of Africa, and the wilds of America, have already began to bud and blossom as the rose, the pious efforts and the fervent prayers, which seek the moral renovation of the continent of Europe, shall not be in vain!

Yours, &c.

P. S. Perhaps if a Frenchman, acquainted with the violations of the sabbath which occur in our own country, and the scenes of gaiety and dissipation which abound in our own metropolis on that day, were to read this letter, he might be disposed to retort upon me the old proverb, "Physician heal thyself." The travelling, the feasting, the business, the dissipation, the diversion, the recreation, to which, in various ways, and through all the ramifications of society, this day is devoted even amongst us, constitute, unquestionably, a great national crime, and must be peculiarly offensive to Him, who has set apart this day, above all others, for himself, and hallowed it by his express and positive command. Yet, still the difference is great; and deeply as England is involved in this enormous guilt, every Briton that feels interested for the welfare of his country, must rejoice that she has not gone the lengths in this crime that most of the states of Christendom have done. Her violations of the sabbath are individual; theirs are national. Her government protects the sabbath; theirs leaves it undefended, nay, is the first to violate it. None of our public places of amusement, licensed by the state, are opened on that day; here, they all are.—No public works with us are suffered to proceed on that day; here, they are little, if at all disturbed: and from the pavier in the street, to the actor on the stage, all seem as busy in promoting the convenience and amusement of the people on that, as on any other day. While with regard to the maintenance of public worship, and the numbers that attend, there is no comparison. It feels like the sabbath-day in England. Trade and commerce cease, and there is much to remind the sabbath-breaker, as he passes along, that he is profaning God's holy day. But this is not the case here; the city and its inhabitants present one uniform scene of gaiety and indifference: and were it not for the processions which sometimes occur upon the festivals of the church, a man, who never counted the days or consulted his almanac, might live for months and years in Paris, and not know that a sabbath had passed.

LETTER XVI.

Sens.

My dear ——

We left Paris on Tuesday morning, and are thus far on our way to Geneva. Our last day in the capital, like most last days, the last day of life not excepted, was one of hurry and fatigue. Too much was crowded into it, and, therefore, with all our diligence, some things were left undone. We were glad, however, to escape from the tumult of the city, and have exceedingly enjoyed our journey to this place.

But before I take you finally from Paris, suffer me to tell you how much I was gratified with a visit to the Museum of French Monuments, and the catacombs. These should certainly be viewed last of all the exhibitions in that metropolis, as they have a tendency to sober the mind, after the more gay and dissipated scenes which have engaged it. Here you converse with the dead, and the associations awakened, are immediately connected with eternity. In the Museum of French Monuments, you are surrounded by the affecting memorials of departed greatness. Here, the monuments, rich in sculpture and eulogy, reared to the memory of the illustrious dead, are collected, from the various cathedrals and churches throughout the empire, and arranged according to their respective centuries. The hazardous enterprise of rescuing these sublime efforts of sculpture from the hand of revolutionary fury, were undertaken by M. Lenoir, in 1790, at the peril of his life. But for his intrepidity, diligence, and zeal, very few of them, in all probability, would have survived that era of desolation, and France would have lost this most interesting and impressive monumental record of her monarchy. It embraces a period from Clovis I., whence their first connected records proceed, in 481, to the time of Louis XVI. The building appropriated to the reception of the monuments was formerly the convent of the Augustins; and the garden is converted into a terrestrial elysium, where, beneath the shade of cypress and of poplar, the ashes of Boileau, La Fontaine, Descartes, and many other illustrious men, repose.*

The catacombs present a different scene. There, underneath the ground, you pass through innumerable streets and lanes, whose buildings, if one may so speak, are composed of human bones, collected from the different cemeteries of Paris, and arranged according to the receptacles whence they were collected. It is, indeed, a golgatha—a place of skulls! You pass through parishes of the dead. It is Paris in the grave. Here its once gay and busy people lie ranged in their last house, according to the houses they occupied whilst living.——It is an affecting sight—it is like going down into the very heart of the empire of death, and intruding into the capital of the king of terrors. One pile alone, contains two millions four hundred thousand human skulls, and the different heaps extend for a mile in length. Nothing can be conceived more solemn and affecting than a visit to these dreary abodes. The indistinctness with which objects are seen by the feeble light of the tapers you carry in your hand —the intricacy and uncertainty of the path you traverse, and which is only indicated as the right one, by a black line drawn along the roof of the cavern, the loss of which clue might be fatal to the party—the thick and palpable darkness into which the innumerable passages branch out—the ghastly and affecting materials of which the walls that on every side enclose you are composed—the appropriate mottoes and sentiments engraven upon rude stones, with various sepulchral devices, interspersed throughout the melancholy piles—the deep silence that reigns around, broken only by the voices of the visitors, in curiosity or terror,—conspire to render this the most interesting and instructive of all the exhibitions I have ever seen. There the gay volatile spirit of the French seems to have sunk into something like seriousness; and thoughts and words that refer to the Supreme Being, and an eternal world, are recorded. I give you a specimen. In a recess cut in the rock, and under an arch that rests upon a wall of skulls, is placed a sarcophagus, upon which is a tablet with this inscription:

Silence mortels
et vous vaines grandeurs
Silence, c'est ici
le séjour de la mort.

Returning from the catacombs we attended a meeting of the institute, and were much interested in seeing and hearing Baron Humboldt, the famous traveller of the Andes. He presented, on that day, the last part of his work on equinoctial plants, and also read a paper on the comparative temperature of the different regions of the globe. He is a plain man, mild and amiable in his appearance, with more of the English farmer about him, than of the traveller, or the peer. There might be from seventy to eighty members present. It was to me an interesting, but affecting scene. Perhaps I had never witnessed a greater concentration of talent than appeared in that room: but, alas! to what was it all devoted, and to what results had the cultivation and employment of it in the various departments of literature and science conducted its possessors? Most, may be, all of them, had discovered that the Bible was a forgery, and some, that creation was the work of chance! Here are the wise and the learned, thought I; but what pitiable beings they are, without a revelation and without a God. The village sabbath-school is a nobler scene by far. I could imagine, that if angels wept, their tears would flow in pity for the one, while they gaze upon the other with smiles of joy: for in the sabbath-school, that knowledge is pursued which makes its humblest possessor wise unto salvation; but in the Institute of France their pride of learning makes them fools, and by their wisdom they know not God!

But I fear you are already as tired of Paris as I have been; and yet, now that I am about to leave it, a thousand things rush upon my memory—visits unrecorded, and objects undescribed, the omission of which would be, indeed, without excuse, if it were not that the evenings of the ensuing winter promise many opportunities for the narrating of the former, while ever tour and every guide to Paris will furnish you with ample details of the latter. Do not imagine, then, that after having ventured upon matters of far graver import, and now that the sublime and glorious regions of the Alps fill my imagination, I shall return, to number one by one the barriers of Paris—to describe the portals and the pillars of the several churches—to descant upon the colour of the waters of the Seine—or to sketch the many baths and washing-houses, that float upon its surface, rendered picturesque enough by the nymphs that inhabit, and the shrubs and flowers that adorn them. Neither imagine that I have time or inclination to weary you with all the stories I have heard of Buonaparte, and his mortal enemy, Blucher; the magnanimous Alexander, and our mighty Wellington; the revengeful Prussians, and the fiery Cossacks! All these would fill a volume, rather than a letter, and will be communicated much more easily by the fireside than through the medium of the post.—Nevertheless, I may pause to confirm the report, that every body here speaks well of Alexander—that his moderation and forbearance, when Paris fell into his hands, were worthy of a great mind, and that his conduct throughout the period of his stay in that city, was such as to secure the esteem and veneration of all who witnessed it. He affected no state. His only equipage was a plain carriage and pair; while that of his imperial brother, of Austria, was a magnificent coach, drawn by eight white horses. One of the first inquiries Alexander made on his arrival in Paris, was after M. La Harpe, a gentleman of whom he had learnt the French language. He sent his aid-de-camp to say he should be glad to see him. The tutor was then out of town, but the monarch waited on his lady, and on his return, the worthy Frenchman had the honour of entertaining the Autocrat of all the Russias at his humble board, for the Emperor, without deeming his dignity endangered by the condescension, invited himself to dinner.

I have said little of Buonaparte, and for obvious reasons. But one thing I must not omit to tell you, as I think it will be new to many on our side the water. Amongst the various projects which he entertained, was that of becoming the founder of a new religious sect; or rather of establishing unitarianism. He became acquainted with this system from the writings of a Baron Gussey, which accidentally fell into his hands. He found that the great generals of antiquity had nothing left but a name behind them—they had no followers. But the founders of new religions were immortal in their disciples. The institutes of Moses had existed for four thousand years —the gospel by Jesus Christ were revered over a great part of Europe—Mahomet had his millions of votaries—Confucius, Calvin, and Luther, still existed in their sects—"I will, therefore, be the founder of a new religion," said he, "I will establish unitarianism, and its disciples shall be Napoleonists. I will smile on protestantism, and give religion liberty, as the means to accomplish my design. My people are so versatile, they will follow the court; on them I will heap my choicest favours, and thus destroy a religion, whose ceremonies and doctrines are inconsistent with common sense." I believe the source whence this information is derived, is one on which full reliance may be placed.

From Buonaparte we pass naturally enough to Fontainebleau, the palace in which he drank to its dregs that bitter cup, whose deadly and degrading influence is on him to the present hour.

* Alexander Lenoir was born in Paris in 1762. He studied in the college of Mazarin, and cultivated the art of painting under Gabriel Françoise Doyen, painter to the king. In 1790, when the property of the church was declared the property of the nation, he formed the idea of collecting all the sepulchral monuments into one depot. The project having been submitted to M. Bailly, mayor of Paris, was approved by the National Assembly; and a special decree was granted for the accomplishment of the proposed collection, constituting M. Lenoir, at the same time, keeper of the monuments.

In the prosecution of his object, his life was continually in danger. Once he was wounded in the hand by a bayonet, while endeavouring to preserve the tomb of Cardinal Richelieu from the fury of the revolutionary army by whom it was attacked. But he has lived to see his labours abundantly recompensed, by a collection of more than five hundred monuments, rescued by his intrepidity, arranged by his skill, and committed to his care; —the admiration of all enlightened foreigners, and the theme of his grateful country's praise.

Having waited on our ambassador the preceding day, and obtained our passports for Switzerland and Germany, we left Paris at seven this morning, by the barrier of Fontainebleau, and immediately entered on a level country, which afforded us some fine parting views of the capital. The gilded dome of the Invalides was glittering in the splendour of the morning sun; and many an edifice, with whose form I had become somewhat familiar, was seen rising in sober majesty above the inferior buildings, as if to receive our last farewell. To me there is something affecting in the last look, on whatever object it is cast—for the last of everything reminds us of the last of life, the last day we shall spend on earth—the last look we shall fix upon terrestrial scenes—when we must turn from the beloved objects, whose society and sympathy have sweetened our cup of wo, and filled our span of time, to the loneliness of death, and the realities of eternity.

The ride to Fontainebleau is extremely pleasant. On leaving the capital the road quickly enters a highly cultivated country, and occasionally affords extensive and beautiful prospects, in which the windings of the Seine are no inconsiderable feature. To the right, is a rich and extensive plain, stretching from the immediate vicinity of Paris to Orleans, a distance of thirty-six leagues. This plain may be denominated the granary of Paris; it yields the finest corn in France, and from it the Parisians are abundantly supplied with bread.

France is not yet intersected with canals to that extent that England is; but there is one in this direction which unites the Loire with the Seine. It traverses the forest of Orleans and the adjacent plain. It was began so long ago as 1682, by Philip, Duke of Orleans. It is a stupendous work, for it is carried by a tunnel under ground for an immense distance, having in some places valleys as well as hills above it. In the whole of this excavation there is no masonry, but the tunnel is hewn entirely out of the solid rock of chalk. The distance under ground is computed at nine miles. We passed through many small towns and pleasant villages, between Paris and Fontainebleau, and observed one or two chateaux, in a style of magnificence which we had not previously witnessed in this class of residences. At the small town of Charenton we passed the Marne, which, a little above that place, empties itself into the Seine. The prospect here was very pleasing and extensive; and from the stillness, serenity, and sylvan beauty which pervaded them, you may suppose such views would be extremely refreshing to us, after the heat and bustle of the capital. The city of Melun is worthy of notice, for its pleasant situation and extreme antiquity. It is one of the most ancient cities of France, and is mentioned by Julius Cæsar in his commentaries. The citizens say it was the model after which Paris was built. Certain it is, that the situations of the two places are very similar: Melun stands upon the Seine, which, as in Paris, divides the city into three parts. It is the principal place of the Department of the Seine, and Marne.

Leaving Melun, and passing a beautiful chateaux on the left, we quickly entered the forest of Fontainebleau, at a distance of about thirty miles from the capital. The road now became extremely interesting. The bright foliage that lined it was refreshing to the eye; while the occasional vistas which it passed, and the gentle eminences that it traversed, afforded, now and then, hasty glances of woodland perspective, and extensive prospects approaching to the sublime. Here and there the hills presented a bold outline; enormous masses of dark gray stone lay scattered, as by accident, along their sides, and, mingled with the furs that clothed them, presented a thousand fantastic forms and combinations to the eye, while the imagination, without much effort, suggested a thousand more. This forest contains about twenty-five thousand English acres, and there are several others of prodigious extent in France. Those of Ardennes and Orleans may especially be named. We have Mr. Authur Young's agricultural travels with us, and I perceive that he estimates the annual revenue of the forests at twelve millions sterling, the rent being taken at twelve shillings per acre.

At the time of the revolution, all the forests belonging to corporate bodies, and such as fled their country, were declared the property of the state. To these were added the forests of Belgium, and those on the left bank of the Rhine. But the arbitrary regulations under which the private proprietors of woodlands groaned were not abolished. Persons appointed by the government examined the woods and marked every tree which they judged proper for the service of the navy, after which the owner could no longer say that it was his, or touch it with his axe; while every man who intended to cut his timber, was obliged to give six months' notice to the overseers of the forests, who had the power to permit or to forbid the execution of his purpose, at their pleasure. How much the strength of a country, and the independence of a people must be weakened, by such arbitrary laws, such vestiges of feudal tyranny, I need not attempt to prove. Happy is that land, where the property as well as the person of the inhabitant is sacred, and the right of every man's inheritance, and the produce of his labour, is as much respected by the state, as by the private individual.

The town of Fontainebleau is embosomed in the forest. Its situation is not much unlike that of Lyndhurst, in Hampshire, which is also dignified with a royal hunting-seat; but the town of Fontainebleau is large and populous, and its palace of immense extent, while Lyndhurst is small and unassuming in its appearance, and has long been deserted by that royalty, to whose dignity its palace could never have been equal, and of whose residence it now possesses but a few memorials. But while, in her palace and her population, Lyndhurst yields to Fontainebleau, in her forest, she far surpasses it. We saw no extensive avenues and stately vistas, vast in their breadth, and extending mile after mile before the wearied and astonished eye, till lost in the indistinctness of more distant foliage, that seemed, amid the brightness of a summer noon, to mingle with the blue ether of the heavens. We saw no stately, well-proportioned, and majestic beech, that spread their ample shade across the sylvan road, by which a marching army might obtain a shelter from the scorching sun. But the new forest in Hampshire abounds with such characters of grandeur; and pressing closely upon the little town, its capital, throws its shadow into its streets, and gives it an air of deep retirement, such as I have never witnessed in any other place, and such as, although in the midst of the forest, Fontainebleau does not possess.

But its palace is interesting on many accounts, and cannot but be approached with deep emotion, by a mind that embraces the events of high antiquity with which it is connected, and the still more momentous deeds of modern times, which would amply suffice to rescue it from oblivion were it but a building of yesterday, and to place it amongst those memorable spots, whose names the page of history will preserve, and whose scenes and transactions future ages will incessantly revolve.

There is little, indeed, in the external appearance of the palace to interest the traveller; but the interior will fully repay him for the trouble he may have taken to survey it. Having been built at various periods, it presents a motley mixture of the very worst styles of architecture. Squat, ugly, and dwarfish, without the least pretension to regularity, it is as great a deformity in building as we sometimes see in nature. It surrounds an ample court, on three sides, while the fourth is formed by the road, from which a view of the edifice is obtained through a series of tall iron railing, the gilded points of which terminating in the form of a spear, are a sufficient indication that "Napoleon the Great" has been its inhabitant, for all his imperial railing was after this fashion. The palace consists of four distinct chateaux, erected at different dates, and each one having its separate garden. The whole edifice contains nine hundred rooms. Six hundred years back is this palace mentioned in history. Francis the First took great delight in it, and to him it is indebted for much of its internal magnificence. Henry the Third of France was born within its walls. The haughty Louis XIV. paid it an annual visit, and it was amongst the royal houses which the famous Golbert repaired and beautified for that proud and ambitious monarch. But its greatest celebrity is derived from a modern name—a name at which Europe and the world once trembled, but a name that has prematurely passed away—whose charm was strangely and suddenly dissolved, and for which a mysterious destiny has seemed to anticipate the oblivion of the grave. You may well imagine with what eager curiosity we inquired for the chamber in which Napoleon signed his abdication of the throne of France, I might almost say, of the thrones of Europe, for they clustered round him like so many constellations, of which he was the central and combining luminary. Nor shall I easily forget my sensations, when I not only entered the interesting apartment, but was shown the little table on which the important deed was done—the momentary deed, which transformed him from an emperor to an exile, and banished him from the palaces of France to a lonely dwelling on the ocean. What was the agony of his feelings at that moment—how he was at once transported by rage, by vexation, and despair—is sufficiently indicated in the vehemence with which he threw his pen-knife on the table, the marks of which are distinctly visible. The images that were present to my mind, and the reflections that crowded upon me in that small apartment, I shall in vain endeavour to embody in language. I felt as if riveted to the spot—I threw myself upon the couch he pressed—I looked again and again at the table on which he wrote—I surveyed every article of furniture the room contained, as if I expected that some of the inanimate things around me would find a voice to satisfy my ardent curiosity, and tell me all the momentous history of that day's transactions; and I believe that I had been left sometime alone ere I was roused from my reverie by the return of the guide, to apprize me of the advance of the party. I then took a sketch of the memorable table and departed. We were also shown the room in which he held his last council, the table of which was still standing, surrounded by the magnificent chairs of state, nearly as when he rose from its gloomy deliberations. We, moreover, passed through the suite of apartments which were occupied by the pope, when Buonaparte held him as a prisoner in France. All the furniture which his holiness used remains precisely as when he left it. The guide described him as a mild and peaceable old man, and I believe he endured the insults and injuries heaped upon him by the emperor, in a manner not wholly unbecoming the sacredness of his character and office. The theatre and the chapel, (a singular combination, but one uniformly found in the palaces of France,) are both extremely elegant. The floor of the former is composed of the finest marbles, while the ornamental part of the latter is very costly, and rich in gilding. Many of the rooms are splendid, but comfort seems to have been chiefly studied throughout the whole. The gallery of Francis I. is surrounded by the busts of eminent men, sculptured in white marble, and supported upon marble pillars. Our great Duke of Marlborough and the illustrious General Washington are each honoured with a place.

This palace suffered greatly during the reign of anarchy. It was stripped of all its furniture at that period, and is indebted for the elegance which at present reigns in its apartments to the taste of the fallen emperor.

Leaving Fontainebleau, we passed a column which they are erecting to commemorate Buonaparte's abdication, on the third of April, 1814. It stands at the confluence of several roads, and is not merely an affecting memento of the instability of human affairs, but is also a striking object amid the woodland scenery that surrounds it. The grotesque appearance of the rocks, and the fanciful grouping of the trees, continued to interest us for many a mile, till at length, amid the splendours of a glorious sunset, we arrived at this place safe, but not altogether without catastrophe, for we discovered at Pont sur Yonne, the last post, that the axle-tree of our carriage was in a state nearly approaching to fracture, a circumstance, in which the regret awakened by the delay it will occasion, is greatly moderated by thankfulness that we are safely arrived. Adieu. Yours, &c.

LETTER XVII.

Geneva.

My dear ———

Have you courage to renew the journey with me, and after traversing for three wearisome days a level country with little to relieve the eye, to cross the precipitous and rugged mountains of the Jura, to get a view of this charming lake, and the sublime and romantic scenes that lie beyond? Happily, you may accomplish the journey without the fatigue it occasioned us, for we have been exposed throughout the whole, with the exception of the last day, to the heat of a burning sun, whose rays I never felt so intensely hot before.

But before we leave Sens, where the repairs of our carriage were accomplished with much greater expedition than we had anticipated, I must conduct you to the cathedral, for it is one of the most ancient in France, the first stone of it having been laid, according to tradition, for I presume there are no written documents which convey the information, by the proto-martyr Stephen. It is, as you may suppose, from its high antiquity, a most venerable structure. The front is spacious and imposing, and adorned with various sculptures. In surveying it we had the advantage of the moon; and in the deep solemnity of mind which the view of it inspired, I was fully prepared to accede to all that Mr. Walter Scott has so elegantly said on the subject of moonlight visits to such structures:

"If thou wouldst view fair Melrose aright,
Go visit it by the pale moonlight." &c.

We repaired to the cathedral again in the morning. The interior is extremely spacious, and the style of architecture plain. It struck me as very much resembling Notre Dame in Paris, and it is said to be equal to it in its dimensions. In the nave of the church are two remarkably fine painted windows; at the altar is a most exquisite piece of sculpture, representing the murder of the first Archbishop of Sens; and there is also a monument erected to the memory of the Dauphin, the father of the present king, which deserves the notice of the traveller.

While strolling about the church, we were accosted by a curious little man, who invited us to see the relics. We accepted of his invitation, and being shown into the vestry, were gratified with a sight of a piece of the true cross, le véritable croix, as he affirmed, and also a morsel of the Redeemer's robe. The piece of wood was preserved in a glass cross, tipped with silver, and for that precious fragment he said they were indebted to the generosity of Charlemagne. Besides these, he showed us the robe of the Dauphin, and that of Thomas Becket, who was murdered at Canterbury. That haughty prelate fled to this country from the vengeance of his incensed monarch, and was here received with great marks of attention by the pope. They celebrate his martyrdom annually with great pomp in this cathedral, and upon these occasions, the robe in question bears an important part in the ceremony.

From Sens our route lay through the province of Champagne, so justly celebrated for its wines. Through the whole of that day's journey we had the Yonne more or less in view, and the highly cultivated state of the country presented a succession of pleasing prospects to the eye, and awakened still more pleasing sensations in the mind. The vintage promises well this year, but the last it almost entirely failed, in consequence of which the price of wine is higher than usual; notwithstanding this, however, we drank Burgundy at three francs and a half, and Champagne at five francs per bottle.

Auxerre, through which we passed about noon, is delightfully situated on a gentle declivity, and is watered by the Yonne. It is the principal town of the department of that name, and being favourably placed for commerce, carries on a considerable trade with the capital and the surrounding provinces, in timber and in wines. Its cathedral is one of the finest we have yet seen on the continent, excepting only that at Rouen. The style of architecture is gothic; and it possesses a rich profusion of painted glass. Some of its windows are extremely fine. It stands on a commanding eminence, and is seen to great advantage from the surrounding country. In this church our attention was arrested by a wooden monument, to the memory of the late unfortunate royal family of France. It was painted, or rather daubed, in imitation of marble. We at first imagined that it was only a temporary thing, a model, perhaps, of one to be erected on the spot; but we were told that it had been there three years. I never saw so contemptible a thing in the meanest country church in England. I hope, for the sake of their own feeling, that none of the present royal family will ever visit this cathedral, or that this rubbish will be removed before they come. If this were a fair specimen of the loyalty of the people of France generally, as we are led to suppose it is of the people of Auxerre, one could not well draw the conclusion, that the throne of the Bourbons rested on a rock. They call it a monument to the memory of the unfortunate royal family; but it stands, a monument of their own meanness, a disgrace to the cathedral, and an insult to the sufferings it records.

We were glad to hear our landlady at Auxerre talk of the mountains, and inform us that on their account we must have six horses. We were weary of a level country, which, however beautiful, soon becomes uninteresting and insipid—and were impatient to obtain a glimpse of those romantic beauties, which had lured us so far beyond our original design. We would fain have reached Dijon that night, but we found it utterly impossible, and were obliged at the close of the day to halt at a poor little country place, Vermanton, and put up with such accommodation as its only inn afforded. The obliging manner of our hostess, a fine, active, sprightly woman, and the civility of her maids, soon reconciled us to our entertainment, which was not of the most luxurious kind. The situation of the place was extremely rural. We had not, indeed, seen any of the mountains of which our landlady had said so much, but gentle undulations of country everywhere surrounded us, and presented a grateful variety to the eye. The simplicity of a country village reigned throughout the place. The evening was tranquil and serene, and the song of the nightingale was sweet. I walked out to enjoy the delightful calm of nature, and felt the force of those exquisitely beautiful lines of our great poet:

Now came still evening on, and twilight gray
Had in her sober livery all things clad;
Silence accompanied, for beast and bird,
They to their grassy couch, these to their nests,
Were slunk, all but the wakeful nightingale;
She all night long her amorous descant sung;
Silence was pleased: now glowed the firmament
With living sapphires: Hesperus that led
The starry host rode brightest, till the moon
Rising in clouded majesty at length,
Apparent queen, unveil'd her peerless light,
And o'er the dark her silver mantle threw.

From Vermanton we proceeded by Maison Neuve to Dijon. At Maison Neuve we dined, or rather tried to dine, but there was literally nothing fit to eat. Everything was dirty, filthy, and unwholesome, and the bread the worst part of the provisions. Indeed, during the whole of our journey through the provinces, we have had very indifferent bread, owing to the badness of the wheat last year. 'Tis well that the present promises an abundant and wholesome crop. From Maison Neuve to Dijon, the appearance of the country very much reminded us of England. We began to lose the vineyards, which are by no means picturesque; and the lands became, in a great measure, enclosed. At Vitteaux, a small village, where is the post, we passed the castle of Sombrino, a fine chateau, but now in ruins. It was once a place of considerable strength, but fell a victim to the desolating spirit of the revolution. The race that once possessed it, and called the surrounding lands their own, are passed away, and it is now the property of the postmaster. Presently, we reached Republic, a house or two, erected in the time of the revolution, and intended as the commencement of a town to be so called. Here the country assumes an air of boldness and of grandeur. The hills became lofty, well wooded, and abrupt, and the valleys exceedingly rich and beautiful. It was late when we arrived at Dijon, and the gates of the town were shut. Upon application, however, they were quickly opened, and we passed, by a magnificent portal, into a fine wide street, and were presently surrounded by the comforts of a respectable inn.

It would detain you too long were I to take you over the curiosities of Dijon, of which there are many, in buildings, in public institutions, and in relics of antiquity. It is the metropolis of this part of France—the chief place in the department of the Cote D'or, and the capital of Burgundy. It is surrounded by walls, and entered by five gates. Its streets are spacious and clean; the houses, generally speaking, are large and handsome; and there is an air of life and gaiety about it, not very common in the provincial towns of France. Indeed, we could not but notice tho almost total absence of life and activity in the several places through which we had passed, as affording by no means a favourable indication of the improved state of things in the provinces. There was an air of gloom and desertion pervading them. The houses had a cheerless and neglected appearance. No one was seen in the streets—they looked as if deserted by their population, or inhabited by a people who never went abroad. The smacking of the postilion's whip, indeed, brought a few people together at the door of the post-house, but these were chiefly women, old men, and children, who seemed to have nothing else to employ their time, and no other mode of subsistence than from the precarious charity they obtained of travellers. The roads have been as much deserted as the towns. Here and there we saw a few people, chiefly women, in the fields; but the visible population, even the sprinkling of towns and villages, such as they are, was extremely thin for the extent of country.

We had heard much, before we left Paris, of the perturbed state of the provinces; and, indeed, we were warned not to attempt travelling through them, till order was in some degree restored: and we learned upon the road, that we were the first party that had passed that way for ten days. We found, however, as we suspected, that the reports had been greatly exaggerated. There had been, indeed, some little disturbance at Sens, owing to the high price of bread, but it was immediately quelled, and all was perfectly tranquil. The appearance of a gendarme or two upon the road, was the only indication of a state of revolt, as they called it, we met with, and we passed unmolested, and with perfect ease, by all the dangers of which the Parisians warned us.

Although they are at present suffering much, as the poor in England are, from the failure of the last harvest, yet the general condition of the peasantry in France, has undoubtedly been much bettered by the revolution. The feudal tenures are abolished, with all the enormous cruelties and oppressions that followed in their train—while tithes and game laws have no existence here. By the sale of the church lands, and the estates of the refugees, the soil became more equally divided. The poorer classes were purchasers of from one to ten acres, and upon these small portions are enabled to live with tolerable comfort, in part supported by their own little farms, and in part by the produce of the work which they perform for others. There existed, prior to the revolution, a sort of tax called the corvées, by which the people were obliged to repair the roads by their own personal labour. This was a most oppressive imposition in itself, and was often greatly abused by those who had the peasantry under their control. There was also the military corvée, by which the inhabitants of the villages through which troops marched were obliged, at whatever expense of inconvenience and toil, to repair the roads along which they were to travel. This mark of despotism is wiped away. The roads are now in the hands of the government, and they mend them at their pleasure. The consequence is, however, that while the main roads which are travelled by the mails and frequented by the great, are kept in good repair, the rest are in a lamentable state. But this is a trifling evil compared with the oppression and tyranny involved in the former system.

There was a singular mode of tenure prevalent before the revolution, which is now also done away. The proprietor and the farmer entered into a sort of partnership concern. The former found the land, with the stock, the seed, and the implements of husbandry, while the latter furnished the requisite labour; and the produce, except what was necessary to keep up the stock, was equally divided between them. This compact, though it may look well to the eye, at first sight, yet, on minuter inspection, will be found to indicate a most melancholy and depressed state of things at that period. For the poor farmer, without any capital of his own, was wholly dependent on the will and caprice of his superior in the firm, and liable to be turned pennyless upon the world at his pleasure. But this system is also abolished, and what the farmer now cultivates is either his own personal property, or his by a money rental, so that he is unfettered in his plans of improvement, and is encouraged by the prospect of reaping the undivided produce of his labour.

There are no poor's rates in France. This method of providing for the poor was suggested in one of the reports drawn up by the committee appointed to inquire into the state of the poor, at the time of the revolution, but it was rejected by the National Assembly. The support of the poor is somewhat precarious. In large towns there are hospitals for the sick and aged poor, and these are chiefly supported by a toll laid on all provisions entering the town. But in the country places there are no such asylums, and the support of the indigent is less certain. We have seen many beggars on the road, but certainly not so many as I expected, and by no means so many as besiege the traveller in Ireland; such as there are, are chiefly old men and children. The most troublesome fellows are the boys, who surround you whenever you leave your carriage or your inn, each eager to become your guide, to the cathedral, or other objects of curiosity in the place, which they run over with great rapidity. Whether you wish for their assistance or not, they continue to pursue you, and it is almost impossible to get a walk in any direction through a town, without some of these pests at your heels.

Your's, &c.

LETTER XVIII.

Geneva.

My dear ——

It was a lovely morning when we left Dijon, and the road presented a more animated scene than we had witnessed in any previous part of our route. This compensated for the insipidity of the country, which is flat and open, and with little variety to relieve the eye, though in a high state of cultivation, and smiling with the promise of an abundant autumn. We passed many groupes of cheerful peasantry repairing to the town, and many wagons, of a curious structure, heavily laden, and drawn by horses, as curiously yoked to the carriage and to each other.

Approaching to Auxonne, the number of people on the road increased, and we observed a considerable difference both in their costume and their complexion, particularly in the women. Their faces were extremely brown, and to defend themselves from the scorching sun, they had an enormous kind of white beaver hat, of very coarse materials, but of immense dimensions, broader than the hats of the Chinese, and to the full as capacious as that of any coal-heaver in London. They cut a curious figure thus attired about the head; and, together with the cocked-hats of the men, which most tenaciously retain two peaks only, out of the three, that give it rather the appearance of a small inverted canoe, present a truly foreign picture to an English eye. We found Auxonne crowded with people and cattle, it being a horse fair, and while the horses were putting to, which was not very expeditiously done, we amused ourselves with strolling through the streets and mingling with the crowd. We have certainly found more life, more business, more cheerfulness, and more apparent comfort, in the remote provinces than in those nearest to the capital. I pretend not to account for this, but merely name the fact, as not altogether undeserving of remark. Auxonne is remarkable for two things, the double wall that surrounds it, and its long and venerable bridge, which, by three-and-twenty arches, crosses the Saone; the river which flows past that town to Lyons. At this place I furnished myself with a straw hat, such as is usually worn by the people of the country, my own being almost insupportable amid the burning heat to which I was constantly exposed.

There was little to interest us on leaving Auxonne, till, at the brow of the hill, immediately before we entered Dole, the carriage suddenly stopped, and the postilion cried out, There's Mont Blanc! There are the Alps! I started from a deep reverie into which I had fallen, and lifting up my eyes, beheld the whole chain of Alps, forming the line of the horizon, at the immense distance of one hundred and thirty miles, and yet distinctly seen with the naked eye. Mont Blanc appeared towering above them all, and glittering in the sunbeams like a crystal lake. The emotions of my mind at that moment were unutterable. I had not power to speak—my heart beat with increased rapidity within my bosom—and now that the sublime and stupendous objects, upon which my imagination had dwelt so long, and with so much ardour, were actually before me, I could scarcely realize the scene, or believe the vision true. And, indeed, there was something so unearthly in their appearance—distance, and the splendours of a summer noon had so melted and softened them down—that they looked like a singular combination of dark and brilliant clouds resting on the earth: while the suddenness and unexpectedness of their appearance, all contributed to heighten the effect, and give it more the air of enchantment than reality. You may smile, perhaps, that I should make so much of what some would deem a very little thing, and occupy so many lines in telling you where, and when I first saw the Alps. But if there are any scenes that interest me, next to the important discoveries of the sacred volume, they are the sublime and beautiful in nature—such objects as surround me now, and such as are to feast my eyes and fill my heart, if life and health are spared, through the ensuing week. The man who does not kindle at these displays of the Creator's power—that has no spirit stirring in his breast to harmonize and mingle with them, had better stay in cities, and study man! But I am happy sometimes to escape from man, to study nature—and amidst her awful or her lovely scenes, to converse with God. I send you a sketch of the scenery to which I have now alluded. It was committed immediately to paper, while the outline was before me. It has the merit of correctness, therefore, though I am well aware it is destitute of every other:

——— 'Twas noon,
And from the summit of the hill I gazed,
Over the fertile plains of southern France
That lay outstretched beneath a cloudless sky,
Rich in the produce of the bounteous year.
But, oh! the amazing barrier that afar
Stayed my advent'rous sight, and fixed my eyes
As in aerial regions betwixt earth and heaven.
I saw the Alps—the everlasting hills.—
A mighty chain, that stretched their awful forms
To catch the glories of the mid-day sun,
And cast their shadows o'er the "realms of noon."

Oh! 'twas a goodly sight;
Like some delicious summer evening's dream,
When worlds etherial float before the mind,
Peopled with beings of celestial mould,
That glide and glitter mid the cloudless sky,
And sip the dew from amaranthine flowers,
And drink the splendour of unsetting suns.
Yet, fair as fiction, 'twas an earthly scene;
A lovely portion of this lower world
By distance softened to the gazing eye.
Some rear'd their fronts and stretch'd their mighty length
Like heaps of shadow from the abyss of night;
And some like crystal seas and lakes of glass,
Hung by Omnipotence in middle air,
Appeared the boundary of this earthly scene—
This side the wond'rous ocean all was earth;
Beyond, the aerial billows roll'd and broke
In gentle murmurs on celestial shores.

I deem myself fortunate in having been thus favoured in my first view of the Alps. I believe they are not often seen at so immense a distance, though it is said that Mont Blanc is sometimes distinctly visible from the ramparts of Dijon.

We reached Poligny in the afternoon. It is a little post town delightfully situated at the foot of a romantic rocky hill, which may be considered as the first step in the mountains of the Jura. They are a chain of hills running through the whole of the province of Franche Compté, from Lyons in the south, to the Rhine in the north, and forming, in that direction, the natural frontier of France. You enter them at Poligny, and do not leave them till within a few miles of Geneva. They are a chain perfectly distinct from the great body of the Alps, though the departments in which they are situated are called the Higher and the Lower Alps.

The pass from Poligny into the Jura is extremely fine, and affords the traveller a rich specimen of the scenery that lies beyond. The road winds up a rocky and well wooded ravine, doubling and trebling till it reaches the summit, from which is an extensive prospect of the level country we had passed, and to which we now, without reluctance, bade adieu. It was long before our carriage reached the head of the ravine; we watched its progress as it slowly crept along at our feet, rendered insignificant by distance, but adding to the picturesque effect of the surrounding scenery by the stragglers it drew after it from the cottages, and the bustle it occasioned in its route. We admired the taste displayed by the hand of nature in the grouping of the firs in this romantic glen, the elegance of their forms, and the pleasing variety of hue, which their foliage exhibited from the deepest to the brightest green. In the valley, about a quarter of the way up, is an extensive building, which was formerly a monastery. The chapel is said to have been a very beautiful edifice. It was destroyed in the revolution, and the house, which was once the abode of monks, is now inhabited by the peasantry of the place, from whom we gained our information. Having reached a more level road, dark and gloomy mountains rose before us, and about night-fall we arrived at Champagnole, a little village at the foot of a lofty hill of that name. The mountains of the Jura, black with forest, and rendered hideous by the darkness of the night, which was hastening to inwrap them, rose beyond it. There was something appalling in the loneliness and wildness of the place, and the blackness that everywhere surrounded us. But we soon forgot the gloom that reigned without, by the warmth and cheerfulness of a blazing fire.

These forests, we were informed, abound with wolves, who, at certain seasons, are remarkably daring and ferocious. A friend of mine, who passed that way last year, learnt at Champagnole, that they had carried off a child from the outskirts of the village a day or two before his arrival. Happily, they kept a respectful distance from us, and neither alarmed us with their appearance or their voice.

At Champagnole we found the people in great distress. The number of travellers has considerably diminished this year, and this circumstance, together with the high price of corn, had induced them to sell most of their horses, so that we were fortunate in obtaining six for our carriage. If any party arrived after our departure, they must have waited for the return of our horses.

We were all day travelling over the Jura, occasionally descending into fertile and well-peopled valleys, and deep ravines, and often toiling up roads cut like shelves out of the rocks, at a height from which it was terrible to look down on the woods that waved, and the clouds that rolled beneath. I exulted, however, in the new and interesting scenery; the eye was no longer wearied with the sameness and monotony of a flat and higly cultivated country, subdued and fashioned by the art and to the taste of man; but all around was wild and independent—summits inaccessible to human footsteps, and rocks that bade defiance to human culture, with here and there a smiling valley, that just supplied enough for the necessities of its inhabitants, but denied that abundance which pampers luxury and increases wealth, too frequently the sources of tyranny and oppression. The farm-houses, too, reminded us, from the peculiarity of their structure, being composed simply of planks of fir, with vast projecting roofs of the same material, that we were approaching Switzerland, the cradle of freedom, and the retreat of Protestantism; while the general character of the cottages, and their romantic situations, naturally brought to my mind the many happy hours I have passed amid the mountains of Wales,—a country interesting to the lover of the picturesque from the grandeur of its scenery, but more so to the Christian, from the piety and zeal of its inhabitants. The only unpleasant circumstance in crossing the Jura, and which bespoke the deep poverty of the people, was the great increase of beggars. They were chiefly children, and their numbers and their importunity was truly astonishing. From the very slow rate at which we travelled, they were frequently enabled to follow us for a considerable distance, and this they did, entreating in the most piteous accents, and repeating the same words with a sort of measured intonation, Monsieur, s'il vous plait donnez moi charité. These were the sounds that perpetually assailed us, and we were glad when a little level road allowed us to go on at a quick rate, and thus lose, for awhile, the distressing din.

Leaving Champagnole, the road enters a sublime ravine, and ascends through rich forests of beech and fir, to Maison Neuve: there a delightful valley opens to receive it, well peopled and rich in pasturage; but, as if disdaining the lowland country, it soon turns from the peaceful vale, and climbs the rocks, and penetrates the woods that rise above it, and at length reaches St. Laurent, where, turning abruptly to the right, a deep romantic glen unfolds it beauties, while some of the loftiest summits of the Jura are seen beyond, dark with forests, and speckled with snow. At St. Laurent, we found the inn occupied by people who had come on occasion of a funeral. No one would have guessed their errand from their cheerful countenances; but such was the sprightliness and gaiety that seemed to reign throughout the party, that, but for their sable attire, we might have supposed they had come to celebrate a wedding or a wake. The scenery from St. Laurent was extremely wild and desolate. Clouds, mountains, and forests were all around us, with glens, but partially and indistinctly seen, beneath; and we had attained to a considerable elevation, when, about noon, the town of Morez burst upon our view. It is situated in the heart of the Jura, at the bottom of an immense cleft in the rocks, through which rolls a romantic stream, and where a few verdant fields are seen to shine. It happened to be market day, and the effect was most interesting—to emerge in a moment from the solitudes of gloomy mountains to the hum and bustle of a crowded country town! We looked upon it, like aerial beings taking a peep at what was passing in the lower world. It was a grateful refreshment to the eye and to the heart, and reminded us that we were still in the land of the living, and not quite beyond the reach of civilized society.

At Morez we met with two English gentlemen, returning from Italy. They observed, that although they had recently crossed the Simplon, yet they were much struck with the sublimity of these passes of the Jura. A few minutes chat with a countryman was very pleasant so far from home and in a land of strangers.

From Morez we ascended, by a steep and difficult path, that scarcely deserves the name of a road, to Les Rousses, an inconsiderable village, and thence still continuing the ascent, we passed the base of the Dole, one of the highest summits of the Jura. There we observed in the most sheltered situations, a few scattered houses, resorted to in the season, for the purpose of making the Gruyer cheese, which is celebrated all over the continent for its exquisite flavour.*

The road here became not a little terrific, running along the loftiest ledges of the mountains, where the breaking of a wheel, or the restiffness of a horse, might have been fatal to our party, till suddenly turning to the left, we saw at an almost inconceivable depth, the lake of Geneva at our feet. We enjoyed not that magnificent view of the Alps, which in clear weather is obtained from this point, and which has been so frequently described by travellers, for the rain had come on previously, and the whole scene was enveloped in clouds and mist, through which the lake was but dimly seen, and upon which it was fearful to look down. The descent from this point was extremely steep, and the road which winds down the side of the mountain rather too rapidly for the traveller's comfort, in one place made to pass through a huge projecting rock, that threatened to obstruct its way. But it was the work of Buonaparte, and rocks were mere playthings with him, as his passage of the Alps, and the passes of the Simplon attest. I left the carriage at the brow of the hill, and reached Gex, the next post town, and the last in France, considerably before it, so difficult is the descent. Sullen grandeur was the character of the scenery around me. Occasional gleams of light were cast upon the lake; and the clouds were seen rolling along the valley, and creeping up the bosoms of the mountains, now covering and now unfolding their summits clothed with copse-wood and crowned with forests of fir. But I paid for my gratification, and what I conceived my safety, by excessive fatigue and a wet skin.

At this place they brought us the most delicious wine we have yet tasted. We asked for the vin de pays—they called it lunell. It appears to me to be in wine, what the pine-apple is among fruit—it combines in itself the flavour of every other, without an undue predominance of any.

Night now came on, and in the dark we passed Furney, the seat of the infidel Voltaire, and entered the gates of Geneva. We heard the roaring of the Rhone as we crossed the bridge, and our ears are perpetually saluted with the rippling of the lake upon which our hotel is situated.

LETTER XIX.

Martigny.

My dear ——

It often happens that where we expect the greatest gratification we enjoy the least. I have felt the force of this reflection in my visit to Geneva. The shortness of our stay did not allow us, indeed, to see any of its society: and the information I had previously obtained of the state of religion was not such as to excite in my mind very exalted expectations of pleasure from that source. Few of the doctrines and little of the spirit, which once rendered it the glory of the Protestant world, now remain: and that truth, which was asserted and maintained by Calvin, a name to which the city of Geneva is more indebted for its celebrity than to the grandeur of its scenery, the beauties of its lake, or the stern character of its ancient independence, has scarcely an asylum within its walls.* The pastors of its churches are almost to a man, Arians, or Socinians. A few, perhaps, may cherish the genuine principles of the reformation and feel their influence. I know, indeed, that this is the case, but they bear no proportion to the majority, who are sunk in infidelity and scepticism, and can do but little towards the diffusion of that divine light, and the spread of that glorious gospel, by the resuscitating energy of which the Church of Geneva may again awake from the philosophic dreams of infidelity, and emulate the zeal, the piety, and the simplicity of former times.

* The principal place for the manufacture of this cheese, and whence, indeed, it derives its name, is Gruyires, a small town in the canton of Friburg, in Switzerland. A great part of the salt consumed in the manufacture of these cheeses is drawn from Franche Compté. It sells at six batz, or eighteen French sous per pound.

* What was the state of things in this respect, in Voltaire's time, may be pretty correctly gathered from the friendship that subsisted between that arch-infidel and the pastors of Geneva. In a letter to D'Alembert, in 1757, he writes, "The magistrates and the priests come to dine with me as usual. Continue to leave with me and Tronchin the charge of the pleasant affair of the Socinians of Geneva." In another to the same correspondent, he says, "It cannot be otherwise than that, in Calvin's own town, with a population of four and twenty thousand free thinkers, there should still remain a few Calvinists; but they are extremely few, and are well abused. All honest folks are deists." These are surely awful testimonies against them; for what communion hath light with darkness? What concord hath Christ with Belial? or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel? Another evidence as to the state of religion in Geneva about that time, may be gathered from the article Genève, in the French Encyclopædia. The writer of that article says, "To say all in one word, many of the pastors of Geneva own no religion but pure Socinianism. They reject all those things that are called mysteries and consider it as the first principle of a true religion, that it shall propose nothing to be believed that offends reason. Also, when pressed upon the necessity of revelation, that dogma so essential to Christianity, most substitute the term utility, (utilité) which appears to them more soft. In this, if they are not orthodox, they are, however, true to their principles." No wonder, that in the very next paragraph in the same horrible article, should be the following passage: "It is not surprising that the progress of infidelity should be less deprecated at Geneva than elsewhere, since their religion is reduced almost to the adoration of one only God—respect for Jesus Christ and the Scriptures being the only things which distinguished the Christianity of Geneva from pure deism." "The pastors of Geneva," says Rousseau, "are asked if Jesus Christ is God: they dare not answer. They are asked, what mysteries they admit: they dare not answer. A philosopher casts upon them a haughty glance; he sees through them; he discovers them to be Arians, Socinians; he proclaims it, and thinks that he does them honour. Immediately alarmed, terrified, they assemble, they consult, they are agitated; they know not what saint to call upon; and after manifold consultations, deliberations, con-

But I was somewhat disappointed in the general appearance of the city. The style of building, in the commercial part of it, is extremely uncouth and barbarous. The roofs of the houses project entirely over the footpath, and are supported by long pillars from the streets. Lines of little shops, not unlike the movable offices which you see upon the quays in London and in Liverpool, are placed between the footpath and the horse-road, so that the light being impeded both from above and below, the whole has a mean and gloomy appearance. There are some good houses in the upper part of the town, built of stone, and very lofty, commanding magnificent views of the lake and the surrounding country. There is little uniformity in the streets of Geneva. They are wild and irregular, and, with few exceptions, very steep, in perfect accordance with the character of the neighbouring scenery. Many parts of the city reminded me of Chester, especially those streets in which the roofs of the houses project as I have described. They present a nearer approach to the rows of that ancient city than anything I have seen elsewhere. Geneva is surrounded by fortifications, and is entered by gates and drawbridges. The entrance from the French side is very handsome.

On Sunday, I debated much in my own mind where I should worship. Unhappily, the gentleman to whom I had an introduction was from home, and our maître de place could give me very little information on religious matters. Aware, however, of the state of things in the churches of Geneva, and ignorant who and what I might hear, I determined for the English Episcopal chapel. I felt the devotional part of the service extremely edifying, and was much impressed with the scriptural character and deeply devotional spirit of the liturgy. I wish I could say as much of the sermon. The chapel was very respectably attended by English families, resident chiefly in the vicinity of Geneva. There were several carriages, and some with coronets, at the door, after service. We were then too late for any of the churches; and indisposition, the result, I believe, of extreme fatigue, induced me to remain at home the rest of the day.

There was more external decency observed in Geneva than at Paris; but, nearly the whole of the afternoon, they were fiddling and dancing in the opposite house to our hotel, quite after the manner of a continental Sabbath; and from six in the morning, I was completely robbed of my repose, by a Frenchman in the next chamber to mine reading aloud what appeared to me to be a French play with all the intonation and vociferation of an actor, studying his part for the performance of the evening.

The views of the lake from my bed-room window would have been delightful, but the incessant rain that fell during the whole of the day, and the thickness of the atmosphere in the morning, deprived me of their full enjoyment. But the lake, in this part of it, is ever restless; the Rhone about to issue from it prevents its repose, and its murmurs are pleasing to the ear. They awakened many interesting associations in my mind, and the impression was, perhaps, as powerful, as if all the majestic scenery that surrounds it had been perfectly unveiled to my view.

We had not been long in Geneva before we were waited upon by a Monsieur Crotet, who offered his services as our guide to the glaciers of Savoy. He had served the Princess of Wales in that capacity, and possessed her attestation, together with that of many other distinguished characters, to his qualifications for such an office. He traced out to us the plan of our route, upon a beautiful model of the Alps of Savoy, executed in relief, which he brought with him for the double purpose of information and of traffic. At his suggestion, it was determined to send the carriage round the opposite side of the lake to meet us at this place, while we took a calash from Geneva as far as St. Martin's, on our way to Chamouni, where we must abandon it, and be content to proceed on mules.

These important matters being duly arranged, we took a drive round the environs of the city, and were much delighted with the variety, the beauty, and the grandeur of its scenery. Happily, the rain had ceased—the clouds began to ascend and to disperse, and the views of the lake, and the mountains, in every direction, were most enchanting and sublime. From one favoured spot, at the head of the lake, a greater variety of grand and interesting objects meets the eye, than perhaps are to be seen from any other spot in Europe. A venerable and populous city lies at your feet—a vast and magnificent lake, in calm and placid dignity, spreads its pellucid waves beyond—a landscape rich in all the produce that the diligent cultivation of a fruitful soil can furnish, what the French call, une Champagne riante, is immediately around—while vast and gloomy mountains form a stupendous background to the picture, stretching their awful forms to meet the distant horizon, and hiding their lofty summits in the clouds. In clear weather, the hoary-headed Mont Blanc appears like the presiding genius of the scene—the venerable monarch of his kindred Alps. The mountains most distinctly visible when we enjoyed the prospect, were the Salève, on the right, rising to upwards of three thousand feet, and the uninterrupted length of the Jura to the left, whose highest point is upwards of four thousand. From this spot, which we left with reluctance, we proceeded to the banks of the Arve, and pursuing its direction for awhile, at length alighted at the entrance of a copse, through which we made our way with difficulty, the path being hilly, and very slippery from the recent rains, to a place where we saw at our feet the much celebrated junction of the Arve and the Rhone. The Arve has a thick and soapy appearance, derived, in all probability, from the mountains of ice and snow, in the midst of which it rises. The Rhone is of a fine dark green, and issuing fresh and unspotted from the lake, seems for awhile to disdain a connection with its muddy spouse. For two or three miles, the haughty Rhone keeps up its reserve, and the rivers roll side by side, in the same bed, without mingling their waters. At length, however, yielding to the destiny that has made them one, they embrace and blend with each other; the distinction is quickly lost, and the polluted Arve is absorbed in the turbulent and majestic Rhone. Both rivers are, indeed, extremely rapid, and this gives an impetus to their course, which, as they previously run nearly in the same direction, may account for the curious circumstance of their preserving a distinctness so long after their junction.

I felt no inclination to visit Furney, the residence of Voltaire. When I consider the pestilential influence of his character and writings, and the infernal elements and diabolical spirit which compose and animate them, my heart sickens at the mention of his name; and I should have shuddered to enter the dwelling once inhabited by the bitterest and most malignant enemy of the Redeemer, that ever, perhaps, appeared in a human form!

We left Geneva at four in the afternoon, with every favourable omen, as to the weather, and all in excellent spirits, little anticipating the severe test to which the courage and philosophy of some were shortly to be put. For my own part, I must confess, it was with considerable emotion, that I crossed the drawbridge of Geneva to commence this tour. The few days that were then immediately to follow, promised to be amongst the most varied and interesting of my life, and were to give to my actual sight, those sublime and stupendous features in nature, which had filled my imagination, as depicted in the narratives of travellers, and the songs of poets—of which I had talked, and read, and dreamt, but which, till recently, I had never hoped to visit. Mons. Crotet, our newly-acquired guide, appeared at the appointed hour, ferences, the whole terminates in a nonplus; in which is neither said, Yes, nor No. These clerical gentlemen of your's are, in truth, singular beings. One knows not what they believe or what they disbelieve; one does not even know what they pretend to believe; their only method of establishing their own faith is by attacking that of others." Thus it was fifty years ago; how it is now, may be learned from the catechism which the pastors of that church have lately published, in which everything essential and vital in Christianity is omitted; nothing is left to be believed, and unbelief is the very essence and spirit, if it can be called so, of the system. I rejoice, however, that there is a remnant of holy and devoted men still in Geneva, who retain the most ardent attachment to the doctrines of their forefathers, and fear not to preach them faithfully. These men have recently been encouraged by the countenance and zeal of a few British Christians, and by their united efforts, with the blessing of heaven, we have reason to hope that the pure principles of the reformation may yet prevail again in Geneva. Those who wish to see more on this melancholy subject, may consult a most important article in the Eclectic Review for January, 1818, on the above-mentioned catechism, and the catechism itself.

mounted on his bidet, in a splendid uniform of blue and gold, which he had new, in honour of the Princess, with a silver medal suspended from his button-hole, indicating him to be a courier of government, and a man in authority to procure horses or mules, or in any other way to expedite the advance of the parties he conducted. This paraphænalia, I assure you, has proved by no means useless, for they seem to be as well aware of what is likely to promote their own interest in this, as in any other part of the world.

A few miles from Geneva we entered Savoy, and passed from the Protestant republic of Geneva, to the Papal territories of the King of Sardinia. Here the scenery of the Alps began to open before us. On the right, the Arve was seen winding through a highly cultivated and luxuriant valley; on either side, hills and rocks rose to a considerable elevation, and behind, the mountains of the Jura closed in grandeur the delightful view. We passed through many peaceful villages, whose inhabitants appeared to be a simple and a happy people, and about sunset, reached, by a long avenue of elms, the little town of Bonneville, romantically seated on the Arve.

Our arrival created no small stir amongst the inhabitants. Heads in abundance appeared at the doors and windows as we passed along the street, and a crowd was soon assembled round our carriage when it stopped.

The town is embosomed in the mountains, and watered by the Arve. It has a fine ancient bridge over the river, from which the surrounding scenery is viewed to great advantage. The former rises abruptly, on the right, to the elevation of 4500 feet from its base; and on the left, Mont Brezon, to nearly the same altitude. The former is elegantly formed, and terminates in a peak; the latter is extremely wild and savage in its aspect, and little more than a bare and rugged rock, with occasional patches of verdure.

In the evening, we were somewhat interested with the conversation of an old soldier, who came to offer his handy-work in the plaiting of hair for sale, and who spoke broken English, having been a prisoner in England. He told us they were miserably poor, and had suffered intensely by the failure of the last harvest. He said that few, very few, could read, yet they were not destitute of Bibles. "But of what use are they," said I, "if nobody can read!" "Oh!" said he, "some can read, and those who can, read to those who cannot." "This," I replied," "is as it should be, so far is it goes—but would it not be better, that those who cannot read should learn, that all may read it for themselves?" He shrugged up his shoulders at this, and made no reply: but his looks seemed to say, either, "I do not comprehend you," or "that is a matter quite out of my province to meddle with; we leave all these things to our priests."

Before leaving Bonneville, we strolled into the church-yard. The church is a neat and simple structure, not unlike some of our country chapels in Lancashire; and the congregation, as they came out from mass, consisting chiefly of women with their blue cloaks, tended to confirm the general resemblance of the scene. We were particularly struck with an immense cross of wood standing by the pathway in the church-yard, and furnished with all the apparatus for crucifixion—the ladder, the hammer, the nails, the sponge, together with representations, correct models no doubt, of the lantern which Judas used when he came to the garden to betray his master, the dice with which the soldiers cast lots upon his garments, and the cock which crew after that Peter had thrice denied him. Poor deluded people! duped with such toys as these! How is the pleasure derived from the beauty and grandeur of their country mingled with pain and regret, excited by the contemplation of their moral and spiritual condition.

We left Bonneville at an early hour. The road passes over the bridge to the foot of the Môle, and traverses a lovely valley, bounded by lofty mountains, and rich in scenes of pastoral beauty. The Môle was a fine object in the landscape scene from the windows of our inn at Bonneville, and did not fail to renew our gratification as we passed along its base in the morning. Though nearly 6000 feet above the level of the sea, it is clothed with verdure to its summit. Its companion, the Brezon, is, however, of another cast, and in its bare and rugged crags, presents a striking contrast to the Môle. The road is lined on either side with walnut trees, which afford a grateful shade. The pine-built cottages are by no means thinly scattered throughout the valley, and there is something remarkably neat and simple in the appearance of the people. The same character of countenance pervades them all, especially the women, so that they seem like brothers and sisters of the same family. It was the shepherd's fête, an annual festival, celebrated by the shepherds in these valleys, on the Nativity of John the Baptist. On this occasion, the shepherds, in their best attire, pay their respects to the shepherdesses in the morning. Service is performed in the church, to which they make a point of attending; and festivity and mirth fill up the remainder of the day. Many of the houses which we passed, had garlands and crosses of flowers nailed over the doors, and some of the cattle were adorned with similar insignia, in honour of the festival. We could not have seen the people to greater advantage. And yet, we did not observe that gaiety and cheerfulness which we had anticipated in the peasantry of Savoy, and which, one should suppose, an occasion like this would have excited. The truth is, they suffered too much from the entire failure of the last harvest, to resign themselves to thoughtless gaiety, till they see the crops well gathered in. The valley from Bonneville is considered as the first portal of the Alps.

Passing the village of Sigony, we were shown the opening of the valley far up the mountain to the right, in which was formerly the convent of the Chartreuse du Reposoir, whose once hospitable inmates were wont to welcome the traveller to their lonely dwelling, when, destitute of good roads and comfortable inns, these valleys were explored with difficulty and with danger.

From this place the mountains closed upon us. The rocks began most fearfully to overhang the road, and seemed as if hastening to embrace each other. Here, at the commencement of this narrow defile, the Arve is rather heard than seen to roll its noisy and contracted stream. Where the river has found a bed, man has also fixed his habitation,—for, crossing a romantic bridge, and turning abruptly to the right, we entered the little town of Cluse, enclosed on either side by rocky ramparts, and sheltered, one should imagine, equally from sunbeams and from storms. Here all further proceeding seemed to be stopped, at least for carriages, for there appeared to be scarcely room enough for the flowing of the Arve; but, on leaving Cluse, our admiration was excited by the safe and easy road, which is judiciously cut at the foot of the rocks, and we were filled with astonishment at the ingenuity and perseverance of man, till the opening of the valley awakened our attention to the sublime and magnificent features of nature all around us. This is called the second portal of the Alps. The Arve rolled at our feet, and as we followed the various windings of the valley, seemed to spread itself into a series of lakes, each presenting its own peculiar characters of loveliness and majesty. The sides of the mountains were occasionally bare and rugged, but for the most part they were clothed with forests of fir: while above, pointed summits and fantastic crags, everywhere met the eye, and filled us with admiration and awe. A few miles up the valley, the guide pointed out to us the entrance of the cavern de Balme,—a sort of arch in the cliff, about six hundred feet above its base. It is a natural gallery in the rock, and well worthy the attention of those who have leisure to visit it. The ascent, however, is difficult, and we contented ourselves with the guide's description. The valley now becomes still more spacious; but its boundaries increase in grandeur, while the eye is relieved by the Bosquets de Maglan, which begin to impart their exquisite softness and agreeable variety to this charming scene. There are groves or clumps of beech trees, situated in the meadows, which rise in gentle swells from the verge of the Arve, and spread their green and undulating carpet, spotted with cottages, and watered by innumerable streams, to the bases of the neighbouring rocks. At one of these, famed as the retreat of the Naturalist, Bourrit, we alighted. It was a lonely and sequestered spot. The copse afforded us a grateful shade from the noon-tide sun—the murmurings of the restless Arve were the only sounds that broke upon the ear—while all around, tremendous precipices rose to heaven, and seemed to shut us out from the cares of mortals, and the busy world. My imagination never pictured a fairer scene, or dipped its pencil in brighter hues. I rose, as if by enchantment, and the spell seemed for a moment to have included us in its potent influence, for we were riveted to the scene, and felt an almost unconquerable reluctance to depart. But our guide admonished us of the lapse of time, and having let off a hand-grenade, that we might enjoy its echoes as the rocks returned them, we repaired again to the carriage. Such, thought I, is human life. Such, and so fleeting, are its joys. We have scarcely time to realize them, ere they are fled—like those occasional gleams of light, which sometimes break upon us in a stormy day!——

Leaving this sequestered spot, we passed, on the left, the delicate waterfall, D'orli, and a few miles beyond, we paused to admire the beautiful cataract of Arpenas, perhaps the most elegant in the Alps. Its height is estimated at eight hundred feet. The water rushes with considerable volume over a tremendous precipice of dark and fantastic rocks. At first it divides into separate streams, that in their fall somewhat resemble descending rockets, till at length, caught by the rocks beneath, they meet and mingle in one mass of foam, more light and graceful than the softest pencil could portray. At this cataract we had a remarkable instance of that deception which is produced to the eye, by the magnitude of the objects which compose the scenery of these Alpine regions. Viewed from the road, at the distance of not many hundred yards, the fall itself appeared to be by no means so considerable as its measurement determines, while at its foot there was a little verdant hillock, to the summit of which it seemed that a few steps would elevate us. To this hillock we determined to proceed, as a good station from whence to view the cataract. But what was our astonishment, when we saw "the mole-hill rise into a mountain" before us; and having, with no small toil, reached its top, beheld the cataract itself multiplied to an almost inconceivable vastness, rushing into a perturbed abyss beneath, that confounded us by its uproar, and bedewed us with its spray.

As we passed the neat and rural village of Maglan, which is not far from the waterfall, the people were leaving the church. We were much struck with the beauty of the women. I never saw such an assemblage of pleasing, open, and intelligent faces before.

At St. Martin's, the little town of Salenche was seen, on the opposite side of the Arve, seated at the foot of its romantic mountains, while its neat white spire arose in modest elegance above the surrounding woods.

St. Martin's is a solitary inn, with the appropriate sign of Mont Blanc, well situated for the accommodation of travellers. This is a place which some of our party will long remember, and none of us, perhaps, shall easily forget, for there commenced the several toils, and the highest pleasures of our tour. We could no longer proceed in the comfortable vehicle which had conveyed us from Geneva, but were compelled to commit ourselves to the obstinate dispositions, and uneasy paces of the mules of the country. We have since learned, however, that we might, perhaps, have been furnished with the char-a-banc, the only carriage which traverses these Alpine paths. It is a sort of car, very low, upon which two or three may sit, being drawn sideways, with their feet resting on a swinging board, which almost touches the ground. We met the daughter of Admiral N——— in such a carriage, in one of the wildest parts of the route, and we saw it cross a roaring mountain torrent, under circumstances of apparent peril, which we could not contemplate without emotion—but which the unconcern of the guides, and the fearlessness of the animal that drew the car, convinced us existed more in our imagination, unaccustomed to such scenes, than in reality. Having named the lady, I ought to add, that the noble admiral, mounted on a mule, was by her side.

Behold us, then, well seated on our safe and hardy animals—surrounded with skilful and experienced guides, with Monsieur Crotet at their head, as the captain of the host,—fairly on our way to Chamouni. Yes—we were to sleep that night at the foot of Mont Blanc, upwards of three thousand feet above the level of the sea, and surrounded, in the midst of summer, by eternal snow! You will not wonder at the enthusiasm which these anticipations kindled, or that, with the remembrance of them, it should awake again. Do not expect, however, a description of the scenery through which we passed in this most original and romantic ride. The rapid succession of grand and interesting objects—the ever-varying circumstance of light and shadow, of sunshine and of cloud, of brilliancy and of gloom, under which they were contemplated,—the individual features of the landscape, which sometimes fixed us in silent admiration, and the grand and stupendous whole, which occasionally overwhelmed the mind—all require descriptive powers to which I have no pretension. The pencil of a Claude, and the pen of a Byron, were equally inadequate to convey to the mind of one who has not witnessed similar scenery, any adequate impression. Yet, I am anxious you should, in some degree, participate my pleasure, and, transported in imagination to these regions, travel with me. Hopeless, then, as the task of description may appear, I will yet attempt it, convinced that with you, the intention will be a sufficient atonement for the failure.

The road, or rather path, from St. Martin's, is up a deep and fertile valley, watered by the Arve, rich in woods of fir, and bounded by mountains of various forms and of tremendous altitudes. Their rugged peaks were sometimes lost in the clouds, at others, their summits towered in majesty above them, and, disdaining the veil in which they would have shrouded their glories, left them to rest upon their bosom, or to creep along their base—and often bathed in the blue ether of the heavens, the rocky peaks appeared as if themselves ethereal, and exhibiting, what mineralogists call, the play of colours, looked like masses of transparent matter, composed of the purest elements and richest hues—rendered still more glorious by the splendours of the retiring sun. At the little village of Chede, at the upper end of the valley, and where the mountains began most sublimely to close upon our path, we turned aside to see the beautiful cataract of that name. It is extremely elegant in its form. The scenery that surrounds it is sylvan and sequestered. The torrent that composes it, rushes from the neighbouring mountains, and dashing down a succession of precipices, hurries, fretted and uneasy, over its rocky bed, to pour its tributary streams into the waters of the Arve. I was shocked to meet with an instance of avarice and extortion even here—in this deep retirement of nature, where one should imagine such sordid passions could have no excitement. A miserable old woman, at the little farm-house where we left our mules, muttered out her discontent at a handsome remuneration for a little milk and a few wild strawberries, with which she presented us on our return from the cataract. Here, thought I, in this old woman, whose face was the personification of every mean and malignant passion,—here is a fine example for those dreaming sentimentalists who rhapsodize, about the power of grand and romantic scenery to refine and elevate the mind! Our friend, Mons. Crotet, however, gave her a very wholesome lecture on the sin of covetousness, and we left her, not a little affected at such an exhibition of human nature, and in such a place. We looked for extortion in the streets of Paris, but little expected to find it by the waterfall of Chede!

The path now became extremely steep and difficult, and we continued to ascend, till we halted to rest a moment at the little lake of Chede, whose water is famed as the purest of the Alps. From this spot we distinctly saw the summit of Mont Blanc—saw the clouds roll off, and leave its hoary head, white with the snows of ages, perfectly uncovered, and finely contrasted with the deep azure of the sky it seemed almost to touch. It was the first near view we had obtained of the monarch of the Alps. When we saw him last, it was at the distance of one hundred and thirty miles; but now he appeared so near, that a few minutes would be sufficient to bring us to his base. And yet there were many long and weary miles between. Bruce's emotions of rapture, on beholding the source of the Nile, could hardly have exceeded mine, at this moment. The eye was dazzled in gazing on the vast and spotless object that absorbed us. It glittered in the sunbeams like transparent glass, and pure and chaste as were the light clouds that lingered round it, they were dark, compared with its superior brightness; while the obscurity in which they wrapt the lower scenes and inferior mountains, gave to that which we beheld an appearance of still greater elevation, and rendered it like a crystal mountain in a sea of clouds. The southern needle of Mont Blanc, too, was fully dismantled, and showed its beautiful point to the enraptured eye. It seemed as if the parting clouds had afforded us a glimpse of a new world—and imagination peopled it with beings pure as its spotless soil. All the scenes I had before admired, appeared dark and grovelling, compared with the bright regions which I then beheld; regions of the purest white—untrodden solitudes of snow, meet only for the visits of celestial beings—the connecting link between earth and heaven. On such a spot, one could imagine angels would alight when sent on messages of mercy to mankind,

> "And there from finished earth, triumphant trod
> The last ascending steps of her creating God."

I thought of the men who had reached its summit, and could scarcely realize the idea of such a hazardous and daring enterprise—there was nothing in the appearance of the scene at all terrestrial, and I felt as if to ascend Mont Blanc, would be to betray a temerity somewhat similar to Babel's builders, whose ambition aimed at nothing less than heaven.

Hence the way became still more rugged, and what timid people would call dangerous, and dangerous it was, if riding along ledges of lofty rocks, with deep ravines beneath, and undefended from the precipice, were so: and every now and then crossing mountain torrents, swollen and rendered fearful by the recent rains. Our guides indulged us with a short repose at the little village of Servoz, whose neat church with its modest spire, was an interesting object as we sat at the door of the inn, enjoying the majestic scenery that encircled us.

Will you allow me, ere we proceed again, to tell you of the fate of an amiable youth, named Eschen, who, in 1801, perished in a crevice of the glacier du Buet, a mountain in this neighbourhood, upwards of nine thousand feet above the level of the sea. He set off to explore it without a competent guide, and fell, as in such a case is almost inevitable, a victim to his imprudence. A monument was erected by M. d'Eymar, Prefét du Léman, both as a mark of respect to his memory, and as an admonition to future travellers. It consists of a pyramid, rounded at its summit. I copy the inscription for your perusal. On the principal face of the pyramid, el de sa puissance.

A la mémoire

You may be sure we were not unmindful of these friendly hints, and the air of vanity which pervades the inscription, and which marks it as truly French, was overlooked for the moment, in the importance of the admonitions it conveyed, and the benevolence by which it appeared to have been dictated. We, however, had little reason to apprehend a similar catastrophe from a similar cause, for we had guides in abundance. We seemed, indeed, to collect as we advanced, for on leaving Servoz, the number was considerably augmented, and ere we reached the vale of Chamouni, we formed no inconsiderable cavalcade. Our guides, too, many of them, fully answered the description of the nécessaire, as far as the robuste was concerned ; their prudence, however, remained to be tried ; but they looked like sober, decent men, and conducted themselves with great civility.

From Servoz our guides urged us to quicken our pace, for the day was drawing to a close, and we felt that night would be no very desirable circumstance on such a road. Moreover, the clouds were gathering blackness, and the rain began to descend, and everything indicated a cheerless, if not a tempestuous night. The ladies were already much fatigued by their ride, for the paces of the mules were exceedingly rough, and we were all pretty well exhausted with our day's journey, when about nine o'clock we reached Le Prieuré, the principal place in the vale of Chamouni.

I should tell you that in our way we passed the remains of an avalanche which fell last year. It covered a considerable part of the road, and crushed a large portion of the neighbouring wood beneath its weight. The enormous mass of unmelted snow lay like a fallen mountain across the path, we were obliged to descend into a meadow, by a circuitous route, to compass it. The cottage of a peasant was buried beneath the heap, and one of its inhabitants was with difficulty saved.

On entering the vale of Chamouni, the first village you meet in Les Ouches, and the first object that arrests your attention is the glacier des Bossons, to the right of that village. At first it struck me as rather insignificant in its appearance, and, I must confess, I felt some little disappointment. It looked like the arc of a circle inclined from the lower part of the mountain to the valley, composed of ice, and covered with crystals, of various forms, pyramids, prisms, &c. of a bluish tinge. We found as we advanced, however, that its diminutive appearance, arose from distance and the magnitude of the surrounding objects. As we approached, it gradually enlarged its dimensions—the deep ravine down which it seems to rush, (though it is fixed and motionless,) opened to our view, and it assumed all its real magnitude and importance as we passed close by its base, and its icy pyramids seemed almost bending over us. But it had a sickly hue, and created a very different feeling in my mind to what I had anticipated from the first sight of a glacier. There is too much of death in it ever to awaken pleasing sensations: the gloom of the evening contributed to deepen the melancholy it inspired, and though the corn was waving at its foot, and the grass was green in the meadows, yet the woods were black that rose, on either side, above it, the forms of the mountains were wild and gigantic, and it seemed, at best, but a pale and ghastly feature in a dark and savage landscape.

I know not whether I shall be deemed guilty of the arrogance with which travellers are sometimes charged, if I should assume your ignorance of the subject, and proceed to tell you what a glacier is. For my own part, I had a very incorrect idea of it, till I saw one, so imperfect is the notion which words can convey, of an object, when there is nothing familiar to us with which to compare it. Why, then, you may say, attempt the hopeless task, of describing a glacier to me? Have you a new and improved method, by which you expect to succeed better than your predecessors? No. But I feel as though I should not do justice to my correspondent, my subject, or myself, if I did not make the attempt; and, perhaps, by the help of what I may say, and what others have said, you may correct some erroneous notions which, like me, you may have entertained respecting it. Well, then, to be methodical, first, as to the situation of a glacier—it is not itself a mountain of ice, but lies in a deep, sloping ravine, or cleft, between two mountains, and is a mass of ice filling up the valley to a considerable, but different height, as the base may be. As to what it is, and how it is formed, I am not philosopher enough to determine, and he must have a good share of self-confidence that could boldly say he was—but it looked to me as if an enormous multitude of icy pyramids had rushed from the summits of the neighbouring mountains, till meeting in this ravine, they became crowded together, when, suddenly arrested in their progress by the valley, they pressed closely on each other, till some fell,—many were ready to fall,—some were squeezed by the pressure into prisms,—some lost their delicate peaks, and the whole became wild and irregular in its appearance—as you frequently see a mass of quartz crystals irregularly formed and disposed upon a bed of limestone. I am in doubt, indeed, whether you will be any wiser after this attempt at description than before. But, I must confess, I am utterly at a loss how to describe to you an object so novel, and of which, a few hours ago, I myself had no correct conception. There are five of these glaciers in the vale of Chamouni; the principal, however, are those of Des Bossons, and De Bois. They usually lie in a direction north and south, rarely east and west: and the reason is, perhaps, that the action of the sun would be too powerful for their preservation, if they were not deeply imbedded in ravines rarely visited by his rays.

It is a curious circumstance, that this romantic valley, in which are some of the sublimest objects in nature, should have been undiscovered till about sixty years ago, when two countrymen of our's ventured to explore it. The history of their expedition is rather amusing, not from the dangers they encountered, but from those they apprehended, and the measures which they took to guard against them. All that was known about it, till then, amounted to this, that there was an exceedingly sublime valley somewhere to the south, in the heart of Savoy, a few of whose inhabitants occasionally came to Geneva with its produce, and spread the report of its grandeur. Interested with these accounts, Dr. Pickard and a Mr. Wyndham, who happened to meet with some of these mountaineers, on a market-day at Geneva, determined to visit it. Accordingly, they made ready as for a most formidable enterprise, and furnished themselves with fire-arms, as though they were going amongst a barbarous people. But when they reached the vale, they were not more astonished at the sublime appearances of nature it exhibited, than at the extent and civilized state of its population. They saw many populous villages scattered in the midst of corn-fields and of meadows, surrounded by woods that are ever green, and ice that never melts—in a valley, eighteen miles in length and about one in breadth, environed by mountains of appalling height, and presenting an endless variety of grand and terrific forms—peaks of bare and rugged rock, and summits covered with eternal snow, that seem to prop the heavens, and forbid the daring footsteps of man—while from their sides and from their brows they rolled down vast accumulations of ice, to blend their fantastic shapes and mingling hues with the softer scenery below—and in the midst of all, the life and business of husbandry and pasturage advancing, at an elevation of more than 3000 feet above the level of the sea, and in a seclusion till then unknown to all the world beside themselves and the simple natives of the place. The first impression of the scene, even upon those who are apprized of it, is powerful,—what must it have been to these adventurers. It was an interesting discovery, and future travellers may well record their names with gratitude. But I must close this letter. Some lines of Lord Byron occur to me as admirably descriptive of the scenes in which it leaves me:

"——— Above me are the Alps,
The palaces of nature, whose vast walls
Have pinnacled in clouds their snowy scalps,
And throned Eternity in icy halls
Of cold sublimity, where forms and falls
The avalanche—the thunderbolt of snow!
All that expands the spirit, yet appals,
Gather around these summits as to show
How earth may pierce to heaven, yet leave vain man below."

Your's &c.

LETTER XX.

Lausanne.

My dear ——

We were, happily, much favoured by the weather during our short stay in the vale of Chamouni, and enjoyed a most auspicious day for the ascent of Montanvert, and the visit to the Mer de Glace. Montanvert rises abruptly from the vale of Chamouni, and may be considered as one of the bases of Mont Blanc. Its height is 2752 feet above the valley, and it is beautifully wooded to its summit. From this latter circumstance it has derived its name. It is usually ascended by travellers, as it commands the sea of ice, and the wilderness of snowy mountains, that surround and overhang it to the south, with the vale of Chamouni, Mont Breven, and the Col de Balme, and many other majestic elevations, to the north.

Mr. H. and myself took an early breakfast, and leaving the ladies in the care of Sir S——, left Chamouni at half past seven, and reached the summit of the mountain about ten. The ascent is exceedingly steep, and is frequently made in part upon mules, but we performed the whole on foot. Our guide was Michael Ferrez, one of those who accompanied M. de Saussure in his first ascent to Mont Blanc, a robust, careful, civil, and intelligent man, to whose assistance and information we were greatly indebted. At the commencement of the expedition we were each furnished with a long pole, with a spike at the end, for which we found abundant use before our return. About half way up the mountain, we paused to rest a moment at the fountain of Caillet, where Mons. Florian met the beautiful girl who furnished him with the subject of an interesting tale, called La Belle Savoyarde. She was presenting a basket of strawberries to an English traveller, as he passed. We drank some of the water, and found it very refreshing after an hour's previous toil; it was cool and clear—whether, like Mons. Florian, we drank in inspiration with the draught, remains hereafter to be proved. As far as I am concerned, I am happy that you are to be the judge. I have little to fear from one so partial—you will not censure even if you cannot praise.

In our ascent we observed the ruin which had been wrought by many avalanches, while our ears were assailed by the thunder of others, occurring in higher districts of the mountains, and out of our sight. Trees torn up by the roots, withered branches and blasted trunks were scattered in every direction round us, and sometimes a considerable space was completely cleared by one of these tremendous agents of destruction. An avalanche that fell about two hundred years ago, completely buried the principal village which was situated at the foot of the mountain, in consequence of which, the inhabitants who escaped removed to the opposite side of the Arve, which flows through the centre of the valley, and built the present village of Chamouni, or the Priory. The higher we ascended the more steep and difficult the way became, and we began to find the poles with which the guide had furnished us of considerable service. His mode of using them, however, was very different from that which my previous habits suggested. He taught us to hold them with both hands, resting the weight of the body upon them, and at the same time inclining the figure towards the face of the mountain. In this case a false step would have been less dangerous, than if the inclination of the body had been towards the valley. But soon their assistance became absolutely essential when we reached the Crottes, for so the guide called the shoots or rivers of frozen snow that, towards its summit, descended down the sides of the mountain, and over which the traveller must pass. The danger here was certainly considerable, the inclination of the ice being extremely steep, and the surface perfectly smooth—one false step would have been inevitable destruction. Our guide crossed first, making holes for our feet with his own. He then returned, and taking one at a time by the left hand, while the right grasped the pole which was to preserve the balance true, directed us to look neither above nor on one side, but only at our feet, for if we stumbled, and touched the ice with any part of the body but the foot, nothing could save us from being precipitated down the ice, and dashed against the rocks or the stumps of trees below. You may be sure we implicitly followed his directions, and having passed the first in safety, the rest, for there were several, appeared less formidable, while the danger was diminished in proportion to the confidence we acquired. Ladies, however, frequently cross these icy shoots, supported and defended from danger by two poles, which pass under the arms, and are carried by two guides in the manner of a sedan chair. In this way, the daughter of Admiral N——— passed, two days before us, being the first heroine who had climbed to the summit of Montanvert this season. Upon one of these shoots, our guide showed us the way in which Mons. de Saussure and his party descended from Mont Blanc. It was an interesting, but somewhat terrific exhibition, and by no means adapted to spectators, much less to practitioners, of delicate nerves. He ascended the mountain, and got upon the shoot of ice, about a hundred feet above us, and planting his heels firmly in the frozen snow, he placed his pole under his right arm, leaned the whole weight of his body firmly upon it, and then started down the shoot; he passed us with the swiftness of an arrow from a bow—his body almost in a sitting posture, his heels and the spiked end of his pole alone touching the ice, and deeply indenting it. The effect was horrible. It seemed impossible that he should ever recover himself. But, to our astonishment, we soon perceived him slacken his pace, turn himself nearly round, with all the ease of a skilful skater, and leaving the ice, walked towards us without any appearance of alarm or fatigue. In this way he said they descended many miles in the space of a very few minutes. We inhabitants of cities and of plains should be long in learning such a dangerous art. My companion, however, from his familiarity with perilous exploits at sea, was far less apprehensive of danger in these icy expeditions than myself; and I shall not easily forget the benevolent anxiety with which the guide who was helping me across one of the shoots of ice, cried out to him, "J'ai crainte pour vous,"—when he saw him fearlessly following us, with no assistance but his pole. The carefulness of the guides is very great. Every consideration, indeed, conspires to make them cautious. The lives of travellers are committed to them, and their bread depends upon the safety with which they conduct them. I believe, no accident was ever known to happen, where the party had an accredited guide, and followed his directions. Those who will go alone, or act independently, must take the consequences, and they have often been calamitous and fatal.

Having reached the summit, the scene that burst upon us was perfectly original—it was the sublime of the highest order—and seemed to realize more than any region my fancy could create, the beautiful sentiment of Montgomery, who, describing the scenery of Africa, calls it,

"A world of wonders, where creation seems
No more the works of nature, but her dreams."

We were then at an elevation of 6106 feet above the level of the sea—immediately beneath us was the Mer de Glace, a broad and tempestuous river of ice, running nearly thirty miles up into the bosom of the Alps—to the north, the deeper valley from which we had ascended—to the south, the gigantic barriers that separate Savoy from Piedmont—and around us, inaccessible peaks and mountains of eternal snow, that seemed to pierce the heavens—finely contrasting the deep azure, still more deep in these elevated regions, with their gloomy masses or their hoary summits: while the roar of cataracts and the thunder of avalanches, were the only sounds that broke upon the profound stillness of the dreadful solitude.

On the summit of Montanvert, a benevolent Frenchman, Mons. Desportes, has erected a small building for the repose and accomodation of travellers. It is very properly called the hospice: "à la nature," is carved over the door. We gladly entered it. A man had previously ascended and kindled a fire; he also furnished us with bread, and a portion of eau de vie, to mingle with a glass of water, an appendage almost indispensable in these cold and elevated regions. As we sat by the fire, we amused ourselves with looking over the album, which is kept there for the insertion of visitors names, with their remarks. The man pointed out to us amongst the autographs of many eminent personages, that of the ex-empress of France, Maria Louisa, who visited this place while Buonaparte was in Elba, under the name of the Duchess De Colorno. The empress Josephine was also here on the 29th August, 1810. She wrote the following lines in the album with her own hand. The original was purloined from the book by a countryman of ours, but the lines are preserved:

"Ah! Je sens, qu'en milieu de ce grand phenomene
De ce tableau touchant, de cette terrible scene,
Tout eleve l'esprit, tout occupe les yeux
Cœur seul, un moment ce repose en ces lieux."
JOSEPHINE.

But we were not permitted long to enjoy our repose. The guide soon summoned us to the sea of ice, and we began, "with cautious steps and slow," to descend the steep and rugged face of the mountain. As we approached the surface of the glacier, those inequalities that appeared from the summit of Montanvert to be no more than gentle undulations, rose into considerable elevations, of from fifty to a hundred feet, intermingled with half-formed pyramids, bending walls, and shapeless masses of ice, with vast blocks of granite and frightful chasms, exhibiting a scene the most savage and fantastic that ever entered into the imagination of man. It is improperly called "the sea of ice," although the surface cannot, perhaps, be better compared than to a stormy sea, but it is in fact a river; and if you conceive of two enormous mountains, rising to the height of eight or ten thousand feet, forming a deep ravine about a mile and a half in breadth, that pursues a straight course for several miles, but divides at the upper end into two glens, that run up to the highest elevations of the Alps, and that terminates at its lower extremity in an icy precipice of nearly two thousand feet, whose base is in a still deeper valley—if you then imagine innumerable torrents to roll, deep and impetuous, from the summits of the mountains—conceive them as collected by those two glens, meeting in this deep ravine, and as they hurry to dash with their collected waters down the precipice into that deeper valley, arrested by a mighty hurricane—wrought into the wildest forms by the fury of the tempest, and then, by the fiat of the Almighty, instantly congealed—if, moreover, you add the innumerable fissures and chasms torn in the ice by the undermining torrents and the unevenness of the bed below—you will have a tolerably correct idea of the sea of ice. And if you gather round it lofty peaks and snowy summits, cataracts and avalanches, clouds and storms, you will have completed the outline of this wonderful picture.

Having reached the glacier, we walked over a considerable portion of its surface, following with great precision the footsteps of our guide, and occasionally accepting the assistance of his hand as we crossed the fissures or climbed the waves that everywhere interrupted our progress. These fissures are the chief danger against which the traveller has to guard. The ice in their immediate neighbourhood is often extremely slippery, and when they lie at the foot of a descent, the steps which he sets down it must be proportionably hazardous. Early in the season, too, the smaller fissures are frequently covered with the recent snow, and thus the unsuspecting stranger would be lured by the appearance of a smooth and unbroken surface to his ruin. A girdle of imperfectly frozen snow runs along the brink of the Mer de Glace, like a border. The guide passed with peculiar caution over this, and never planted his foot till he had first ascertained the nature of the surface with his pole. Some of the fissures are of an amazing depth. Our guide told us that a traveller had attempted to fathom one of them with a line of four hundred feet, but in vain. We rolled an enormous mass of granite into one, and distinctly heard it for thirty seconds, dashing from side to side down the dark abyss.

Hitherto, a regard to our safety had confined our attention entirely to our footsteps and the objects beneath us; but having nearly reached the centre of the glacier, the guide exhorted us to pause, and look above us, and around. We did so, and were amply recompensed for all our toil, by a scene, of which it is not, perhaps, extravagant to say, that it has no parallel on the face of the globe. I shrink from the vain effort at description; but the grand outline is indelibly impressed upon my mind, and I am confident will never be effaced while any traces of the past shall remain upon the tablet of my memory. We were embosomed amid the shaggy waves, and yawning abysses of the icy sea—over these, on every hand, appeared the mountains, that rise almost perpendicularly from its brink, clothed in part with scanty herbage, and adorned with the little crimson flowers of the rhododendron ferrugineum, that bloom upon their sides. Still higher, were the regions of eternal snow, that, ever and anon, hurled from their hoary treasures the cataract or the avalanche, to augment the billows, and to swell the undermining torrents of the glacier. As the eye looked up the valley, the view became more hideous and appalling. Every trace of vegetation gradually died away, and the snowy mountains and the icy seas appeared to meet and mingle with each other—for, where the Grand Jorasse rears its colossal form, as if to bar the entrance into the valleys of Piedmont, and frown defiance on the bold attempt—all is one vast wilderness of snow, except that, on every hand, immense pyramids of dark and rugged rock emerge from these pure regions, to pierce the heavens, and stand in eternal silence, the gigantic guardians of this wondrous vale. Some of them present a front of four or five thousand feet to the winter storm. They are called needles, from the fineness of the points in which they terminate, and each one has its appropriate name and characteristic features. In front, looking up the valley, are the great and little Jorasse, at whose feet the icy sea divides—together with the vast peaks of the Tacul and the Giant. At the foot of this last, Mons. De Saussure passed seventeen days and nights making those experiments which have immortalized his name. Immediately on the left, rose the needles De Moine and De Dreux,—the one, a peak most elegantly formed, and piercing the skies, the other, an obelisk of a reddish hue, towering to the height of nearly six thousand feet above the vale. On the right, was the summit of Montanvert, with many other summits pressing on each other, as if eager for pre-eminence—the stern heralds and mighty pioneers of the hoary monarch, enthroned in silent majesty, behind them. Turning, we looked down into the vale of Chamouni, from which we had ascended—the nearer horizon being the precipice over which the glacier de Bois seems to roll its icy torrent; while beyond, Mount Breven stretched its enormous length to form the northern boundary of this singular and majestic landscape.

Although it is only from the middle of the sea of ice that these objects can be viewed to advantage, or any adequate conception formed of their immensity and grandeur, yet I found it difficult perfectly to divest myself of the idea of danger, and to give myself up to that complete abstraction of mind, which seemed necessary to their full enjoyment. The powerful impression of the scenes themselves—the effect of the real or imaginary dangers that surrounded me—the dark and unfathomable gulfs into which at every step I looked, and might, without the greatest caution, have been precipitated—the vast and terrific forms of the mountains, that rose and overhung in every direction the dreary solitude—the unusual deepness of the blue empyreal above me—the dazzling brightness of the snow—the blackness of the rocks—the thunder of the avalanches—such was the influence of all these new and wildering images and sounds upon my mind, that I seemed as if transported to another world—awe gave me an elasticity of spirit——But I feel that I am mounting higher than my wings will bear me, and beg your permission to descend, ere I expose myself to the ridicule and disasters of a fall.

There is one singular spot which we were anxious to have visited, but the guide assured us that the toil would be in vain, as the season was not sufficiently advanced for the excursion. Far up this stupendous glacier, and where it turns to the left, at the foot of the Grand Jorasse, and takes the name of Lechaud, embosomed in eternal snows, is a green and verdant isle, called Le Jardin, profuse in Alpine plants and flowers, and yielding an herbage, for which the peasants annually drive their cattle across the Mer de Glace. It is an expedition which must be accompanied with considerable danger to the cattle, yet accidents very rarely, if ever occur. This is the highest verdant spot in Europe, being upwards of eight thousand feet above the level of the sea. At present it is thickly covered with snow, which does not dissolve till the beginning of July. It resumes its wintry mantle in October, continuing uncovered only three months in the year.

We left the glacier, and ascending again to the hospice of Montanvert, I sat down upon a block of granite, to take a parting view of the scene. How poor is language as the expression of one's feelings, at such moments. The heart is full with thoughts and emotions, that the tongue cannot utter or the pen record. My mind passed from these sublimest scenes of the material to the immaterial world—I seemed, at once, to feel all the littleness and all the greatness of my nature. How insignificant a creature I appeared amid these gigantic forms—yet I exulted in a conscious being that should survive and surmount them all—that could, even now, commune with Him who bade these billows stiffen, and these summits rise—and say, as the eye embraced the mighty whole, "My Father made them all."[*]

Having again visited the hospice, and added our names to the many recorded there, we began to descend, taking another course to that by which we gained the summit, and skirting, at no very considerable distance, the front of the great glacier de Bois. The height of this frozen cataract, for such it appears, is two thousand feet, and many of the shaggy pyramids and rugged towers that seem to totter at its brink, and form its wild and fantastic crest, are said to be from a hundred and fifty to two hundred feet high. It is a truly sublime and awful object, and with all its attendant circumstances, the associations it awakens, and the feelings it inspires, sets description at defiance. We observed the eye of our guide perpetually directed to it, and ours were fastened on it more frequently than comported with our safety, for nothing can be conceived more steep and rugged than the path by which we were descending. But we were soon apprized that the attention of our guide was not directed to the glacier in vain, for he desired us to look to a certain point, where we perceived an immense mass of ice, one of the frozen turrets of the glacier, trembling on the verge of fate, and just ready to fall. It inclined yet more and more over the brow of the precipice, till the scanty portion by which it was held at its base yielding, it slipped down with immense rapidity, and a thundering noise, and, instantly dashed into myriads of atoms, rolled like a majestic cataract of quicksilver glittering in the sunbeams, and spent itself upon the surface of the glacier over which it spread. This, the guide assured us, was one of the largest avalanches he had ever witnessed. We had seen many, but none to compare with this. Its roar, like that of the deepest thunder, reverberated amongst the mountains, and many seconds elapsed ere it completely died away: and such was the fury of the icy torrent, that if any obstruction had been in its path, it would certainly have been overwhelmed in its impetuous course. You may be sure we considered ourselves highly favoured in being the witnesses of such a spectacle. How far the opinion of the natives, that in certain circumstances, the tread, or even the breath of the traveller, is sufficient to bring down these masses of ice, balanced with such trembling uncertainty, is correct, I had not an opportunity to determine—neither, you may suppose, did I wish for one, from my own personal demonstration, since the probability is, that had I been the subject of the phenomenon, some one else must have told the story. I was, however, much struck with the general truth of our friend Montgomery's description of an avalanche:

"By an hundred winters piled,
Where the glaciers,[†] dark with death,
Hang o'er precipices wild,
Hang suspended by a breath.

"If a pulse but throb alarm,
Headlong down the steeps they fall;
For a pulse will break the charm,
Bounding, bursting, burying all.

"Struck with horror, stiff and pale,
When the chaos breaks on high,
All that view it from the vale,
All that hear it coming die:"—

that is, if they cannot get out of the way. We viewed it very securely, though very near it, being quite clear of its course, with a deep glen between us and it. There is, however, another danger to which travellers are exposed in descending these mountains, from which we were not quite so free, that is, the sudden disengagement of immense masses of rock, from the higher cliffs, which come bounding down the mountain, and from which you can never make your retreat with certainty, however you may be apprized of their approach, since every mass of rock against which they strike in their passage, gives them a new direction.

We now applied ourselves with more diligence and care to the business of descent, and a most difficult and toilsome affair it proved. Conceive me, then, like Manfred with the crystal hunter—and imagine, if you please, the guide's advice—

"——— there—now lean on me,
Place your foot here—here, take this staff and cling
A moment to that shrub—now give me your hand
And hold fast by my girdle—softly—well—
The Chalet will be gained within an hour—
Come on, we'll quickly find a surer footing,
And something like a pathway, which the torrent
Hath washed since winter.——Come 'tis bravely done—
You should have been a hunter."

I must say, however, for truth requires it, that the compliment at the close was not paid to me—I was too dull a scholar to deserve it, though the previous advice and encouragement were again and again repeated. I found the pole with which I was furnished of but little service—I wanted courage to use it, and was too dizzy to repose that confidence in it which is necessary to the full enjoyment of its help. I liked the shoulder of the sturdy guide much better to lean upon, and feel myself not a little indebted to him for his kindness, in the use he permitted me to take of him, in this way.

As we approached the valley, the guide pointed out to us the source of the Arveron, which, in the height of summer, presents one of the most interesting features in this wondrous scene. It issues from the foot of the glacier, and, at that period, the ice above it is dissolved, till an arch of one hundred and fifty feet in the span is formed, from which in dark and sullen majesty, the torrent is seen to emerge. The arch was very imperfectly formed at the time we saw it, being too early in the season. Report says, that this river sometimes changes its position, and leaving its accustomed course, issues in a majestic fall from some outlet far up the face of the glacier. We observed a waterfall at a considerable height glittering in the midst of the ice, but the source of the river was still at the foot of the glacier. This river is of inconsiderable width, but very impetuous, and within half a mile from its emerging to the light of day, it is again lost in the Arve. I presume that it is formed from the snows and ice that dissolve on the Mer de Glace, or that fall in avalanches and cataracts from the higher regions of the Alps, which, passing down the fissures of the icy sea, pour their tributary streams at length into one subterranean bed, and start into daylight at its foot. The arch of ice from which it issues, with its attendant rocks and rushing torrents, is represented by those who have seen it in all its grandeur, as one of the sublimest spectacles in nature. Here, alas! a melancholy catastrophe occurred, which ought ever to be mentioned, for the admonition of future travellers. On the 8th of August, 1797, a Mons. Maritz, of Geneva, homme, says M. Bourrit, in his Itineraire, très estimé, with his son and nephew, walked some little distance under the arch, for the river does not occupy the whole space beneath, and there, for mere amusement, he fired his pistol. But he paid dearly for his rashness; for, not instantly retreating, an enormous mass of ice fell upon them all, and buried them beneath its weight. He himself escaped with a broken leg, his nephew was dreadfully mangled, but his son was killed. This melancholy fact, goes a great way towards establishing the opinion, that in certain circumstances the masses of ice are balanced so delicately, and hang by such a slender connexion, that a breath or a word will bring them down.

[*] Yet, amid these scenes—surrounded by the sublimest demonstrations of the eternal power and Godhead of the Almighty, a wretch has had the hardihood to avow and record his atheism, having written over against his name in the album at Montanvert, "an atheist." It seems as if some emotions of shame touched him at the time, for he has written it in Greek. It caught the eye of a divine who succeeded him, and he very properly wrote underneath, in the same language, "If an atheist, a fool[‡]—if not, a liar."

Near the foot of the mountain, we were met by two beautiful children,—a girl, with wild strawberries and cream, and a boy, with little specimens of crystals and ores which he had collected amongst the mountains. The manners of these children were remarkably simple and engaging, and we were much delighted with the guileless simplicity of their conversation. They conducted us to the houses of their parents. They stood upon a sort of village green, in the little hamlet De Bois, not far from the foot of the glacier. They were built of fir, and seemed to be sufficiently spacious; but they were dark and comfortless, compared with the dwellings of the superior orders of our peasantry. Retaining the native colour of the wood, they do not present that picturesque and beautiful appearance, which the neat white cottages exhibit in some of our luxuriant vales. Nor did we see the profusion and variety of domestic utensils, arranged in comely rows, indicating, as in England, "the busy housewife's care."—But there was a coldness and a nakedness about the habitation, not so much the result of poverty, perhaps, as of neglect. And this may be well accounted for by the circumstance, that the chief business of the wife in this valley, is not in the house, but in the fields. The women perform the labours of agriculture,—plough, sow, reap, and thrash the corn—while the men are occupied in hunting the chamois—in collecting plants and minerals—or in conducting travellers. Of course, where so much devolves upon the women out of doors, there must be great neglect within. The spirit of migration that pervades these valleys, ought also to be mentioned here—for the inhabitants change their residence with the seasons of the year, ascending from the valleys to the higher pastures as the spring advances, and again descending at the close of summer. These frequent removals must, of course, render them less attentive to the comfort of their dwellings, and repress that anxiety for neat arrangement and complete furniture, which the prospect of constant residence inspires. Their wealth, like that of patriarchal times, is chiefly in flocks, and the support and comfort of their cattle is the grand inducement to this varied and unsettled kind of living.

The hunting of the chamois is a favourite occupation of the men. It is an extremely hazardous amusement, and they frequently fall a sacrifice to their rashness. Often, when the moon is at the full, they will pass whole nights, as well as days, in bounding from crag to crag, leaping over dark abysses and exploring icy solitudes, where the loss of balance, or a false step must be inevitable death. They are like the inhabitants of most mountainous regions, a superstitious people; and it is the commonly received opinion in the valley, that whenever an accident occurs to one of these adventurous hunters, the scene in which it happens, with the fatal catastrophe, and all its attendant circumstances, is represented to the waking eye of his anxious wife, who needs no other information of the loss she has sustained.

It was late in the afternoon when we reached the Prieuré. A short repast sufficed us, and we again sallied forth upon a tour of discovery in the immediate neighbourhood of the village. Our stay was limited, and I felt the value of every moment. The first object of attraction, of course, was the church. It is a neat and respectable edifice; and its various altars, with their relics and divers appendages, must have to the simple villagers a very imposing appearance. We saw the curé, and a brother clergyman in the church, who moved to us with great condescension, and also made the necessary genuflections before the several altars, which the incumbent appeared to be showing to his clerical visitor. This church is the ecclesiastical mother of the valley, and has spiritual jurisdiction over all the rest. The affairs are managed by a chapter, whose seat is at the Prieuré, and at which the curé of this church presides. On this account he has the title of Administrator.

The people, though they seem to be free and happy, (and, compared with those of many other countries, they probably are so,) are still in a state of most deplorable mental slavery and ecclesiastical oppression. I happen to know, that a party last year having ascended with several guides to the hospice of Montanvert it was proposed that they should devote a few moments on that sublime elevation to the adoration of the Supreme Being, by whose stupendous works they were surrounded. In this act of worship, which was led by a French clergyman in the company, the guides appeared most cordially to participate; but they afterwards begged that the circumstance might not be named in Chamouni, as they should be excommunicated, and thus deprived of their bread, if it should come to the ears of the priest that they had united with heretics in the worship of God.

From the church we repaired to the museum of Joseph-Marie Carrier, who styles himself, Marchand-Naturaliste au Bourg de Chamonix. His collection, though not extensive, was very interesting. It consisted of specimens of natural history, gathered from the immediate neighbourhood. Complete sets of the minerals and plants were to be had neatly arranged in papers and in boxes, regularly catalogued and ticketed, for nine, and twelve francs each. The minerals are stated to have been arranged after M. M. de Saussure et Pictet. The arrangement is doubtless correct. Here, too, was an album, and amongst many other illustrious names inserted in connexion with purchases made, was that of Sir Humphrey Davy. Mons. Carrier was extremely abundant in his praises of this gentleman. "The Chevalier Davy was," he said, "a wonderful man. He had never seen his equal. He knew the name, and composition, and qualities of every stone in his shop—and was, in short, a prodigy of science?" This was something for a Frenchman to say of an Englishman, for they seem, generally to speak as though they thought all the scavans and artistes belonged to them. That the renowned Sir Humphrey Davy should have excited the admiration of the Marchand-Naturaliste au Bourg de Chamonix, is, therefore, a matter that should not be unrecorded.

I left the party in the immediate neighbourhood of the village, and directed my course towards Mont Breven, for the purpose of obtaining a better view of the summit of Mont Blanc. I pursued my walk, continuing to ascend till my path was arrested by a field of frozen snow, which I did not deem it prudent to attempt to cross alone. I, therefore, determined to content myself with the trifling elevation I had attained; trifling, indeed, compared with those which surrounded me,—and seating myself upon a mass of rock, I enjoyed the stillness, the solitude, and the grandeur of the scene. The spotless dome of Mont Blanc, and all the surrounding and inferior domes, and spires, and pyramids, that cluster in this wondrous region, which fancy might conceive the colossal edifices of some gigantic city, or the towers, and domes, and pinnacles of a vast cathedral—were all uncovered, and presenting alternate masses of the darkest and the brightest hues, were finely contrasted with each other, and all again most gloriously displayed, in the deep azure of the evening sky, the unclouded back-ground of the stately picture. The summit of Mont Blanc seemed to have considerably increased in height, being disengaged from those immense, but inferior mountains, which constitute the mass from the midst of which it rises,—whose bases, to the north, come down to the vale of Chamouni, and rising abruptly to the eye that views them from the vale, cast Mont Blanc far into the perspective, and thus almost inconceivably diminish its apparent altitude and vastness. It will be sufficient to illustrate this remark, and at the same time to show the magnitude of the mountain, to observe, that the next highest point of elevation to the summit, is called, from its form and relative position between the summit and another point, the Middle Dome: seen from the windows of the inn at Chamouni, that dome appeared to be quite as lofty as the Bosse du Dromedaire, the name given to the highest point of all, and yet it is said there is a difference of more than three thousand feet between them. Thus a mass nearly equal to that of Snowdon, had, from its vast elevation, and the bold protrusion of the nearer mountains, dwindled into such insignificance, as scarcely to affect the eye.

The sun had retired behind the western mountains, but his deeper splendours, as they died away, were succeeded by the softer beams of the moon that rose full orbed above the lofty horizon. For awhile they seemed to linger in all their mild effulgence upon the hoary brow of the monarch of the Alps, as if disdaining the darker scenes below, till at length, summit after summit caught the silvery lustre, and the deep vale itself with its humble villages, and waving corn-fields—its frozen cataracts and its gloomy woods—its rocky ramparts and its snowy barriers, lay as if entranced beneath the glorious light. Who, that has felt the influence of such scenes, that has tasted the luxury of such moments, can ever lose the impression? Amid the bustle and anxiety of after-life—the toils and vexations of a distracting world, how delightful is their remembrance—memory retraces, and dwells upon them with transport, "like spots of azure in a gloomy sky, like sunny islands in a stormy sea."

It were impossible to detail all the thoughts that passed, and the emotions that were excited in my mind. Chateaubriand affirms that a mountainous country is no scene for contemplation; you are too much concerned for your safety to indulge it. Perhaps, to a certain extent, he may be correct; but here no sense of danger affected me—nothing occurred to disturb the deep serenity of my mind—and I rose, almost instinctively, to the adoration of that Being who spake these mighty masses into existence, and gave them their majestic forms. Every object around, beneath, and above me, seemed in silent but impressive eloquence to celebrate his praise: from the moon, that led the host of heaven, and the hoary monarch of the Alps,—the patriarch of his kindred hills, and nearest to the heavenly sanctuary,—down to the frozen glaciers and the roaring torrents of the lower vales—all seemed endowed with a speech and language peculiar to themselves—a voice to touch the heart of man, and to enter into the ear of God.

But 'tis time that I should leave a spot, where I could linger much longer than a regard to your patience would allow, and, where I feel, perhaps, more of the disposition to sermonize than exactly comports with the duties of the tourist. I rose and descended, my eye still fixed on the summit of Mont Blanc. I cannot tell you how lovely an object it was, with the moon-beams playing around its crest, and glittering on the icy particles of its spotless mantle. There is nothing terrific in its appearance.* Its form is that of a gentle curve, and with the various swellings that compose its outline, it seemed like a vast cloud of purest incense rising from the rude altars beneath, to the Being that framed and fills the temple of the universe!

Perhaps there is no mountain yet discovered on the surface of the globe that presents so many interesting circumstances as this, though there are many in Asia and America that surpass it in height. There is not one that possesses so magnificent a contour—so graceful and sublime a form—that is covered to such a vast extent with a mantle of spotless snow—that gives birth to such wondrous ravines, and cataracts of ice, to fringe its vesture—that is seated on so majestic a throne of wooded mountains—or is seen in so large a portion of uninterrupted outline, from so fair a valley, to so vast a height. Chimberazo, in the Andes, rises to the elevation of 1817 toises above the vale of Quito; Mont Blanc rises to 1923 above the vale of Chamouni, leaving a difference of 106 toises, or about 678 feet in favour of Mont Blanc. From the foot of glacier des Bois, in the vale of Chamouni, to the summit of Mont Blanc, there is an uninterrupted series of ice and snow, of more than twelve thousand feet, or two miles of perpendicular height, that never has dissolved since the deluge, and probably never will till the general conflagration. The idea is astonishing: the mind can scarcely grasp it: and certainly, if the most satisfactory demonstration from actual measurement did not exist of the fact, no one, even standing on the spot, could believe it. But the truth is, that beyond a certain point of altitude, such vast distances are embraced in so small an angle of vision, and such immense objects are reduced to insignificance, that you are liable to perpetual deception—and the consciousness that you are so, leads you to receive as true, many statements which, at the moment, your senses appear to falsify.

The history of the various efforts to ascend Mont Blanc is extremely interesting, but too well known to need a repetition. One cannot but feel pleasure in the consideration, that the honour of first standing on its summit, was enjoyed as the reward of kindness and benevolence. In the last of the unsuccessful attempts which had preceded it, James Balma, one of the guides of Chamouni, six of whom formed the party, being considerably ahead of his companions, was overtaken by darkness, and passed the night above the dome de goutè, at the immense elevation of twelve thousand feet above the level of the sea. His youth and excellent constitution enabled him to endure the piercing cold, and in the morning on reconnoitering his situation, he discovered a way of access to the summit of the mountain, comparatively easy, and which had escaped the observation of all who had preceded him. On reaching Chamouni, however, he was seized with a severe indisposition, and was restored to health by the skill of Dr. Paccard, the physician of the valley. He told the doctor, on his recovery, that he was unable to repay him for his kind attentions in the usual way, but that in his late expedition he had discovered a practicable path by which to reach the summit of Mont Blanc, and that if he felt any ambition to be the first man that ever stood upon that spot, he would conduct him to it. The doctor readily accepted the proposal of his patient, and on the seventh of August, 1786, they sallied forth, without any attendants to share with them the glory of the dangerous enterprise. They passed the night on the mountain La Côte, which rises above the glacier de Bosson, and at three in the morning began again to traverse the trackless solitudes of snow, till having scaled the dome de Goutè, and passed under the middle dome, they entered upon the ridge that lies on the left of the summit, and were near the top,—when the deadly cold that struck to the heart of the doctor, and the extreme fatigue he endured, induced him to conceive the purpose of giving up the race, even when the goal, was almost within his grasp. But his hardy and inflexible guide encouraged him; and he still continued to follow the fearless steps of his companion, when, at length, about six in the afternoon, he planted his foot upon the loftiest elevation in Europe, and stood triumphantly upon a spot no mortal had ever been privileged to visit before. He stayed but half an hour on the summit. So intense was the cold that the provisions were frozen in their pockets, and the ink in their inkhorn. Fahrenheit's thermometer sunk to 18½ degrees. They paid dearly in bodily suffering for the honour they enjoyed. Their faces were excoriated, and their lips very much swelled. It was with the greatest difficulty they descended, owing to the dazzling brightness of the snow. Dr. P. was almost blind, and felt the effect in the weakness of his sight for a considerable time after. They were fifteen hours in ascending, and on their return, reached La Côte in five hours, (about midnight,) where they rested two hours, and arrived safely, at eight in the morning, at Chamouni. Immediately after this successful attempt, Mons. de Saussure, who had long offered rewards in the church at Chamouni, to those guides who should succeed in conducting him to the summit, made his celebrated expedition, in which he remained upon the top of the mountain four hours and a half, and the particulars of which he has communicated to the world. In his ascent, the way was sometimes so steep that the guides were obliged to cut holes to cling to,—while the hand of one man was put into the hole which the foot of his predecessor had left.

Since that time three other parties only have reached the summit. The first comprehended Messieurs Bourrit, father and son, Mr. Woodley, an Englishman, and Mr. Kemper, a Dutchman; the second, Mr. Beaufoy, an English gentleman, with his guides; and the third, Mr. Forneret, of Lausanne, and Baron Dortheren.

Returning to the village, I met a woman with one of those glandular swellings upon her throat, called goîtres. It was the first I had seen, and the appearance of it was to me exceedingly unpleasant and disgusting. They abound chiefly in the Valais; yet it is a remarkable circumstance, that I did not meet with one in that portion of the canton through which we travelled. To what cause, or combination of causes, they are to be ascribed, I do not presume to say. Various conjectures have been entertained, and some theories established, the result of medical investigation. The idea, that they arise from drinking the snow water, is totally without support, since they are found in regions never visited with snow: in the neighbourhood of Naples, in the Islands of Java and Sumatra, and in some other parts of the East Indies.

The opinion of M. de Saussure, to whom, in all cases connected with the phenomena of the Alps, much deference is unquestionably due, is, that they are occasioned by the concentration of heat and the stagnation of air in the lower valleys—since in the higher regions they are not found. To me, however, it is a curious circumstance, that the only instance I met with should be in so high a valley as that of Chamouni: while in the much lower valley of the Rhone, where they are said especially to abound, I did not meet with one. Whether the woman I saw was a native of the valley or not, I am unable to determine; the probability is, that she was.

The theory of Mr. Coxe, which he has established chiefly on his own investigations and researches, is, that they arise from a calcarious matter, called tuf, with which the springs in those districts where the goîtres are found, are impregnated, which are so perfectly dissolved in the water as by no means to affect its transparency, but which are introduced in impalpable particles into the blood, and by means of the blood into the thyroid gland of the throat, which is the seat of the disease in question.*

* Although such is its appearance from the vale of Chamouni, yet those who have seen it from the valley of Aost, say, that in that point of view, it presents quite another aspect, being very imperfectly covered with snow, extremely wild and rugged, and equal to the Schreckhorn in terrific grandeur.

* Those who wish for further information on the subject, may consult Mr. Coxe's valuable work, in which the different theories are most ably discussed, and experiments adduced, which go far to-

From the windows of my bed-room, which looked immediately on Mont Blanc, I enjoyed the various effects of the moon and clouds as they passed over the glorious scene. Though I was much overcome with fatigue, I could not consent to resign the object that absorbed me, and I continued fixed in delighted contemplation long after the rest of our party had lost their fatigues in sleep.

LETTER XXI.

Lausanne.

My dear ——

Nil mortalibus arduum est, was the adage of the Roman poet, and it seemed to us that we had in some measure demonstrated its truth in our journey from Chamouni to Martigny. If we thought the way from St. Martin's to Chamouni difficult and dangerous, I know not what must be said of that from Chamouni to Martigny, for it is certainly much more so. But a la raute, to speak in the true travelling style. We left Chamouni at seven o'clock, with the promise of a most auspicious day. We were upon the whole, a goodly company. Lady R—— seated upon a chair, and attended by eight sturdy guides, who took it in turn to bear her, led the van of our party. The other ladies followed in a car-a-banc, with Mons. Crotet as their special attendant, and a guide each; and we, mounted upon mules, brought up the rear. Sundry idle people of the village followed us, hoping, perhaps in the course of the day, to be taken into our service, as in some of the difficult parts of the road their assistance might be wanted. It was only for a few miles that the ladies enjoyed their carriage, being then obliged to mount the mules, and take their chance with the rest of us. I must, however, mention to their credit, the heroic resignation with which they made so unwelcome an exchange, and underwent the future fatigues of that day's perilous and toilsome journey.

We proceeded up the vale of Chamouni, through the little village de Bois, having Mont Breven on our left, and passing, as we advanced, Montanvert, and the glaciers de Bois, and d'Argentiere on our right. The last-mentioned glacier we had not seen before. It derives its name from its silvery appearance, and is, perhaps, as elegant and beautiful as any in the Alps. We passed through the village of Argentiere, a few scattered cottages at the foot of the glaciers, and, turning abruptly to the left, continued to ascend, till by a small farm house, we dismounted at the suggestion of the guides, and having reached the summit of a little verdant hill, on the right of the path, we saw the greater part of the vale of Chamouni, with the colossal mountains that rise on either hand, stretching in sublime perspective to our view. High in the midst towered Mont Blanc; around him were his many needles, and his subject Alps, while the glaciers de Bois, and d'Argentiere, glittered in the sunbeams like transparent glass. Immediately to our left, rose the gigantic Col da Balme, to the height of nearly 8000 feet above the level of the sea; and, at the upper extremity of the valley, by the little glacier, and village de Tours, the infant stream of the Arve was seen to roll, having just emerged from its dark and icy source beyond them. It was a magnificent landscape. The coup d'œil was most grand and imposing, but there was a melancholy feeling mingled with the gratification it inspired. I could not but reflect, that deeply as these scenes had interested me, I was about to leave them, in all probability, for ever; and though my acquaintance with them was of such recent date, yet they had become too much endeared to me, to be resigned without regret. I ought not to be ashamed or backward to acknowledge, that I am indebted to that wondrous vale for impressions of the grandeur and the condescension—the power and the skill of the Creator, of which I was before unconscious, and the remembrance of which I shall hope ever to cherish with emotions of reverence and gratitude. "Lo, these are parts of his ways—and how small a portion is heard of him; but the thunder of his power who can understand."

Turning with regret from this last look on Chamouni, we proceeded on our way, and quickly entered the romantic valley of Valorsine. There is another route to Martigny over the Col de Balme, and that route is usually preferred on account of the fine views which it commands. It is also less rugged, though more steep, than that by which we travelled. But our guides assured us it was too early in the season to attempt the Col de Balme, and we were, therefore, content to pursue the more wild and intricate path of the Tête Noire, and the Mauvais pas.

On our entrance into the valley of Valorsine, we had to cross a small field of frozen snow, so imperfectly had the influence of the sun been felt in that elevated region at this advanced season of the year. It was rather a formidable undertaking; for while in some places it was sufficiently hard to bear the tread of the mules, in others the beasts sunk up to their middle at every plunge. The guides advised us in this case to let the mules choose their own path, and we were much amused to observe the method which they adopted to ascertain the best. They put their noses close to the surface, and following the indications of their smell, never failed to plant their feet upon the firmest spots.

You cannot well picture to yourself a more secluded and romantic vale than that into which we had now ascended. Ascending into a valley, may be a new form of expression to you, yet I assure you it is quite correct, for the valley of Valorsine is higher than the loftiest of the Cambrian mountains, and would, perhaps, surpass in elevation the proudest summits of the Grampian hills. In winter it must be a cold and desolate spot. The houses of the peasantry are raised on beams, to allow for the depth of the snow, which, notwithstanding this precaution, our guides assured us sometimes nearly covers them. How much they are exposed to the destructive influence of avalanches and rocks, dislodged by the fury of the elements from the overhanging cliffs that encompass them, is indicated by the curious barriers with which they have defended their little church. The route from Chamouni to Martigny is impracticable in winter. How forlorn and desolate must be the condition of these aerial villagers, during its long and dreary months! No variety of colour or of sound to relieve the eye, or to gladden the ear—but nature lies all around them in her wildest forms, and ever clad in the same hoary mantle; while the storm fills them with apprehension and dread as it sweeps along the vale, or announces its work of desolation by the hollow murmurs, or the deeper thunder heard from the regions above them.

At the upper end of this valley we passed the frontiers of the Sardinian territory, and entered the canton of the Valais. The boundary is marked by a rude and ancient gateway, through which we passed. Here the path became extremely wild and difficult, climbing the face of the rocks, and running along the edge of the precipices in the most daring and fantastic style. To give you a minute detail of this singular and romantic route, would be utterly impossible, though every yard presented some new variety, and gave the Alpine scenes it traversed in fresh points of view to the delighted eye. Sometimes, however, fear predominated over every other feeling, and I would gladly have exchanged the grandeur of the scenery around me, for the most insipid country with a level road—nay, lover as I am of the picturesque! even the Isle of Ely, and the fens in Lincolnshire, at certain periods of that day's excursion, would have had charms for me.

It is no small thing, you must allow, to go down stairs upon the back of an obstinate mule, at any rate; much more when those stairs are steep and broken—not more than half a yard in breadth—with a tremendous cliff overhanging and threatening to crush you as you pass—and a frightful precipice on the other side, over which one of your feet swings, while you perpetually touch the cliff with the other. Yet, such were repeatedly the circumstances of our path, and often a long debate was held, whether to trust the steady animal in such slippery places, or sacrifice the ease of his back for the fancied greater security of our feet. He, however, seemed perfectly indifferent to the choice we made, and whether encumbered with his burden, or suffered to go free, planted his foot with philosophic firmness, climbing up the steepest wards the establishment of his own. An interesting and remarkable fact is noticed in the History of Java, recently published by my relative, and fellow traveller, Sir Stamford Raffles, late lieut. governor of that island. "Here, as in Sumatra," he observes, "there are cerain mountainous districts, in which the people are subject to those large wens in the throat, termed in Europe goitres. The cause is generally ascribed by the natives to the quality of the water; but there seems good ground for concluding that it is rather to be traced to the atmosphere. In proof of this it may be mentioned, that there is a village near the foot of the Teng'gar mountains in the eastern part of the island, where every family is afflicted by this malady, while in another village, situated at a greater elevation, and through which the stream descends which serves for the use of both, there exists no such deformity. These wens are considered hereditary in some families, and seem thus independent of situation." Whether the water in this district has been analyzed or not, is not stated. Perhaps Mr. Coxe would say, that in the upper village the stream was too near its source to be sufficiently impregnated with the matter by which the goitres are produced.

ascents, and passing along the most undefended ledges of the rocks, with a steadiness and perseverance that astonished us. Sometimes the path would wind most fearfully round the projecting angles of the rocks, and leave us exposed upon a point whence it was dreadful to look down into the gulf beneath, and where a violent gust of wind might have been attended with fatal consequences; while the way itself was so narrow and so rugged, as to appear more like the track of the chamois and the marmot, than a path for man. In these cases we deemed it most prudent to trust to our own skill in the management of the affair, by no means intending, however, to reflect upon that of our sagacious quadrupeds, who, had they been gifted with the faculty of speech, would probably have reproved us for our unnecessary fears, and condemned us for an injudicious choice. For their step is almost infallible—and when left entirely to themselves, they have seldom deceived the confidence, or betrayed the trust their riders have reposed in them. But the difficulty is—where the crags overhang the path, and the body of the animal is thrown into perpetual contortions by climbing, descending, and turning incessantly,—to keep yourself at all erect upon his back, or preserve your balance true. This difficulty must have been especially felt by the ladies, who have not so good a seat as we, and whose faces were turned to the precipice, over which they looked down in terror on the abyss beneath. We found it necessary, long before the half of our journey was performed, to leave our own mules and attend to their safety. Each had a sturdy mountaineer at the head of her mule, and we endeavoured, as well as we could, to keep at their side between them and the precipice. But this was difficult and dangerous, and frequently quite impossible. Twice I saw my cousin M——, where the descent was steep and rugged, completely lose her seat upon the animal, and only regain it, and save herself from pitching over the precipice, by grasping the hair of the guide. I admire the patience and perseverance of the men; but for their civility, and readiness to assist, we should have fared badly with the female part of our charge that day. Having named the mules and the men with approbation, I must also celebrate the virtues of the eau de vie, and the wine of Chamouni, with which Mons. Crotet had taken care amply to supply us; for I have reason to believe, that at certain periods of that day's journey, neither men nor mules would have induced some of our party to stir a step further, but for their inspiring influence.

Thus we toiled, hour after hour, along the difficult and dangerous paths, attended by every circumstance that could heighten the effect, and complete the terrific grandeur of the scene. Innumerable cataracts assailed us with their din, some were seen streaming in the distance, and others were heard roaring at our feet, but concealed completely from our view in the depths of the abyss, or by the thick foliage that fringed its brink. Now and then our philosophy was tried by an Alpine bridge, the reality which our modern landscape gardeners love to imitate, or a mass of granite or of frozen snow that lay across the path, where it was hard to determine whether to pass over on our own feet or those of the mules. But all the dangers of the way seemed to meet their consummation, when about noon, turning abruptly to the right, we entered that part of the route emphatically called the Mauvais pas; there the path lies over a tremendous gulf, and is almost entirely supported by trunks of fir. The waters of the Trient are heard to roll impetuously in the glen beneath; while on the opposite side a vast rock rises perpendicularly to an amazing height, and casts its enormous shadow over the whole scene. I fancied I had then a fine illustration of the prophet's imagery, and felt how refreshing was "the shadow of a great rock, in a weary land."

From this place we soon reached Trient, a forlorn and cheerless village, composed of a few scattered huts in the midst of a mountain defile, and, I should imagine, still higher than any human habitations we had yet passed. We had no sooner reached the place, than we threw ourselves involuntarily upon the grass, completely overcome with fatigue, and never I think was refreshment so seasonable, or repose so sweet. The guides allowed us but two hours for rest, and then the work of climbing began again. We had now to ascend a mountain called the Forcla, whose summit rose abruptly from the village of Trient, and which we attained by means of a track cut in a zigzag direction up its side. Our cavalcade made a very interesting figure, winding up this mountain staircase. As I brought up the rear, I enjoyed the spectacle, and only required the pen of Walter Scott to depict the groupes as they traversed the mountain in different directions, and rose, one above another, before me.

At the summit of the Forcla we were about 7000 feet above the level of the sea, and the immediate valley into which we looked, could not be much less than two or three thousand feet deep, yet our path was perfectly undefended, and only wide enough to admit the passage of a single mule. Along this path the empress Maria Louisa came. The men who conducted us, had been her guides on that occasion. They spoke highly of the courage and heroism which she displayed. They said she would not suffer them to hold the rein of her mule, or render her the least assistance, even in the most difficult places. She did not take the route by the Mauvais pas, however, but came over the Col de Balme. That path joins the one from Trient nearly at the summit of the Forcla.

From this spot, in an instant the whole of the canton of the Haut Valais, into which we were about to descend, burst upon our view. An extensive and fertile vale was seen far beneath us, stretching its variegated carpet, speckled with villages and farms, and watered by the windings of the Rhone, to the bases of majestic mountains, and the beams of the evening sun. The loftiest summits were covered with snow; the sides of the nearer mountains were clothed with fir.—Some travellers esteem this one of the finest views in Switzerland, from the vast variety which it embraces, from the soft and luxuriant scenery of the valley before, to the savage and terrific grandeur of the mountains behind. The descent was long and toilsome—steep and rugged—and was very far from yielding the relief it seemed to promise after the uphill work of the morning.

As we advanced, the country began to assume another aspect. We knew by its appearance that we were returning to the haunts of men. Frightful precipices and hideous solitudes were exchanged for rich enclosures, luxuriant orchards, and scenes of rural happiness and sylvan beauty.

In the higher regions of the Forcla, we were much affected by the appearance of a maniac, who accosted us as we passed, with great mildness and respect. She was a female of pleasing countenance and elegant form. She had wandered from the valleys beneath, and was pursued by her son. It seems he was under the necessity of using coercive measures to compel her to return, for we saw him strike her. It was a horrid sight,—and her shrieks rung in our ears for a considerable distance down the mountain, and have rung in mine frequently, since.

Even in these sequestered regions, monuments of superstition meet the eye. I stopped at a little oratoire erected in the descent from the Forcla, and copied the following inscription: it is a fair sample of what is found in similar places elsewhere.

Nous François Fredric Ambiel Eveque de Sion, &c. accordons 30 jours d'Indulgence a tous ceux qui reciterant devoement cinq pater, cinq Ave Devant cet 'oratoire. Donne, 7 Mai, 1763.*

---

* Indulgences originally included, not the remission of sins, but merely of penances; and they arose from the universally admitted principle, that the church had a right, upon sufficient considerations, to relax the severity of her own discipline, and to lessen, as she might see fit, the number of her penitentiary inflictions. The document granting such remission, or the grant itself in connection with the document, was called an indulgence. The idea, however, was too well adapted to the corrupt propensities of the human heart, to remain long thus contracted in its application, for it was soon made to comprehend the remission of sins as well as penances—so that the perpetrator of crimes, thus privileged, was freed from all punishment whatever, either in this life or the next; and if his indulgence was plenary, might commit every abomination with impunity. We may gather the sentiments of the Romish church, upon this important subject, from one of their own writers, St. Thomas. He says, "There actually exists an immense treasure of merit, composed of the pious deeds and virtuous actions which the saints have performed, beyond what is necessary for their own salvation, and which are, therefore, applicable to the benefit of others; the guardian and dispenser of this precious treasure is the Roman pontiff; and, of consequence, he is empowered to assign to such as he thinks proper, a portion of this inexhaustible source of merit, suitable to their respective guilt, and sufficient to deliver them from the punishment due to their crimes." Such is the horrible doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church. Who can wonder at the crimes that have polluted it? I should presume, however, that indulgences procured by such extra acts of devotion as those recommended to be performed at the oratoire above mentioned, apply merely to penances, &c., and are to be enjoyed in purgatory. Indulgences to sin, that free from every kind of punishment, I conceive are only to be got by purchase with money. It was against this system that the arm of Luther, in the hand of God, aimed the first deadly blow.

Sion is the capital of the canton, and stands at the head of the valley, and, together with Martigny, is an interesting object in the landscape seen from the summit of the Forcla.

Martigny is a neat little town, embowered in orchards, and most delightfully situated in a nook of the mountains, formed by the elbow of the valley of the Rhone, where that river receives the impetuous torrent of the Dranse. Above it, to the north, on the summit of a perpendicular rock, stand the ruins of the castle of Bathia, an ecclesiastical fortress, once of considerable strength and importance.

At Martigny we entered upon the great road that passes over the Simplon into Italy. Buonaparte stayed two nights at our inn, when he made his celebrated passage of the Alps—and I slept in the room which he then occupied. The mistress of the inn told us that she served him with his coffee on that occasion. She had a vast deal to say about him, and we were much interested with her conversation, particularly, as it seemed to afford a specimen of the state of feeling in that neighbourhood,—at least in the circle in which she moved.

She did not hesitate to avow a strong attachment to Buonaparte. Her husband had served under him, and fallen in battle; and when we expressed our astonishment, that she should like a man who had been the means of depriving her of her husband, she said with great emphasis, as though that were a sufficient consolation, "Oh! but he died for Buonaparte!" Everything that Buonaparte had done, seemed to be, in her esteem, great and good. "But was he not a very bad man," we asked. "He had but one fault," she replied, "he was too ambitious." "But was he not a great tyrant—did he not aim at universal empire—did he not plunder and enslave every other country to aggrandize and enrich his own?" "Ah!" said she, "but we wanted for nothing—we had plenty of employment—we were strangers to poverty." And what the woman said was true enough, so far; for in public works, or in destructive wars, every man of talent and industry was sure to be employed; and you scarcely go a stage, in this part of the country, in which you do not meet with a road or a bridge, or some work of public utility, begun or completed by his orders. She told us she had got his picture, and if we liked she would fetch it. It was accordingly produced, and it proved to be a print of the death of General Duroc, where Buonaparte is represented in the tent of the general, and saying, as he grasps him by the hand, "General, there is another world, and we shall meet again." "Yes," the dying man replies, "there is another world, and we shall meet again, but that will not be for thirty years to come—till you have conquered all your foes, and fulfilled the hopes of France." Thus, I presume, they still cherish a hope, from the prophetic saying of the dying general, that the fortunes of their exiled emperor may yet revive, and the days of his former glory return. It is probable, from the cheap form in which the print was executed, and the care with which this woman seemed to preserve it, that there are thousands of this picture amongst the lower classes of the population in Switzerland and France. I merely state the fact, and leave you to draw your own inference.

We had occasion, while at Martigny, to inquire for the surgeon and apothecary of the place. Not, I am happy to inform you, on account of any serious indisposition in any of our party—and more than this negative information I hope you will not expect. We found that he associated another honourable profession with that of the medical, being, also, the chief barber of the place; and that he occupied no less elevated a dwelling than the garret of the house immediately opposite to our inn. On this occasion, however, the disciple of Æsculapius had abandoned the duties of both these dignified callings, and was assisting to gather in the harvest somewhere in the neighbourhood of the town.

At Martigny we were regaled with the sight of our carriage, which we had been compelled to leave at Geneva, and which had come thus far to meet us. I know of no sight that could have been so gratifying to some of our party, who, I believe, as often as they recount the adventures of their lives, will not fail to place the tour to the glaciers of Savoy, and especially from the vale of Chamouni to Martigny, amongst the most toilsome and terrific.

There are no post horses in Switzerland. Sir S—— therefore agreed, when at Geneva, for four horses and a postilion to take us to Basle.

On leaving Martigny for Lausanne, we passed an immense chasm in the rock, through the deep gloom and obscurity of which the waters of the Trient find their passage from the higher regions to the Rhone; and not many hundred yards farther, a branch of an impetuous mountain-torrent shoots over a tremendous precipice, and forms the beautiful cascade of the Pisse Vache. How, on the very frontiers of countries renowned for their refinement, and in a valley where all is beautiful and lovely, the most sublime and elegant cataract that the majestic scenery affords, can be degraded by so coarse an appellation, I am at a loss to determine. The fall is esteemed, altogether, the finest in the Alps. It is near the road, but no correct conception of its magnitude can be formed by merely viewing it from thence. A little hill, however, rises to the right, most happily placed, as if to show it to advantage, whence the finest view of it is attained, and there, indeed, the spectacle is truly grand.—Looking upward, the shining of the sun upon the foam contrasted with the blackness of the torrent which it covers, had a most sublime effect—for you will observe we then stood almost under the arch of the fall, and only saw the blackness of the volume of water, contrasted with the brightness of the day, and the golden hue of the foam that fringed it. The height has been variously stated, the probability is that it is from two to three hundred feet. We saw it to great advantage, as the body of water was unusually large, though our guide informed us it was still inferior to what is sometimes witnessed. The sound and the spray that issued from it, produced an effect which I fancied could not be much unlike that of an action at sea. Its deep thunder, at intervals, resembled the roar of artillery, and the foam that ascended, rose in immense volumes from the troubled abyss, and floated over the valley like clouds of smoke. The prismatic colours played on the damp sward beneath us most fantastically, and every now and then presented the beautiful phenomenon of a double rainbow to our view. The scenery around was also most appropriate—comprising enough of bare and rugged rock in the cliffs to impart a character of grandeur, and enough of richness and luxuriance in the valley to relieve the eye, and give it objects upon which it may repose with pleasure, after the dizziness and fatigue inseparable from the view of such a spectacle.

From this most interesting spot the road lay through scenes of the highest cultivation and luxuriance,—meadows and cornfields, vineyards and orchards. The Rhone pursued its turbulent and rapid course on our right, and romantic mountains rose on either hand; while the hoary summit of the great St. Bernard terminated the sublime perspective to the south.

The valley closed upon us as we approached St. Maurice, a small town, with one long and narrow street, built upon the Rhone, and commanding the entrance of this mountain defile.—Immediately above it, the rocks overhang most fearfully; and far up, on a ledge of one of them, is an edifice, once the abode of an anchorite, but now untenanted. We created no small stir in the town as we passed through it, and have reason to believe, from the curiosity we excited, that the eyes of its secluded inhabitants are not often regaled with such a goodly spectacle as our coach and four, with Mons. Crotet in his purple and gold.

The road is extremely narrow, and not a little dangerous, where it turns abruptly to the right, and crosses the Rhone by a bridge of a single arch, much admired for the elegance of its form and the vastness of its span, and remarkable as separating the canton of the Pays de Vaud from that of the Valais. Here the genius of Napoleon had also projected new improvements, and suggested the plan of widening the road by removing some of the houses in St. Maurice. Travellers have cause to regret, that his purpose was never carried into effect. We now left his great military road, which proceeds along the Savoy side of the lake of Geneva, and passed through a country far less wild and majestic, but possessing every character of pastoral and sylvan beauty, to Bex.

You can scarcely conceive how delightful such scenery appeared, after the wild and terrific objects with which our eyes had recently become familiar. How refreshing was the verdant meadow—the cooling shade—and the level road, after the continued glare of everlasting ice, and the intense fatigue of toiling along the face, or up the front of frightful precipices and craggy rocks.

We were much amused with the singular appearance of the immense straw hats worn by the women, who were busy in the hay-fields, and now and then lifted up their beautiful and healthy countenances to peep at us, as we passed along,—and, indeed, it was little more than a peep that could be obtained from under such a vast projection as that which shaded their fair brows from the scorching heat of the noontide sun. Their hat very much resembles that of the Chinese, only that is rendered still more curious, by a peak, with a kind of knob at the top of it, in which the crown terminates.

Bex is a small village, perfectly rural and pleasantly situated in the midst of orchards, gardens, and meadows. Immediately opposite the windows of the inn, the mountains are remarkably bold and imposing in their outline, and the peak of the Dent de Midi rises above them all in hoary and rugged grandeur. The effect was greatly heightened by a storm in the evening; and with somewhat mingled emotions of terror and delight, we saw the lightning leaping, as it were, from crag to crag, while the deep thunder murmured sullenly, or played its dread artillery amongst the hills.

The inn at Bex was by far the neatest, and the cleanest, with the most excellent provisions, and the best attendance we had met since leaving England. There was, indeed, an air of elegance about it—a taste and delicacy in the style of the furniture and the decorations of the rooms, never witnessed in the first hotels of our own country. The lace, the fringe, and the satin of the canopies, and curtains of the couches—the variously figured papers of the rooms, exhibiting a boldness of outline, a correctness of expression, and a richness of colouring, which the first artists need not have blushed to own,—the airiness of the house, which had more the appearance of a villa rather than an inn—the sylvan beauty of the scenery around, and the grandeur of the more distant mountains, altogether produced something like the effect of a high wrought scene in the eastern tale—the work rather of enchantment than reality.

We asked the landlord if many travellers had passed this season. He said, not many: as the dismal accounts circulated in Paris and other parts of Europe, of the distress of the country, kept people away. Certainly, nothing can be more exaggerated than these reports have been. We expected, from what we heard in Paris, to have seen people perishing for want upon the public roads, and famine in every countenance we met. This, however, is far from having been the case. We have been rather struck, on the contrary, with the healthful appearance of the people. They certainly have suffered much; and we did not meet with that excessive vivacity and gaiety, which under other circumstances, perhaps, we should have seen. But the general expression of the people can hardly require a stronger name than sobriety: it certainly does not amount to sadness, much less to despair.

We slept at Bex. Several carriages arrived in the course of the evening, and our landlord had cause to congratulate himself upon a larger company reposing beneath his roof that night, than he had entertained for many weeks before.

Not far from Bex, we passed, on the right, the road to the salt works, for which this neighbourhood is celebrated. We had not time to inspect them; and my inclination to do so was much diminished by the circumstance, that we have similar works in our own neighbourhood, while various intelligent travellers have given us ample accounts of these.*

Our road increased in interest as we advanced. On the left, not far from Aigle, we observed the majestic castle of St. Tryphon, crowning a majestic summit of an insulated rock. It is said to be built of marble. There are some celebrated quarries in its neighbourhood.

At length we arrived at the head of the lake of Geneva, by far the most interesting portion of this beautiful sheet of water. It is rendered so by nature and by the genius that has haunted and celebrated its scenery. The valley is

———————"lone
And wonderful, and deep, and hath a sound,
And sense, and sight of sweetness: here the Rhone
Hath spread himself a couch—the Alps have rear'd a throne."

The mountains on the left of the valley are extremely wild and majestic; and at their feet, close on the borders of the lake, is the little village of Mellerie, famous as the residence of Rousseau. This name, which I am well aware, would excite the eulogies of many a pen, and impart to the surrounding scenes, a charm more powerful than any their own romantic beauties could create, has, I must acknowledge, a far different influence upon me. I cannot but connect with it the pestilential principles—the blasphemous productions—and the deep sensuality, of the infidel that owned it. Who, that has any respect for the honour of revelation, or the happiness of mankind, but must regret, that ever so great a name was lent to so base a career, or that such lovely scenes should have been polluted by the breath of such depraved and prostituted genius.*

Here all is classic ground, for passing Villineuve, a small town at the head of the lake, we presently arrived at the castle of Chillon, not less remarkable for the singularity of its situation, or the scenes of its history, than for the talent which has celebrated both. It literally stands in the lake, and is entered by a drawbridge. Above it are lofty hills tracked by a mountain torrent, and beneath it, the waters of the lake, washing its massive walls, to the amazing depth of nearly a thousand feet. We alighted at its gate, and passing the drawbridge, were conducted to its dark and cheerless dungeons. The associations and the feelings excited by the visit, were of the most melancholy and affecting kind. The transition was so sudden, and, indeed, unexpected,—for I knew not till the carriage stopped that we should alight—from all that was grand, and beautiful, and free—to the dampness and the darkness of those gloomy cells, that the effect was powerful. The pathetic tale of the prisoner of Chillon, was fresh in our remembrance, and the memorials of captivity and suffering yet remained. We saw the staples in the pillars to which the prisoners were confined, the pavement which the steps of the ill-fated Bonnivard had worn,† and the fatal beam by which, not unfrequently, the unhappy victims these vaults enclosed, were made to pass from a living sepulchre to that of death.

"Chillon, thy prison is a holy place
And thy sad floor an altar—for 'twas trod,
Until his very steps have left a trace
Worn as if thy cold pavement were a sod.
Bonnivard! May none those marks efface,
For they appeal from tyranny to God."

Emerging from the dungeons of Chillon, we observed upon the lake, not many hundred yards from the shore, a little verdant islet, with two or three trees—the only one that breaks the surface of this magnificent sheet of water. The Empress Maria Louisa visited it, when exploring these scenes, and took a breakfast there. Perhaps, there are few regions that can surpass in loveliness and grandeur, the view which we enjoyed on leaving the towers of Chillon. To the left, the Alps of Savoy, rising in a thousand fantastic forms, to a sublime elevation above the rock of Meillerie; to the right, the luxuriant vineyards and the pleasant villages of the Pays de Vaud, gently inclining to the margin of the lake; behind, a noble background of lofty and woody hills; and before, a placid surface of deep and transparent blue, stretching to a vast extent, with one lonely sail upon its bosom, and scarcely a breeze to disturb its repose.

* A full account of them is given in Mr. Coxe's Travels, vol. II. p. 104—106. They are the only salt works in Switzerland, and furnish but one-twelfth of the annual consumption of the canton. Their net profit is about three hundred pounds. The quantity of rock salt annually delivered from the pits at Northwich, in Cheshire, is from fifty to sixty thousand tons, while not less than forty-five thousand tons are supplied from the brine pits. The total annual amount produced by the salt rocks and springs in Cheshire, is, therefore, about one hundred thousand tons, the duty upon which is so considerable, as to render the appointment of a special board of commissioners necessary for its management, independent of the excise and customs.

* The life and character of Rousseau are too well known to require either sketch or comment. Yet, defiled and degraded as he was by the dereliction of every moral, and the avowal of every infidel and licentious principle, Rousseau is the man, whom the Constituent Assembly held up to the imitation, and even adoration of the French people—placed next to Voltaire, (par nobile fratrum) in the Pantheon—and who is still celebrated as one of the brightest ornaments their country has ever known. This is the man who could blasphemously declare, in a volume which developed his crimes, "No man can come to the throne of God and say, I am a better man than Rousseau,"—who could boast, in another of his pestilential productions, that he would one day say to the Supreme Arbiter, "Deign, in thy clemency, to judge a weak mortal; I have, it is true, done much ill upon earth, but I have published this writing,"—and who entered into eternity with a lie upon his tongue, exclaiming, "Eternal Being! the soul that I am now going to give thee back, is as pure at this moment, as it was when it proceeded from thee: render it partaker of thy felicity." Never was there a more melancholy example of the infatuation and frenzy, the audacity and effrontery in vice, by which the French school of infidel philosophy is distinguished. If the principles of such men were universally imbibed, every vestige of religion, morals, faith, and decency, would be banished from the world. Yet, the works of Rousseau and Voltaire,—whose common saying concerning the Redeemer was, "Crush the wretch,"—are the models upon which some of our British youth form their taste, and the sources whence they derive their principles. While such books occupy their studies, we need wonder at nothing that degrades their characters and pollutes their lives.

† Bonnivard, the prior of St. Victor, and the great assertor of the independence of Geneva, was found in the dungeons of Chillon, when the castle was wrested from the Duke of Savoy by the Bernese. He had been confined six years, and had worn the stones of his dungeon by his continual walking within its narrow limits.

As we passed through Clarens we were shown the chateau where Rousseau's mama, or mistress, resided. At Vivey, a neat and pleasant town, delightfully situated on the border of the lake, we dined, and afterwards proceeded through a lovely country, with the lake, and the opposite mountains of Savoy, on our left, and vineyards, rising like so many terraces on our right, to Lausanne. It was too early in the season for the vineyards to have their full effect: too much of the sticks by which the vines were supported were yet visible, and I was rather inclined to consider them a deformity than an ornament in the picture.

LETTER XXII.

Morat.

My dear ——

Lausanne is seated on the summits and the steep declivities of three hills that rise above the lake, and from various parts of the town and its environs, extensive views of that noble sheet of water and its surrounding scenery are obtained. It is nearly a mile from the town to the water's edge.

The town itself has little to recommend it. Its streets are narrow, crooked, steep, and miserably paved. We saw but few public edifices, that deserved particular notice. The cathedral is a venerable pile of Gothic architecture, and approached by a series of flights of covered steps. Lausanne is the seat of government of the Pays de Vaud, and is at present the residence of the British ambassador, Sir Stratford Canning. We found the inhabitants deeply sympathizing with him in the loss which he had just sustained in the death of an amiable wife. The man who showed us the cathedral, pointed out, with great feeling, her recent grave. The melancholy event had happened but ten days before.

We spent the sabbath at Lausanne, and attended divine service in the cathedral. The minister was a young man, and the sermon, so far as I could understand it, most excellent; but it was delivered with such rapidity, that I think the audience, for the most part, must have had some difficulty in following the preacher. The discourse was on the work and example of Christ, and had more in it of what constitutes the chief excellence of a sermon, "the truth as it is in Jesus," than I have heard since leaving England. The congregation was but small. The people appeared attentive and devout.

I cannot but confess, that it was an interesting circumstance to me to attend divine worship in a cathedral, and in the bosom almost of popery; yet, stripped of all its trappings and absurdities, and conducted with a seriousness and a simplicity which becomes the worship of the Most High. I felt myself at home—for the form of service very much resembled that of the people amongst whom I minister. The preacher did use a liturgy, but it was short and concise: in every other respect the worship was conducted much in the manner of the protestant dissenters in England.

I found that they had several schools in Lausanne, that they had one upon the principle of Bell and Lancaster, and that they were very careful to give Bibles and catechisms to the children. The blessings of education are universally enjoyed throughout the canton, and there are few states, perhaps, that exercise so much vigilance in the care of the rising generation. It is a small republic, with about 150,000 inhabitants. It was long a mere province of the canton of Berne. The population of Lausanne is chiefly Protestant. This is the case generally throughout the Pays de Vaud; but while the principles of Protestantism prevail on one side the lake of Geneva, the demon of superstition and the image of the beast, are enthroned upon the heights that rise abruptly from the other, and shed their pestilential influence over the romantic regions beyond. It would have been strange, indeed, if the reformed religion had not spread in some directions through the immediate neighbourhood of its great champion, and the scenes that were honoured with his labours. But, alas! how small a portion of land, even here, does it possess, and over that portion, scanty as it is, how imperfectly and partially are its genuine spirit and principles diffused.

From the windows of our inn we enjoyed an uninterrupted view of the lake, and in the evening it presented a glorious spectacle, as the moon rose from behind the adjacent mountains, and shed a column of gold upon its placid waters. Not a breeze ruffled them—all was still and serene. The mighty forms of the mountains lay in masses of shadow upon the glassy surface, while the stars rose one by one in the azure firmament above, till the whole landscape seemed softened down to more than material beauty, and appeared like a type of paradise—a glowing picture of a lovely spot in some celestial clime! We were wrapped in silent admiration, when the tones of a guitar saluted us from the terrace of the garden, and, accompanied by a melodious voice, charmed us with some soft and simple German airs, that precisely harmonized with the character of the scene, and completed the sensation of delight which had already been excited in the mind.

The population of Lausanne is about eight thousand. We were informed that vast numbers of English inhabit its neighbourhood. We met with none, however, in the streets. Here, as over all the continent, the Sabbath terminated with the afternoon service, yet we did not observe that dissipation in the evening which prevailed in France.

There is a delightful promenade in the vicinity of the town commanding extensive views of the lake, with its bays and promontories—its surrounding Alps, and the distant ridges of the Jura. I was much struck with the loneliness of the lake. Though in the midst of a populous region, there was scarcely a sail upon its surface through the whole of yesterday, and we observed but one or two, during our ride of many miles along its margin. The length of this magnificent mirror of waters is nearly sixty miles,* and its greatest breadth from eleven to twelve. Its form is like that of the moon, between its first and second quarter; Savoy occupies its concave, and the Pays du Vaud its convex side. Its waters are of the deepest blue, and receive not less than forty tributary streams. Of these the Rhone is the principal; and this noble river is completely purified from its mountain pollutions in its passage through it. I had occasion to remark the transparency of the atmosphere in the amazing distance to which we could distinctly see the Castle of Chillon, which occupies a most advantageous position at the head of the lake. It is affirmed, and I believe with truth, that a town upon its banks illumined by the setting sun, may be seen to the distance of forty miles. But the lake of Geneva is a topic upon which so many have written, that I put your patience to an unnecessary trial by these crude remarks of my own. Equally unnecessary is it for me to remind you that this place was long the residence of Gibbon, the historian, and that the summer-house, in which he wrote the greater part of his history, is still standing; the library, too, which he used in that work, remained till recently in statu quo, but I believe it has lately been sold.

There appears to be a great imitation of French manners in this place, a circumstance which cannot be reckoned amongst the most favourable of its symptoms. Their simplicity of character has ever been considered the glory of the Swiss, but the refinement and elegance of the French nation, bring dissipation, intrigue, and infidelity in their train, and menace alike the interests of morality, of religion, and of liberty. I believe that few countries have been happier for the influence of French politics, and few individuals better for the principles of French education. Upon this ground, I cannot but regard the opening of the continent, and subsequent influx of British youth of both sexes to the seminaries of France and the societies of Paris, as a serious evil, and one obviously tending to a result which every lover of his country must sincerely deprecate. For my own part, I think it becomes all parents and guardians to ponder well the probable results of the step they meditate, ere, for the sake of economy, they resign the youth committed to their care, to the influence of such a pestilential element, and the attraction of such a dangerous vortex: for Britain may well deplore the day when art, and cunning, and scepticism, shall be substituted for that ingenuousness of character, which is now the brightest ornament of her rising population.

We left Lausanne at an early hour, and reached this place about sunset. The ascent from Lausanne was long and tedious, although we had an additional pair of horses to our carriage. But this circumstance I considered rather an advantage than otherwise, as it gave me more leisure to survey the scenery we were leaving behind. The outline of the Alps was exceedingly grand from the hill above Lausanne, and the lake looked lovelier than ever, because, perhaps, the view I was then taking of it was the last.

* Lord Byron writes, "I this day observed for some time the the reflection of Mont Blanc, and Mont Argentiere, in the calm of the lake, which I was crossing in my boat. The distance of these mountains from their mirror is sixty miles.

We breakfasted at Moudon, a town of great antiquity, situated in a delightful valley, watered by the Broze, and encompassed by well wooded and verdant hills. It was the capital of the canton, when the Pays de Vaud was under the dominion of the Dukes of Savoy. Our next stage was to Payerne, whose appearance was forlorn and desolate. It is a place of great antiquity, but of no trade or manufacture. It stands upon an extensive plain, and its inhabitants are chiefly occupied in the pursuits of agriculture. In the market-place was a rude statue, which, I was informed, was intended to represent the famous Tell, the great asserter of their independence. We met with a very civil and communicative man in our rambles through the streets, form whom we learned they had neither Bible society nor Sunday school; but they had a free school; and were well supplied with Bibles from the institution at Lausanne.

The country through which we have passed to-day reminded us strongly of our own. The haymakers were busy in the fields. The corn looked well, and promised an abundant harvest. The farm-houses and cottages had an air of neatness and of comfort, such as we had not witnessed either in France or Savoy, and scenes of cheerfulness and plenty reigned around.

Morat is a neat town built of stone. The houses of the principal streets are on arcades. It is pleasantly situated on the borders of a small lake, about six miles in length, and one and a half in breadth. The lake of Morat is separated from that of Neufchatel by a ridge of inconsiderable hills. These two lakes run parallel to each other, and the former pours its superabundant waters, by means of the Broze, into the latter. The lake of Neufchatel, however, surpasses that of Morat in extent, though not, perhaps, in beauty. It is thirty miles in length, and about three in breadth.

Morat is celebrated in the history of Switzerland, for a desperate battle fought in its neighbourhood, between the Swiss and Charles the Noble, Duke of Burgundy, in the year 1476. The victory was decided in favour of the Swiss. The invading army was almost annihilated. The bones of the vanquished were collected and preserved in a square building near the town. There remain, however, but a few at present; the Burgundian troops in the service of France, have embraced the opportunity afforded by their more successful invasion, to remove, as far as possible, these memorials of their ancestors' defeat, while the Swiss themselves are charged with having violated these relics, by making a barter of the bones for the purpose of knife handles, for which their extreme whiteness have rendered them greatly in demand.

The German language is generally spoken at Morat. We here began to find the comfort of a servant who can speak most of the continental languages with fluency. We have been much amused with a debate between him and the landlord of the inn, the subject of which was whether the English did really drink sugar in their tea. The landlord seemed hard to be convinced that we could be guilty of such extravagance. 'Twas well for us that we were provided with the tea, else there would have been no occasion for the debate. Our's, it must be observed, is not the best inn in the town, being already occupied by the magistrates from Bern, but is the second in rank, and certainly not to be celebrated for anything but its darkness and its dirt. We have enjoyed a pleasant walk by the margin of the lake. To me there is something peculiarly interesting in the stillness and twilight of the evening—and amid such scenes the charm is doubly powerful. How delightful, at such an hour, is the converse of a friend—and, if alone, how transporting that effort is of the mind by which it can surround itself with the society it loves, and hold communion with the absent, in defiance of the distance that intervenes. The luxury has frequently been mine in the course of this tour, and I enjoy it now. But like everything sublunary it is transient. Adieu.

Your's, &c.

LETTER XXIII.

Basle.

My dear ———

I walked through a highly cultivated country from Morat to Gumenen, a little village, six miles distant, where we breakfasted, and had the good fortune to secure to ourselves the only two white loaves then in the place. It is pleasantly situated upon the Saane, a rapid river of considerable breadth, which is crossed by a wooden bridge of singular construction, with a tiled roof to shelter it from the weather. From this place we proceeded to Bern.
